The findings relating to the flow of water in Bear river state that during every year since 1845 up to the year 1910 there flowed naturally in said river at the easternmost line of plaintiffs' land, for the use of said land, during the months of April, May, and June, a minimum of 4,000 miner's inches of water, during July, 3,000 miner's inches, during August, 2,200 miner's inches, and during September and October, 2,000 miner's inches; that these months comprise the irrigating season for plaintiffs' lands; that plaintiffs, up to the year 1910, had always used during said months said quantities of water on their lands; that the said amounts were, are, and in the future always will be necessary for use on said lands; that during the said irrigating season of 1910 the defendants, by means of the dams and canals aforesaid, naming them, did divert, ever since have diverted, and threaten to continue to divert from said river and carry out of its watershed "more than one-third of the said waters of said Bear river to which plaintiffs and their said lands are entitled as aforesaid." There are further findings that none of the causes of action of the plaintiffs, or any of them, is barred by the provisions of any or all of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure specified in the answer; that the defendant Pacific Gas & Electric Company and its predecessors in interest have not, and never have had, any right to divert any of the waters of Bear river, the flow of which the plaintiffs have been found to be the owners of and entitled to the use of as aforesaid, and that said defendant and its predecessors in interest have not heretofore diverted from said river or used any of said waters so found to be owned by the plaintiffs and have not acquired any right to do so, and that as to said defendant the right of the plaintiffs to the water so found to be owned by them is paramount to any right thereto of said defendant; that the United Water & Power Company and its predecessors in interest have never, through the Miners' ditch or otherwise, until 1910, diverted any water adverse to the rights of the plaintiffs to the water of which the plaintiffs are found to be the owners as aforesaid; and that said defendant is not the owner nor in the possession of any right to divert from said river during the irrigating season of any year any of the waters thereof so found to be owned by the plaintiffs.

The judgment makes no provision as to the use or diversion of water except during the months above named. It declares merely that the plaintiffs have the right to the continued flow in Bear river every year at their eastern boundary, during the months above named, of the quantities of water stated in the findings as flowing in said months at said boundary, and that the defendants be enjoined from diverting any water from Bear river "at any time when the waters flowing in said Bear river at said easternmost boundary of plaintiffs' said lands, in any year at any time during the months of April, May, and June, shall be less than 4,000 inches; during the month of July, less than 3,000 inches; during the month of August, less than 2,200 inches; and during the months of September and October, less than 2,000 inches."

The several claims of the defendants to the ownership of the above-described water rights are supported by evidence similar in character. A statement of that relating to the diversion at the Bear River dam aforesaid will illustrate them all sufficiently for the purposes of this decision. The Bear River dam and the flumes and ditch leading therefrom, now owned by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, were constructed about the year 1852. They have been maintained and operated continuously, without substantial change, from that time down to the time of the alleged diversions of water from Bear river by the defendants in 1910. This was done by the successive predecessors in interest of the gas company; the South Yuba Water Company being in the ownership and control from the year 1890 until December 31, 1910. The Bear River canal at its head is of a size sufficient to carry more than 1500 inches of water. The lowest estimate of its capacity made by any witness was 1,520 miner's inches. At least that quantity of water has been diverted from the river by means of said dam and canal by the predecessors of the gas company, and put to public use for beneficial purposes continuously during the above-named months of each year prior to 1910, for many successive periods of five years, whenever there was enough water of the river there flowing to fill the canal, and when there was less flowing all was diverted. It is not questioned that this diversion and use, whatever the quantity, was made under a claim of right to do so. This diversion and use was continuous for so many years, was so openly made, so notorious, and embraced so large a portion of the waters of the stream and extended over so wide a territory that it could not be, and is not, contended that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest were without knowledge thereof, if such knowledge were necessary to the inception of the period of limitation and prescription. There was no substantial conflict in the evidence with respect to these facts.

[1] The taking of the 1,520 inches of water from the river diminished its flow to that extent below the dam down to the plaintiffs' lands. As the plaintiffs were then entitled to the full flow of the stream by their lands, this taking was an invasion of their rights, whether they used the water, or any part thereof, on their lands or not, and regardless of the fact that the water remaining in the stream may have been sufficient for their needs and uses. It was therefore adverse to plaintiffs' rights, and a continuance thereof for five years established in the predecessors in interest of the gas company a perfect right to continue the diversion of the quantity so taken. Moore v. Clear Lake W. W. Co., 68 Cal. 150, 8 Pac. 816; Gallagher v. Montecito, etc., Co., 101 Cal. 244, 35 Pac. 770; Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 335, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 543, 49 Pac. 577, 38 L. R. A. 181; Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 250, 16 Pac. 900. This right was thereafter held by a perfect title in fee, good against all lower riparian proprietors, including the plaintiffs. Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 381, 94 Am. Dec. 722; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 540, 95 Am. Dec. 205; Alhambra, etc., Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 600, 14 Pac. 379. Under the evidence, therefore, the South Yuba Water Company, on December 31, 1910, when it conveyed its water rights to the gas company, held a complete and perfect title to the right to divert at Bear River dam the quantity of water which had been there diverted continuously for so many years. Its conveyance transferred that right and title to the gas company. This right was therefore established by the evidence, and the findings that plaintiffs' causes of action were not barred by the statute of limitations and that the right of the plaintiffs to have flow at their lands in Bear river and to use the amounts of water above specified during the months stated is paramount to the right and title of the gas company are contrary to the evidence, so far as this prescriptive right and title, and others of like origin and character, and sustained by like proofs, are concerned. The plaintiffs' causes of action are barred with respect to these prescriptive rights. These include the diversions at Gold Hill dam, at the Bear Valley dam, and at the Head dam of Miners' ditch, each of which is in pursuance of a prescriptive right as well sustained by the evidence as that at Bear River dam.

[2, 3] The fact that the defendants, by means of new and more perfect dams, and by repairs to the canals, completed within three years prior to 1911, were enabled to and did, in the year 1910, divert more water than before, did not affect the rights to continue to divert the quantity which they had previously acquired the right to divert. And if a small part of the water so taken into the canals at said dams has always escaped from the canals through leaks in the flumes, and thus has been returned to the stream below, this does not deprive defendants of the right to the quantity actually kept out of the stream. It would only diminish by that much the quantity which they are entitled to continue to divert by reason of the taking at the dam. It would not affect the right to the remainder after allowing for these leakages.

[5] The proper form of a judgment in such a case would be to declare the right of the respective defendants to make the diversions of water from Bear river to the quantity as to which the prescriptive right was found to be established and to permit them to continue the diversion of such quantity, but to enjoin them from making any greater diversion of the water of the river by means of improved dams or canals or otherwise. It would appear that the court endeavored to accomplish this object by declaring that they should make no diversion whatever when the water flowing at the plaintiffs' land was less than the quantities designated in the judgment during the respective months of the irrigating season. This, in effect, would allow the respective defendants to continue their respective diversions so long as the quantity flowing by the plaintiffs' land was not reduced thereby below the quantities specified. The objection to this form of judgment is that it puts upon the defendants a burden which the law does not attach to their prescriptive rights. The defendants' rights were positive as to quantity, and they existed regardless of the effect on the stream below. The owner of a prescriptive right thus acquired is under no obligation to go below to ascertain or inquire whether those who there have rights in the water are receiving the usual quantity or not. His right is absolute. The consequences of his diminution of the stream must be suffered by those below. Under the judgment in this case the defendants could not safely divert the quantity of water to which their prescriptive rights extend without first ascertaining each day that such diversion would not reduce the stream at plaintiffs' land below the minimum quantity established by the judgment. Of necessity this would be very difficult, if not impossible. All diversions and uses by riparian owners and others in the intervening space, 17 to 50 miles, must be taken into the account; also the state of the weather and of the atmosphere, the possibility of rain to vary the flow of the stream, and the losses by seepage in the stream as depleted compared with its loss if not diminished. The right which the defendants had acquired is a right to take a positive quantity continuously, and it is not burdened by any such duties or obligations as would be imposed upon it by this judgment.

There is no force in the claim that the evidence is too indefinite and uncertain to support findings as to the quantity of water covered by the prescriptive right at the several dams. It is true that the transcript indicates that little importance was attributed to this point. Apparently it was obscured by other matters during the trial. But there was evidence with respect to each of the diversions, showing the capacity of the several canals and the quantity of water carried therein; that is, that they were run full when there was water enough, and that when there was less all the water was diverted.

[6] The fact that witnesses differed in their evidence as to the capacity did not relieve the court of the duty of finding the facts. In proving a prescription the evidence must relate to conditions and acts occurring at a period many years before the trial, and it is seldom harmonious in the details. It is the duty of the court to compare and weigh such evidence and to reach a conclusion thereon as to the truth, according to its best judgment. A continuous adverse diversion and beneficial use of a given quantity for a single period of five years establishes the title to that quantity.

[7] The proof need not extend over the whole period from the beginning of the diversion to the beginning of the action. A failure of proofs as to some intervening period would not defeat the defendants' claim.

The important principle in the case, we may, in conclusion, repeat, is that the rights of the defendants in the stream, with regard to quantity of water, are not to be measured by the quantity which has hitherto flowed or may hereafter flow therein at plaintiffs' lands, but by the quantity which has been adversely diverted at their dams and beneficially used continuously for a period of five years, under claim of right, by them and their predecessors in interest.

It is perhaps necessary to add that we refer to the water naturally flowing in Bear river, and not to such waters as may have been carried into it from the Yuba or American rivers. It appears that such additions have been made in the past by the defendants and their predecessors. They have the right to retake these waters at their pleasure. The court must take account thereof and deduct the same in computing the adverse diversions from Bear river, allowing only the natural flow taken. This will make its task more difficult, but we cannot say that it will be impossible to distinguish them.

The appellants at the trial insisted and on this appeal they still insist that none of the lands of the plaintiffs are riparian to Bear river, except the tract known as the Daniel P. Durst ranch, belonging to plaintiffs Ralph H. and M. H. Durst and the estate of Daniel Durst. It is admitted that all of the lands originally abutted upon the river, but it is claimed that by reason of changes in the course of the stream before the action was begun all of it except the above-named tract has ceased to abut thereon, except during times of extreme high water, and has thereby lost the riparian right. It is unnecessary to consider the question. So far as the last-named plaintiffs are concerned, the riparian character of their land enables them to maintain the action and would sustain an injunction in their favor if they were otherwise entitled thereto. Watson v. Lawson, 166 Cal. 241, 135 Pac. 961.

[8] As to the other lands it appears that the owners thereof have for more than 40 years next before the action was begun diverted and used thereon practically all the waters of the stream that reach a point opposite the upper boundary of the land continuously and under claim of right. This would entitle the plaintiffs to maintain the action against any wrongful diversion above that would diminish the stream at their place of diversion so that it would not afford them their usual quantity. Under these circumstances, the question as to the riparian character and rights of this land is not of sufficient importance to this appeal to require consideration.

The judgment is reversed.

BOND v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ALAMEDA COUNTY. (S. F. 8120.)

CONTEMPT 🔑66(2)—RE-ENTRY AFTER EVICTION—APPEAL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1210, as amended, did not change the law with respect to the right of appeal from a judgment of contempt for re-entering land from which one has been ejected, nor grant any right of appeal in such matter.

Sloss, Melvin, and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by Mary Bond for writ of review to the Superior Court of Alameda County. Part of order complained of in proceeding annulled.

Decided from the bench February 5, 1917, on the conclusion of the oral argument.

F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for petitioner. George W. Reed and L. D. Manning, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM (speaking through the Chief Justice). The court is of the opinion that the case is not distinguishable from Huerstal v. Muir, 62 Cal. 479; that the amendment to section 1210 of the Code of Civil Procedure has not changed the law in the respect suggested, and does not grant or confer any right of appeal in such a matter, that under these circumstances Huerstal v. Muir, supra, controls, and the portion of the order complained of in this proceeding should be annulled.

It is so ordered.

NAPA VALLEY ELECTRIC CO. v. CALISTOGA ELECTRIC CO. (S. F. 8193.)

Appeal and Error 🔑477—Supreme Court—Powers—Temporary Restraining Order.

The superior court having by order dissolved a temporary restraining order and denied an injunction pendente lite against defendant, the Supreme Court has no power to grant a restraining order against defendant pending an appeal from the order of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2247–2249.]

In Bank. Action by the Napa Valley Electric Company against the Calistoga Electric Company. From an order of the superior court dissolving a temporary restraining order and denying an injunction pendente lite, plaintiff, having appealed, makes application to this court for a temporary restraining order pending appeal. Application denied.

U'Ren & Beard, of Napa, for plaintiff.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court to enforce specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of certain property, and sought an injunction pendente lite restraining the defendant from disposing of the property pending the determination of the action.

The superior court having granted a temporary restraining order, on the hearing of the application for an injunction pendente lite made its order, denying the same and dissolving the temporary restraining order. It refused the request of the plaintiff to continue in force the temporary restraining order pending the determination of the appeal from the order denying an injunction pendente lite.

The plaintiff has appealed from such order, and now seeks from this court an order restraining the defendant, pending such appeal, from disposing of the property; in other words, it seeks from this court, pending the determination of the appeal, precisely the relief it sought to obtain from the superior court by an injunction pendente lite.

It was determined by this court in Hicks v. Michael et al., 15 Cal. 107, 112, 114, that this court has no authority to grant such relief. At the time of that decision our law, both constitutional and statutory, was substantially the same as it is now in all material respects. This decision has ever since its rendition been regarded by this court as determining this question, and it has been consistently followed by denying applications in all respects similar to this. In the case of Platt v. City and County of San Francisco, S. F. No. 5562, the question was squarely presented and given consideration. No opinion was filed by this court in that matter, but the application was denied because the court was satisfied with the correctness of the doctrine declared by Hicks v. Michael, supra. We see no reason to question the correctness of the decision in Hicks v. Michael, supra.

The application is denied.

FRESNO CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. et al. v. PEOPLE'S DITCH CO. et al. (S. F. 6933.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 21, 1917.)

1. Waters and Water Courses 🔑78 — Rights of Riparian Owners—as Against Nonriparian Owners.

Riparian proprietors are entitled, as against nonriparian proprietors, to the natural and usual flow of all the waters in the stream, except as such right has been limited or divested by agreement or by prescription.

2. Waters and Water Courses 🔑158(2) — Agreement—Construction.

Plaintiff had a right in a stream to take water at a certain point. It also had rights in the stream as a riparian owner at a lower point. It made an agreement with defendants, nonriparian owners, taking water from a point opposite its lower riparian holdings, as to its upper stream rights, that when there was flowing in the river 1,900 cubic feet of water per second, 599 cubic feet should be allowed to flow down to the defendants, and further that, when over 1,900 cubic feet per second was flowing, there should be allowed to flow down to defendants 300 additional cubic feet and no more. Held, that contract rights of defendants did not extend to more than 899 cubic feet per second, and if the plaintiff, at such upper point, allowed more water to flow down, such contract did not give the defendants the right to appropriate such excess.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑954(3)—Discretion of Lower Court — Preliminary Injunction.

In order to affirm an order granting temporary injunction, it is merely necessary that the appellate court find in the evidence sufficient basis to support the discretion which the trial court exercised.

4. Injunction 🔑158 — Preliminary Injunction—Effect.

The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate rights in controversy, but merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending a trial on the merits, the defendants should or that he should not be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 341.]

5. Waters and Water Courses 🔑85—Diversion of Stream — Temporary Injunction—Discretion.

Grant of temporary injunction to riparian owners, restraining nonriparian proprietors from taking water from a stream beyond a certain amount, held not an abuse of discretion by the trial court.

6. Waters and Water Courses 🔑85—Diversion of Stream — Temporary Injunction—Objections.

The temporary injunction was not open to the objection that it restrained defendants at all times without reference to the stage of the river, and even when water might be going to waste in flood times from diverting more than the specified quantity of water, where the complaint praying the injunction was filed in May and the order issued the following December, since the court's order was merely temporary, and it appeared probable that the defendants had ample opportunity to bring the action to judgment before the spring floods referred to by them, or in any event to apply to the court for a further order.

7. Injunction 🔑147—Temporary Injunction—Opposing Affidavits.

The affidavits in opposition to application for temporary injunction have no effect as an answer to deny, admit, or allege facts, but should state probative facts, and not legal conclusions, and the latter, if contained therein must be disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 320–322.]

8. Waters and Water Courses 🔑48 — Riparian Rights—Loss by Disuse.

Riparian rights are not lost by disuse, provided that no adverse prescriptive rights are acquired.

9. Waters and Water Courses 🔑158½(1)—Contracts—Actions.

In action in one county to quiet title to water rights, except as divested by agreement with defendants embodied in a consent judgment in another county the objection that the effect of the action is to enforce in one county a decree of superior court of another county is without merit.

10. Waters and Water Courses 🔑85—Unlawful Diversion—Injunction.

It is not a defense to application for injunction to prohibit diversion of water that such relief, if granted, would dispossess defendants of water shown by the pleadings to be in their possession; for, although the right to have water flow from a river into a ditch and the water flowing therein is real property, such water is not reduced to possession until actually taken into the ditches by the appropriator, and the wrongful diversion is a continuous act, and the court has authority to restrain a repetition or continuation of the injury.

11. Injunction 🔑135 — Preliminary Injunction—Discretion.

Granting a preliminary injunction is a matter in the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case.

12. Appeal and Error 🔑954(1)—Review—Discretion—Injunction.

The action of a trial court upon an application for injunction will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears there was an abuse of its discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company and another against the People's Ditch Company and others. From an order granting a temporary injunction pendente lite, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. C. Farnsworth, of Visalia, L. L. Cory, of Fresno, and H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for appellants. Short & Sutherland and M. K. Harris, all of Fresno, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. Appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction pendente lite in an action begun in Fresno county, enjoining defendants from appropriating from Kings river at any time water in the aggregate in excess of 900 cubic feet flowing per second. The order was made on notice to show cause and after argument. It was based upon a verified complaint in an action to quiet plaintiffs' title to the said waters, supported by affidavit. Certain counter affidavits were offered by the defendants in opposition to the relief sought.

The complaint sets out the following facts: In the year 1897 the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, one of the plaintiffs, was the owner of a large tract or grant of land commonly known as the Laguna de Tache rancho, containing about 68,000 acres, which extended along the northern borders of the Kings river for a distance of about 25 miles. The rancho is practically all located in Fresno county, and is wholly riparian to the river, which is a natural stream. During 1897, and prior thereto, the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company had also been engaged in the business of appropriating and diverting waters from the Kings river for the purpose of irrigating portions of Fresno county. Its canals connected with the river at a point where it leaves the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains about 30 miles above the eastern and nearest line of the rancho. None of the waters diverted at this point, however, was supplied to the rancho. At the same time the People's Ditch Company, the Last Chance Water Ditch Company, and the Lower Kings River Water Ditch Company, defendants herein, were diverting water through certain other canals owned by themselves from points on the river in Fresno county, and, for the most part, opposite the upper portion of the rancho. The water thus diverted was distributed by the defendants in Kings county for domestic, irrigation, and other purposes. Litigation having arisen between the parties mentioned, on October 4, 1897, they entered into an agreement to compromise their differences, by which it was agreed, in part, to divide the waters of the river among themselves in accordance with a certain scheme set forth therein, and that also "a judgment shall be obtained and entered in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Tulare fixing and determining the rights of the parties to this agreement as to their rights hereunder in reference to the right to the flow, use and diversion of the waters of said Kings river." The decree of the Tulare court was not entered until October 18, 1905. Its provisions are substantially identical with those of the agreement. The Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company is the successor in interest to the Lower Kings River Water Ditch Company. This action is commenced by plaintiffs as owners of the rancho to which riparian rights attach, and also as owners by prescription of a water right for public use, to quiet plaintiffs' title to the waters flowing in the river; the contention being made that the defendants are diverting and appropriating waters greatly in excess of the quantity to which they are entitled.

According to the terms of the agreement, a gauge for the measurement of all waters diverted from the river by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company was established at a point near the intake of its canals, about 30 miles above the rancho. It is provided that, when there is 100 cubic feet or less of water per second flowing in the river, the said company "shall be entitled to divert all thereof." When there is over 100 cubic feet and not exceeding 449 cubic feet flowing per second, the company "shall be entitled to divert" the first 100 cubic feet, "and there shall be allowed to flow down said river for said Lower Ditch Companies" 349 cubic feet per second, or such portion thereof as is then flowing in the river. Other provisions, in like manner, provide for the division of the waters at higher stages of the river, until 1,900 cubic feet of water per second should be flowing therein. The provision which follows reads:

> "When there is flowing in said river 1,900 cubic feet of water per second at the aforesaid point of measurement, 599 cubic feet of water per second, and no more, shall be allowed to flow down said river for said Lower Ditch Companies."

The next paragraph provides that the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company may take a certain larger proportion of the waters in the river during the dry months of August and September of each year. Then follows the provision principally pertinent to the present controversy:

> "Provided also that, when said Kings river shall be carrying, or there shall be flowing therein, over 1,900 cubic feet of water per second, as indicated and ascertained at said point of measurement, * * * of the additional quantity of water in said river, there shall be allowed to flow down for said Lower Ditch Companies to the extent of the next 300 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing in said river, and no more."

One other provision should be mentioned, wherein it is set forth that:

> "Nothing in this agreement shall be taken to waive the right of the Laguna de Tache rancho to the first 30 cubic feet of water flowing per second in said river for use upon said grant."

The plaintiffs allege that for more than 20 years last past the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, on behalf of itself, the Laguna Lands Limited, and the other owners of the rancho, had appropriated 450 cubic feet of the waters of the river flowing per second for irrigation and beneficial uses upon the rancho, and that said appropriation was made under claim of right, openly, notoriously, continuously, and uninterruptedly. In connection with the allegations setting forth the riparian nature of the rancho, it is alleged that:

> There are now growing upon it, "many thousands of acres of trees, vines, alfalfa, grain, vegetables, and other growing crops needing and requiring the waters of Kings river aforesaid for the irrigation thereof, and, unless so irrigated, all of said crops, trees, vines, and alfalfa and other crops would be wholly lost, wither, and die, and become valueless."

Referring to the terms of the agreement made in 1897 and the decree of the superior court of Tulare county, it is alleged that the defendants have never diverted through their respective canals for irrigational or other beneficial uses an aggregate quantity of water in excess of 636½ cubic feet of water flowing per second, and that this quantity of water is ample and sufficient for all the necessary irrigational and other beneficial uses of the lands supplied by their canals, but that, notwithstanding these facts, the defendants have, within three weeks prior to the filing of the complaint, commenced to divert waters not only in excess thereof, but in excess of 900 cubic feet flowing per second, "to wit, aggregating 1,100 cubic feet flowing per second, or upwards." It is also stated that the defendants assert the right and intention of diverting, consuming, and wasting the waters to the full extent of the capacity of their respective canals, which, it is alleged, they claim aggregate 1,300 cubic feet flowing per second. The complaint also sets out the alleged dryness of the season, the inadequacy of the waters in the river to supply defendants' excessive demands without wholly depriving plaintiffs of water which is needed to irrigate the rancho, and contains other allegations common to such form of complaint which need not be particularly mentioned. The agreement itself appears in the affidavit filed by the plaintiffs, while the decree of the Tulare court is given in full in one of the defendants' affidavits.

[1, 2] Assuming that the facts alleged are true, as riparian proprietors, the plaintiffs would be entitled, as against the defendants, to the natural and usual flow of all the waters in the river, except as such right had been limited or divested by the agreement referred to, or by prescription. The defendants, it is to be noted, are not claiming any riparian rights. It has been said that:

> Riparian proprietors "may restrain such a taking [referring to a taking of waters from a natural stream by nonriparian proprietors] without showing damage, upon the broad doctrine of riparian rights, that the taking itself is an interference with his freehold which he is entitled to restrain lest it ripen into a prescriptive right." Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 415, 443, 147 Pac. 578.

The defendants say:

> "All the counter affidavits filed on behalf of the defendants show that it was the understanding of the parties to the agreement that the defendants (the Lower Ditch Companies mentioned in the agreement) have the right to use all the waters of Kings river in excess of 2,200 cubic feet of water flowing per second at the point of measurement. * * * That was the practical construction placed upon the contract by the parties to it. * * *"

The terms of the agreement, however, are not equivocal as the defendants suggest. When there is flowing more than 1,900 cubic feet of water per second, it is definitely provided that, in addition to the quantity of water which "shall be allowed to flow down" at the 1,900 feet stage, namely 599 cubic feet "and no more," an additional quantity to the extent of the next 300 cubic feet flowing per second shall be allowed to flow down, "and no more." Under such conditions there would flow down 899 cubic feet per second. It would be difficult to express in clearer terms the obvious intention of the parties—the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, so far as the parties to the agreement were concerned, "shall be entitled to divert" through their canals at the point of measurement, 30 miles up the river, the remaining waters. Indeed by a further provision the defendants expressly agreed that:

> They "shall not * * * claim, or demand any greater quantity of water than is herein provided for, to be allowed to flow to them."

The defendants claim:

> "There is nothing anywhere in the language of said agreement which would deprive defendants of the right to divert any additional quantity of water from said Kings river over and above the 2,200-foot stage."

But the practical difficulty here is that the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company has first the right of not permitting such additional quantity to flow down to the said defendants. And, on the other hand, if it does allow the excess waters to flow down, it is also to be noted that the agreement contains no word or clause which gives the defendants the right to appropriate them.

But it is insisted that, inasmuch as the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company did actually permit more than 900 cubic feet of water per second to flow past its own canals, such excess waters at least became again a part of the natural stream, and the company has no further control as to who should thereafter divert such waters. If it were important for us to determine this point, we would doubtless agree with the defendants that, regarding the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company purely as a party to the agreement and owner of the upper canals, it would probably have no just cause of complaint on account of such lower diversion. But the company appears as owner of the rancho, riparian property, to which, according to the allegations of the complaint, it is supplying water for irrigational and other beneficial purposes. Such waters do become a part of the natural stream. Yet this point does not help the defendants; for, while passing the rancho, the waters, not included in the agreement as expressly belonging to the defendants, are subject to the riparian rights appurtenant thereto.

[3-5] In matters of this kind it is merely necessary that the appellate court find in the evidence sufficient basis to support the discretion which the trial court exercised.

> "The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate rights in controversy. It merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending a trial on the merits, the defendant should or that he should not be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him." Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391.

If it is reasonable to assume from the record here that the trial court made its order upon the basis suggested, this court cannot say that it abused its discretion. But that the court did so base its order cannot even be left to question. Its order was to restrain defendants "pending the trial of this action, and until the further order of this court, from appropriating, diverting, or taking from the said Kings river described in the complaint on file herein, at any time, water in the aggregate in excess of 900 cubic feet flowing per second. * * *" The defendants, apparently overlooking the riparian rights appurtenant to the rancho, lay stress upon the fact that the plaintiffs set out prescriptive rights to only 450 cubic feet of water, and contend that the court's order should be reversed for the reason that it did not at least allow the defendants to divert, in addition to the first 900 cubic feet of water, all the waters in excess of the next 450 cubic feet belonging to the rancho. The allegations touching the rights by prescription, however, were not essential to the action. It was proper to regard such allegations as only additional evidence of the equities entitling the plaintiffs to the injunctive relief sought.

[6] The defendants also point out that the preliminary injunction "restrains these defendants at all times without reference to the stage of the river, and even at flood times when there may be thousands of cubic feet of water going to waste past their head gates, from diverting more than 900 cubic feet of water," and contends that an injunction of such a nature cannot issue, citing Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86, 94 Pac. 424. As the court's order is merely temporary, the point is not well taken. The complaint praying for the injunction was filed in May, and the order issued the following December. It is altogether likely that the defendants had ample opportunity to bring the action to judgment before the spring floods referred to in their affidavits, or in any event, when such floods were threatening, to apply to the court for a "further order." The court's order is directed wholly to the protection of the rights of the plaintiffs to the waters appurtenant to the rancho, except as the same were limited by the quantity of water which the defendants could take under the agreement, and is in no way concerned with or directed against the appropriation by the defendants of extraordinary flood and storm waters.

[7, 8] It is not necessary to refer to all the matters set up in the affidavits filed by the defendants. The affidavits are six in number, elaborate in detail, and substantially alike in form. What has already been said disposes of most of the averments. The affiants vigorously deny various equities set up in the complaint. But "clearly, the affiant had no power to admit, deny, or allege any fact, and until an answer was filed how could he know what defendant admitted, denied, or alleged?" Marks v. Weinstock, Lubin & Co., 121 Cal. 53, 53 Pac. 362. There was no answer introduced at the hearing in the instant case. It is important to note, however, that the defendants do not deny that the rancho is possessed of riparian rights, as alleged. Many averments refer to the alleged interpretation placed upon the agreement by the parties thereto. They are, in many respects, legal conclusions which are to be disregarded. Porters Bar Dredging Co. v. Beaudry, 15 Cal. App. 751, 115 Pac. 951. The most significant averments are those in which it appears that from 10 to practically 40 years, varying as to the respective defendants, they have been diverting and using water from the Kings river peacefully, notoriously, and under a claim of right to the full capacity of their ditches, aggregating 1,800 cubic feet of water flowing per second, whenever, during the usual irrigation seasons of each year, there was that quantity of water flowing in the river; that the district supplied through their respective irrigation systems consists in the aggregate of about 135,000 acres of improved land devoted to valuable horticultural, agricultural, and viticultural products; that this district supports a "large and prosperous community," embracing Hanford, Lemoore, Armona, and other towns; "that the inhabitants of Kings county are absolutely and entirely dependent upon this source of supply for their water for irrigation, domestic and other purposes;" and that 900 cubic feet flowing per second "is not sufficient under any circumstances" to properly supply and irrigate such lands. The court, having regard to the allegations of the complaint, may not have believed the truth of the averments upon which it is sought to establish such prescriptive rights. Under the circumstances giving rise to the agreement and the other facts alleged in the complaint, which the court may well have believed, it is difficult to conceive how it could have reached any other conclusion. Yet it is more reasonable to assume that, in its opinion, the defendants made their claims to 1,800 cubic feet of water per second under a misunderstanding as to the terms of the agreement, and without any intention on their part of asserting and establishing prescriptive rights therein as against the riparian or other rights appurtenant to the rancho. Without passing upon the merits, it is sufficient to say it was within the discretion of the court to conclude that no prescriptive rights were gained under the showing made. Even if it be assumed, as averred, that the plaintiffs, with full knowledge that the defendants were appropriating more than 900 cubic feet of water per second, did acquiesce therein, it does not follow that the plaintiffs have no right to injunctive relief. Riparian rights are not lost by disuse, provided, of course, no adverse prescriptive rights are acquired. Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 335, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062.

[9] The point is raised that the sole object and effect of this action is to enforce in Fresno county a decree of the superior court of Tulare county, a proceeding which the defendants characterize as "sui generis and unique." This claim is obviously without merit. Rowe v. Blake, 99 Cal. 167, 33 Pac. 864, 37 Am. St. Rep. 45. As regards the further contention that the plaintiffs should have submitted the controversy to arbitration in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the agreement, it is sufficient to note that, irrespective of section 3390 of the Civil Code, the agreement fails to provide that the parties, if they so desire, may not commence an action in the courts without resorting to arbitration. 5 C. J. p. 42.

[10] It is further urged that the court had no authority to dispossess the defendants of water, the title to which was in dispute, where the pleadings show that it was in their possession, citing, inter alia, San Antonio W. Co. v. Bodenhamer, 133 Cal. 248, 251, 65 Pac. 471. Although it may be conceded that the right to have water flow from a river into a ditch, and the water flowing therein is real property (Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 725, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 359), such water is not reduced to possession until actually taken into the ditches by the appropriator. The wrongful diversion of the waters was a continuous act, and the court had authority to restrain a repetition or continuation of the injury being done to the plaintiffs.

[11, 12] The defendants claim throughout that:

> "The court should not have granted the temporary injunction as plaintiffs were not the parties most likely to be injured by the granting or denial thereof."

The answer to this, as well as to many other similar points insisted upon by the defendants, is contained in the well-settled rule that the matter of granting a preliminary injunction is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which is to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case; and its action upon such application will not be disturbed on appeal unless it shall clearly appear that there was an abuse of its discretion. Lagunitas W. Co. v. Marin C. W. Co., 163 Cal. 332, 125 Pac. 351; Marks v. Weinstock, Lubin & Co., 121 Cal. 53, 53 Pac. 362; Porters Bar Dredging Co. v. Beaudry, 15 Cal. App. 751, 115 Pac. 951. This disposes of all the material points, and it is our opinion that the defendants have failed to show, in any particular, that the court abused its discretion in issuing the temporary injunction.

The order is affirmed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚿=236(9)—KEEPING LIQUOR PLACE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

G. H. Coates was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

M. T. Brittan, of Marysville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by information filed in the superior court of Tehama county by the district attorney of said county with the violation of the provisions of section 14 of the local option law, known as the "Wyllie Act," and upon his trial for said offense was convicted by the jury. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The transcript on appeal was filed in this court on the 19th day of August, 1916. The defendant has not, however, filed a brief or points and authorities in support of his appeal, nor was he represented by counsel when his cause was regularly called for oral argument in this court. The Attorney General, therefore, submitted the case upon the record.

Section 14 of the Wyllie Law provides:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person, corporation, * * * within any no-license territory, to keep, conduct or establish, as principal or agent, any place where alcoholic liquors are sold, served or distributed, or kept for the purpose of sale or distribution, except as provided in section 16 hereof; and every day that such place shall be kept, established or conducted shall constitute a separate offense."

The evidence shows that the defendant, at about the hour of 11 o'clock on the night of April 16, 1916, was arrested at his place of residence in the city of Red Bluff, which, it was admitted, is situated within the boundaries of no-license territory; that, when the arrest was made, there were three persons under the influence of intoxicating liquor in the front room of the house; that two of these persons were sitting at a table, with a bottle of beer before them; that in the house were found several cases of beer, a number of bottles of whisky, and an ice chest; that there were also found drinking glasses and a number of empty bottles and beer cases. These facts were brought out through the testimony of four witnesses, who were the officers making the arrest. It further was made to appear that the defendant had occupied the premises for about two weeks prior to his arrest, and that, during that period, different people had been seen, on divers occasions and at various hours of the day, entering and leaving the house. The witnesses further testified that they found some money, amounting to a little more than $2 in silver in a "little pitcher," fixed and attached in some manner to the wall of the room in which the men above referred to were found by the officers.

The defendant did not himself take the witness stand, but introduced some testimony for the purpose of showing that the place or house wherein the liquors were found was his home. The proof of this fact may be conceded.

The evidence is, we think, amply sufficient to preclude this court from declaring that by it the verdict was not justified. Giving the testimony presented by the people full credit, as we are bound to do, since the jury presumptively did so, it is clear that therefrom the jury were justified in finding that, notwithstanding that the place where the liquors were found was, as was the theory of the defense, the home of the defendant, said liquors were not kept and served by the accused "to members of his family or to his guests, as an act of hospitality" (section 6, Wyllie Law), but that he dispensed and served the same for money, and that thus his "home" became "a place of public resort" within the intent of the law. There was no claim made at the trial that the defendant's act or acts came within any of the other exceptions enumerated in section 16 of said law.

The instructions and the rulings of the court touching the evidence have been carefully examined, and in them no errors have been found. The charge of the court with clearness explained to the jury every principle of law pertinent to the issues.

The defendant appears to have been accorded a perfectly fair and impartial trial.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY ⚿92—ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of assault with a deadly weapon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 137–139.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; James G. Estep, Judge.

Andrea Magri was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The conviction complained of here is of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon and was obtained under an information, filed by the district attorney of Shasta county, in the superior court thereof, charging the defendant with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with the intent to kill and murder one P. Della. The appeal is from the judgment and the order disallowing the defendant's motion for a new trial. The clerk's transcript was filed in this court on May 1, 1916, and that of the court reporter, prepared in accordance with sections 1247 and 1247a of the Penal Code, was likewise filed on June 7, 1916.

The defendant has filed no brief or points and authorities, and was not represented by counsel when the cause regularly came on and was called up for hearing and oral argument before this court. Under these circumstances there was open to the Attorney General either one of two courses only, viz.: (1) To move, upon notice, for a dismissal of the appeals; (2) the submission of the cause for decision upon the record. The latter course was adopted by the Attorney General, hence an examination of the record is required.

The assault charged occurred at a place called Motion, in Shasta county, on the 16th day of December, 1915. There is testimony disclosed by the record which, if believed by the jury, as from their verdict it must be assumed that it was, warranted the finding of these facts: That the prosecuting witness, one P. Della, had been working in a mine located a short distance from Motion; that he ceased working in said mine on the 14th day of December, 1915, received from the company owning the mine a check for the sum of $25 in the payment for wages due him, and, on the 15th day of December, 1915, accompanied by a mine laborer named O'Hara, left Coram, to which place he went from the mine on the day he quit work, started to go by foot to Iron Mountain, in said county; that, on their way to Iron Mountain, the two men stopped at Motion, where the defendant was then engaged as a bartender in a saloon; that the defendant and his wife lived in the building in which said saloon business was carried on; that Della and O'Hara had a number of drinks at the saloon, being waited on by the accused, and also were served with a lunch by the defendant; that, shortly after eating the lunch, O'Hara proceeded on his journey, while Della, who is an Italian, remained at the saloon; that the defendant, also an Italian, and Della thereafter had several drinks and conversed about the "old country"; that Della asked Magri to cash his check for $25, saying that he would then pay for the drinks and lunch with which he had been served; that, at about this time, Della made some reference to the defendant's brother, with whom Della claimed some acquaintance, and that thereupon the defendant became very angry and ordered Della to leave the saloon; that Della then turned toward the front door through which exit from the saloon was necessary, his back being toward the bar and the defendant; that the latter thereupon fired at Della with a shotgun, the shots entering the upper part of Della's body and inflicting two wounds, to wit, one just at the edge of the shoulder blade, and the other at the upper edge of the collar bone, both wounds being round or in circular form and one measuring 1¾ inches in diameter; that immediately after being shot Della left the saloon and was finally taken on a train to Redding, thence to the county hospital, where he remained and was treated for several weeks. Thus it is manifest that no claim could well be urged in this court that the verdict does not receive sufficient support from the evidence.

The court's charge to the jury has been examined with care, and such examination has convinced us that it was full, fair, and faultless in the statement of all the principles of law essential to an enlightened consideration by the jury of the evidence and all the issues of fact developed thereby.

Nor have we in our examination of the record (which has been just as thorough as if the case had been briefed or otherwise argued in behalf of the accused) found justification for declaring that any of the rulings of the court admitting and excluding testimony involved substantial or prejudicial error. On the whole, the defendant seems to have been accorded a fair and impartial trial, and, we may add, was, under the evidence as it appears to us, exceedingly fortunate in securing a verdict adjudging him guilty of an offense of less gravity and carrying with it a penalty of much less severity than that of the crime specifically charged in the information.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

3. CARRIERS ⚷333(1)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE IN ALIGHTING FROM STREET CAR.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by R. G. Harrell against the Fresno Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing and Short & Sutherland, all of Fresno (Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellant. Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,500 and costs of suit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he was a passenger for hire upon one of the cars of the defendant operated along and upon the streets of Fresno; that when the car had proceeded along its route to a certain street it stopped to enable the plaintiff and other passengers to alight therefrom; that while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting from said car, and while partly thereon, having his left foot upon the ground and his right foot upon the running board, and while still holding on to the upright stanchion with his right hand, the employés of the defendant in charge of the car negligently caused the said car to be suddenly and violently started forward, causing the plaintiff to be thrown to the ground, breaking his left leg and causing other injuries and damages as detailed in the complaint.

The answer of the defendant admitted that the plaintiff had been a passenger upon its said car, but denied that the car had been started until after the defendant had fully alighted and separated himself from the car. The answer also undertook to set up that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence, which was specifically alleged to have consisted in the plaintiff having fallen and injured himself by his own act after he had fully alighted from the car and ceased to be a passenger thereon.

Upon the issues as thus defined the cause went to trial, which resulted in the judgment in plaintiff's favor, from which this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment; but in view of the fact, as shown by the record, that the plaintiff testified circumstantially to the manner in which his injuries had occurred, and in which they were caused by the negligence of the defendant's employés in starting the car while he was in the act of alighting from it as set forth in his complaint—in which testimony he was supported in some degree by the testimony of another witness and by certain other circumstances in the case—it cannot be said that the verdict would not be sufficiently supported by such evidence if the jury saw fit to give greater credence to it than to that of the greater number of the defendant's witnesses. There is no merit therefore in the plaintiff's first contention.

[2] The appellant further contends that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury relating to the subject of contributory negligence. Passing for the moment the question of the alleged defects in these instructions, we have failed to find anything in the record which would require the giving of any instructions whatever upon the subject of contributory negligence. It is true that the defendant in its answer undertook to plead that the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence; but in so doing it had set forth specifically wherein such alleged contributory negligence consisted, viz. that the plaintiff had fallen and injured himself by his own act and after his contact with the car had ceased and his relations to the defendant as a passenger upon said car had been fully terminated. It is clear that these alleged acts of the plaintiff could not by any possibility be contributory negligence for the simple reason that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is in its very essence predicated upon conceded negligence on the defendant's part while the plaintiff's relation to it as a passenger, and its resulting duty to him as such, were still existent. The plea of contributory negligence is, in other words, a plea of confession and avoidance, and hence could not arise under the circumstances set forth in the defendant's answer. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714.

[3] The appellant, however, insists that the plaintiff himself introduced the element of contributory negligence into the case by his testimony detailing his manner of alighting from the car. The plaintiff in that respect testified that in getting off the car he placed his left foot first upon the ground and had his right foot upon the running board of the car, with his right hand holding its stanchion, at the time the car started. He was thus facing backward instead of forward while in the act of alighting. But the undisputed evidence both of the plaintiff and of the witnesses for the defendant was that he was otherwise using great care in getting off the car, which the plaintiff swore was due to the fact that his left leg long years before had been injured during the Civil War, and was therefore shorter and weaker than the right leg. which cause him customarily to put his left leg down first in getting off cars, and hence to face backwards in alighting.

We fail to perceive how the manner of the plaintiff in alighting from the car would constitute contributory negligence on his part. It was the duty of the defendant to hold its car in a standing position until he had fully alighted from it, and the plaintiff in getting off the car had a right to rely upon the full performance of that duty on the defendant's part; and this being so, his act in getting off the car in the manner in which he did, due to his crippled physical condition, could not be contributory negligence on his part. We are still therefore in the position of being unable to perceive how the subject of contributory negligence could be an issue in the case so as to require the giving of any instructions upon that subject.

In spite of this condition of the case, however, both of the parties submitted instructions to the court upon the subject of contributory negligence, and the court gave the instructions asked by both of the parties to the case. We have examined the entire body of the instructions thus given to the jury, and are of the opinion that taken as a whole they fairly set forth the law of contributory negligence; and we are also of the opinion that even if they did not quite fully and fairly do so the defendant was not prejudicially affected by that fact in view of what has heretofore been said as to the absence of such an issue in the case.

There being no other error complained of, the judgment is affirmed.

2. HABEAS CORPUS 🔑25(1)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—IMPRISONMENT FOR CONTEMPT—ATTEMPT TO COMPLY WITH COURT'S ORDER.

Where a father had been committed for contempt in refusing to deliver to his divorced wife the child whose custody was awarded to the wife until he should comply with the court's order, showed that the child was in a foreign country with his sister, and that he had sent money for her transportation and requested that she be sent back, it appears that he can no longer comply with the order of the court, and he is entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus under Pen. Code, § 1487, authorizing the discharge where the imprisonment was at first lawful, but by some act, omission, or event since, the party has become entitled to discharge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 28, 30.]

Application by John E. Saul for a writ of habeas corpus to procure his discharge from custody under an order committing him for contempt of court. Petition granted, and petitioner discharged from custody.

Arthur E. T. Chapman, of Los Angeles, Precilla L. Randolph, and William Lewis, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. H. G. Redwine, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Petitioner is a defendant in a divorce action brought by his wife. There were several children of the marriage, among them a girl Dinah Saul, aged 13 years. The superior court, after making an order giving the custody of Dinah Saul to the mother, took proceedings in contempt against the petitioner because of his alleged act in refusing to deliver the custody of the said Dinah Saul to the mother as ordered. In the contempt proceeding it was determined that this petitioner had then the ability to produce Dinah

Saul, but that he willfully refused so to do, and the judgment was that he be imprisoned by the sheriff until he should comply with the order of the court. Petitioner was so imprisoned and has remained in jail for a period of about six months, having made various applications for his discharge heretofore by habeas corpus. As appears from the petition filed herein, he lately made an application to the superior court to be discharged on the ground that he had not now the ability to obey the order, and upon the denial of that petition he came here under a like showing, upon which we issued the writ. At the hearing hereof petitioner offered in evidence letters and cablegrams which showed that Dinah Saul was in England, and that there had been sent to her on petitioner's behalf money with which to pay for her return passage, together with urgent requests that she come back to Los Angeles. Petitioner orally testified that before the order committing him for contempt was made, the minor with his knowledge had left the state and country and had gone to Southport, England, to live with petitioner's sister.

[1] It is questionable as to whether, if the superior court was furnished with the evidence that the child was, at the time the commitment was made, out of the country and in England, it would have had authority to make the order which was made, because it would then have been clear that the then present ability of Saul to produce the child was lacking. The court might well have punished the petitioner for contempt of its order in procuring the child to be sent out of the country, but no judgment of that kind is here involved. A continuing order of imprisonment in a contempt proceeding, conditional upon a compliance being made with the direction of the court, can only be lawfully entered where it appears that it is within the power of the party to obey the court's mandate, and that he willfully refuses so to do. Ex parte Overend, 122 Cal. 201, 54 Pac. 740.

[2] Passing the question, however, as to whether the original commitment was made in a proper case (and conceding that it was), it now appears that the petitioner has made every reasonable effort to comply with the order of court, and that his failure to now produce the child is due to conditions which he cannot control. It places the case directly within the provisions of section 1487 of the Penal Code as entitling the petitioner to discharge, where "the imprisonment was at first lawful, yet by some act, omission, or event which has taken place afterwards, the party has become entitled to a discharge." If the petitioner were required to continue in custody of the sheriff there appears no means within his reach by which he can furnish evidence of any condition which will satisfy the judgment of the superior court. There is no doubt at all of the power of the superior court to punish for contempt in such cases and to enforce its judgments, but it cannot cause the imprisonment of a person indefinitely where he has not the ability to make compliance with an order of court, however reprehensible may have been his conduct in the first instance in creating the very condition which renders such compliance impossible.

It is ordered that the prayer of the petition be granted, and that petitioner be discharged from the custody of the sheriff. This order is made without prejudice to the right of the superior court to further deal with the matter of the custody of Dinah Saul, or enforce by contempt proceedings any orders properly made in that relation.

1. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑34—SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION.

Information charging defendant with obtaining property by false pretenses by inducing the signing of a note, but not alleging note to have ever been delivered to payee, failed to charge any offense.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION 🔑161(5)—AMENDMENT OF INFORMATION—OBTAINING PROPERTY BY FALSE PRETENSES.

Where information charging defendant with obtaining money by false pretenses by inducing the signing of a note, but not alleging note to have been delivered to payee, amendment alleging that defendant delivered it to payee, to bring it within definition of the crime under Pen. Code, § 532, and of personal property by section 7, subd. 12, was permissible, and did not charge a different offense, it being founded upon the same preliminary examination.

The good character of an accused person is presumed, and cannot be contradicted, unless the defendant first puts it in issue, but this does not apply where defendant offers himself as a witness; Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, then making him subject to the same rules as other witnesses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Herman H. Rippe was convicted of obtaining property by false pretenses, and appeals from judgment and from order denying new trial. Affirmed.

D. T. Winne, J. O. Traber, and A. Ellenburg, all of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. [1] The information originally filed against the defendant in this case attempted to charge him with the crime of felony, viz., obtaining money by false pretenses. The charging part of the information in substance alleged that the defendant willfully and knowingly by certain false and fraudulent representations induced certain parties to sign a promissory note, payable to the Farmers' National Bank of Fresno, in the sum of $250, and that they were thereby "defrauded, damaged, and prejudiced." It will be noted that the information did not allege nor attempt to allege that the note in question had ever been delivered to the payee. No demurrer, however, was interposed to the information, and upon his arraignment the defendant pleaded "not guilty." When the case came on for trial and before the impanelment of the jury the district attorney called the attention of the trial court to the fact that the information failed to allege that the defendant had actually obtained possession of the note which was the subject-matter of the alleged false pretenses, and thereupon asked leave to file an amended information, which would cure the obvious defect in the original information, by an additional allegation to the effect that the note in question when signed was delivered to the defendant, and by him in turn delivered to the payee therein named. The application to thus amend was resisted upon the ground that the proposed amendment would operate to charge the defendant with an offense different from that charged in the original information and not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and therefore in contravention of the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code. Upon the overruling of this objection the amended information was filed, and upon his arraignment the defendant again pleaded "not guilty," with the privilege of later withdrawing his plea and interposing a demurrer if his counsel deemed such a course advisable. The case was then continued for trial to a day and date satisfactory to counsel for the defendant, and ultimately came to trial with no demurrer interposed, and the plea of "not guilty" still standing. Upon his trial the defendant was convicted, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

That the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment and verdict is not disputed, and the only points urged for a reversal are that the court erred in permitting the amended information to be filed and in refusing a certain requested instruction.

[2] While the information as originally filed did not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense known to the law (People v. Cassou, 27 Cal. App. 23, 148 Pac. 810), nevertheless it did attempt to charge the crime of "obtaining property by false pretenses," and the amended information did no more than show by a proper allegation that the note which was the subject-matter of the false pretenses had become "property" within the meaning of section 532 of the Penal Code, which defines the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses (People v. Cassou, supra; Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 12). Obviously, therefore, the amended information did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be charged in the original information, which was admittedly founded upon the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and consequently the filing of the amended information neither prejudiced the defendant nor contravened the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code.

[4] The requested instruction which was refused by the trial court was, in so far as it correctly stated the law, covered by the charge of the court, and conceding that the defendant was entitled upon request to an instruction upon the subject-matter not covered by the charge of the court, nevertheless it was conceded upon the oral argument of the case that the requested instruction which attempted to cover that particular subject-matter was so ambiguous as to render it a defective statement of the law and meaningless. This being so, it was rightfully refused. People v. Carroll, 92 Cal. 568, 28 Pac. 600.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TUGWELL. (Cr. 496.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1186(4) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR.

The action of a juror in a prosecution for murder in visiting, after the court had refused to make an order permitting a view of the premises by the jury, the scene of the crime, the condition of which had so changed between the commission of the crime and the trial that no information substantiating or contradicting the witnesses for the people could then be gained, while an irregularity deserving of severe censure, does not, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal for errors from which the court is convinced no miscarriage of justice resulted, require a reversal of the conviction for manslaughter.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑635 — PUBLIC TRIAL — ORDER TO CLEAR COURTROOM—DISTURBANCE.

Where the court, because of a disturbance among the spectators which interfered with the orderly conduct of a trial for murder, ordered the gallery to be cleared, which was done, leaving about 15 spectators in the courtroom, and thereafter the door from the main hall to the courtroom was locked and kept locked until after a noon recess, but another door was left open, through which persons could and did go and come, the accused was not deprived of his right to a public trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑635—CONDUCT OF TRIAL —REMOVING SPECTATORS.

The right of accused to a public trial does not prevent the court from removing spectators who create a disturbance which interferes with the orderly conduct of the trial.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑660—RIGHT TO PUBLIC TRIAL—WAIVER.

The right of accused to a public trial is one for his benefit which he can waive, and which he does waive where his counsel, knowing that the door to the courtroom had been locked after the removal of spectators who had created a disturbance, made no objection thereto.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑517(4) — CONFESSION — PROOF OF CORPUS DELICTI — DEGREE OF PROOF.

The rule that the corpus delicti must be established before the alleged confession of accused is admissible in evidence does not require such proof to be of the convincing character necessary to support a conviction.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑517(4)—CONFESSIONS—FOUNDATION — SUFFICIENCY — EVIDENCE OF SUICIDE.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence aside from confessions of accused held sufficient to show that deceased did not commit suicide so as to establish the corpus delicti and render the confessions admissible.

7. HOMICIDE 🔑309(5) — INSTRUCTION—MANSLAUGHTER—MURDER BY POISON.

Where the only evidence as to defendant's guilt showed homicide by poison for the purpose of robbery, which is defined by Pen. Code, § 189, as murder in the first degree, it was error to instruct the jury on manslaughter, though that crime is by Pen. Code, § 1159, included in the crime of murder.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1186(4)—HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS — "MURDER" — "MANSLAUGHTER"—LOWER DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

Where the only evidence tending to show defendant's guilt of homicide showed murder in the first degree, error in instructing the jury as to manslaughter, of which offense he was convicted, is favorable, not prejudicial, to accused, in view of Pen. Code, § 187, defining "murder" as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought and section 192, defining "manslaughter" as the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, since the jury, to convict of manslaughter, must have found that accused unlawfully killed deceased, and therefore it must be assumed they would have convicted of murder, if no instructions as to manslaughter had been given, and the giving of such instructions does not require the reversal of the conviction under Pen. Code, § 1404, providing that a verdict shall not be set aside and a new trial granted on the motion of the defendant except for some omission or error prejudicial to his substantial rights, especially since the conviction for manslaughter would bar a subsequent prosecution for murder so that accused would escape punishment altogether.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Percy Tugwell was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers, H. L. Giesler, and Frank E. Dominguez, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and W. C. Doran and Ewald Selph, Deputies Dist. Atty., all of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Upon a charge of committing the crime of murder, in that he did willfully, unlawfully, and with malice aforethought kill one Maude Kennedy, defendant was convicted of manslaughter. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

There was a former trial of the case which resulted in defendant being convicted of murder in the first degree, following which sentence of imprisonment for life was pronounced upon him. On appeal that judgment was reversed. 152 Pac. 740. As presented by the record herein, the facts concerning the homicide and the circumstances pointing to defendant as the one who committed the crime are substantially the same as exhibited by the record on the former appeal, wherein a full and complete statement of the case is set forth in the opinion there filed. See People v. Tugwell, 28 Cal. App. 348, 152 Pac. 740. Referring to that opinion for a statement of the case, we shall here, in discussing the errors assigned, confine ourselves to such reference to the evidence as may be necessary to illustrate the points made by appellant.

The theory of the prosecution, and which the evidence tended to prove, was that defendant was in need of money to enable him to marry and accompany his bride to San Francisco; that to obtain the needed funds he planned to rob Mrs. Kennedy, a woman twice his age, of diamonds of which he knew she was possessed; that for the purpose of using it in the perpetration of the crime he procured from a clothes-cleaning establishment, where he had been employed, a bottle of chloroform of the kind there used; that by a request made by telephone he induced his intended victim to go to the lonely place appointed therefor, where he met and murdered her by forcing chloroform into her mouth, and took the diamonds which she had in a chamois bag fastened around her neck.

[1] One of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was based was misconduct of the jury. It appears from affidavits filed that after the court had refused to make an order permitting the jury to visit and view the premises, where the homicide occurred at about 9 o'clock on the evening of August 31, 1914, a juror during the trial, on March 31, 1916, in the daytime, visited and viewed the place and surroundings. That the visit of this juror was an irregularity constituting serious misconduct and deserving of severe censure admits of no question. People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 332, 34 Pac. 698; People v. White, 20 Cal. App. 159, 128 Pac. 417. But misconduct of a juror per se will not justify the granting of a defendant's motion for a new trial. People v. Hope, 62 Cal. 291; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842. Prejudice to his substantial rights must be shown to have resulted from such act of misconduct. People v. Yee King, 24 Cal. App. 511, 141 Pac. 1047. The scene of the alleged crime and place where the body of Maude Kennedy was found on the morning of September 1st was at or near an alleyway surrounding which at the time were vacant and unimproved lots and lands. Two witnesses testified that at about 9 o'clock on the evening of August 31, 1914, while passing near this point, at or near which there was an electric light burning, their attention was attracted to a man and woman who at the place in question appeared to be engaged in a struggle. Neither of these witnesses pretended to identify defendant as the man whom they saw. It appears from the affidavits filed that the juror visited the place in midday some 18 months after the date of the alleged murder, at which time the vacant lots in the vicinity had been improved by the erection of buildings thereon, thus changing the condition and aspect of the location. Hence it is claimed that the juror in visiting the scene could not obtain an adequate or correct impression of the conditions existing under which the witnesses for the people testified. This doubtless is true, and suggests the reason why the court refused to make an order allowing the jury to visit the premises. Since by reason of the changed conditions the juror could obtain nothing in the way of impressions calculated to corroborate the evidence of the witnesses in question, how could defendant be injured by the unwarranted visit? It is inconceivable upon the record presented that defendant could have been prejudiced in his substantial rights by the misconduct of the juror. A consideration of the entire cause, including the evidence, convinces us that no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom, without which, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial upon this ground should not be reversed.

[2] It is next claimed that the defendant was, by an order of court, deprived of his constitutional right to a public trial. In support of this contention, affidavits were filed which, notwithstanding some conflict therein, tended to prove that during the trial, while the evidence was being introduced, there was a disturbance and disorder among the spectators sitting in the body of the courtroom; that about 11:30 a. m. the court ordered the bailiff to "clear the galleries"; that thereupon the bailiff caused the persons sitting in that part of the courtroom reserved for spectators (the number of whom is not shown) to leave the room and, without any order so to do made by the court, locked the main door thereto, which door remained locked until the noon recess, which occurred about 12:10 p. m., and thus during said period prevented egress and ingress through the same; that during that time a number of persons—at least 15, as shown by one of the affidavits—other than those connected with the trial remained in the room, and while persons who sought entrance through the main door of the courtroom found it locked, some of these, and indeed all who sought the same, entered through the witness room, the doors of which, unlocked, afforded an entrance from the main hall to the courtroom. According to the affidavit of one of defendant's counsel, he, during the period of 45 minutes while the door was locked, went from the courtroom through the reporter's room into the main hall some three or four times, at all of which times he examined and found the main entrance door to the courtroom locked, and that on each of these visits he saw persons come to the door of the courtroom, who, upon finding it locked, went away. Nevertheless, counsel, whose duty it was to see that defendant was accorded his constitutional rights, and knowing that the door was not locked by order of the court, not only failed and neglected to call the court's attention thereto, but on behalf of his client made no objection to the closing of the door; on the contrary, as shown by his affidavit, he was unusually alert and active in his efforts to see that it was continuously closed until the noon recess.

[3] As stated, there is some conflict in the affidavits as to the number of persons remaining in the courtroom; nor is it made to appear how many were required to leave the room. It does appear, however, that their removal was due to a disturbance and disorder among the spectators, and if, as we must assume to be the case, such disturbance interfered with the orderly conduct of the trial, no question exists as to the right of the court to order them excluded from the room. People v. Kerrigan, 73 Cal. 222, 14 Pac. 849; People v. Swafford, 65 Cal. 223, 3 Pac. 809; State v. Nyhus, 19 N. D. 326, 124 N. W. 71, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 487; Grimmett v. State, 22 Tex. App. 36, 2 S. W. 631, 58 Am. Rep. 630. Further, it appears without conflict that persons other than those connected with the court and engaged in the trial remained in the courtroom, which, according to the affidavit of the bailiff, were as many as 15. There was no discrimination as to the presence of those so permitted to remain. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the trial as conducted did not lose its character in the sense that it was public, as distinguished from a secret or star-chamber trial.

[4] However this may be, and conceding that the action of the bailiff in locking the door, whether or not with the knowledge of the court, was, as shown by the record, wholly unwarranted, appellant is in no position to complain of the bailiff's action. The Constitution, both federal and state, provides that a party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial. This requirement, says Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, "is for the benefit of the accused; that the public may see he is fairly dealt with and not unjustly condemned, and that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triers keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility and to the importance of their functions; and the requirement is fairly observed if, without partiality or favoritism, a reasonable proportion of the public is suffered to attend, notwithstanding that those persons whose presence could be of no service to the accused, and who would only be drawn thither by a prurient curiosity, are excluded altogether." This right so accorded by the Constitution, like the right to a speedy trial, being for the benefit of the defendant, may be waived by him. "It is a well settled maxim that a party may waive the benefit of any condition or provision made in his behalf, no matter in what manner it may have been made or secured." Broom's Legal Maxims, 547; Knarston v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 57, 73 Pac. 740. As said in Goit v. National Pro. Ins. Co., 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 191, "The law will not compel a man to insist upon any benefit or advantage secured to him individually," whether such benefit be constitutional or statutory. Like the record in the case of People v. Swafford, supra, that here presented is silent in showing whether or not defendant in express terms consented to the closing of the door. From aught that appears to the contrary, he may have done so. At all events, he did not, as did defendant in the case of People v. Hartman, 103 Cal. 242, 37 Pac. 153, 42 Am. St. Rep. 108, upon which appellant relies, enter any objection to the action of the bailiff, nor call the attention of the court thereto, until during the noon recess, after which there appears to have been no cause for complaint. Under these circumstances, we are constrained to hold, even if the conduct of the trial was lacking in the character of being public in the ordinary sense, that defendant must by his conduct as shown be deemed to have assented thereto and waived any objection on account thereof. There is nothing said in People v. Letoile, 159 Pac. 1057, which lends support to appellant's contention as based upon this record.

[6] In the case at bar, the death of Mrs. Kennedy, together with prima facie proof that her death was due to violence at the hands of some other person—in other words, that it was not due to suicide, accident, or natural causes—was a necessary prerequisite to the admission of defendant's confession that he had killed her. Excluding all proof as to motive and the statements made by defendant, the evidence clearly tends to show that Mrs. Kennedy, in response to a message by telephone, left her home soon after 8 o'clock on the evening of August 31st; that on the morning of September 1st her dead body was found in the alleyway hereinbefore referred to. She was lying on her back, her clothing dusty and disarranged, her waist open in front, and a chamois bag, in which she was accustomed to carry her diamonds, was found open in the bosom of her dress. One shoe and one glove were off, both of which were found some distance from the body; and some beads, a hatpin, and a cork were found scattered upon the ground in the vicinity where her body was found. The condition of the ground and her clothing indicated that the body had been dragged for some distance. That a short time prior to August 31st defendant had procured from a boy employed at the dyeworks where defendant had formerly worked a bottle of commercial chloroform; that the cause of the death was due to a corrosive, volatile poison forced into the mouth, the irritating effect of which caused strangling and inflammation of the epiglottis, larynx, and trachea; and that commercial chloroform would cause the condition found. It further appeared that at about 8:45 o'clock on the evening of August 31st, one Doris Widemeyer, passing in the vicinity where the body was found, saw two figures in the vacant lot adjoining said alley, one of which appeared to be bending over the other, and heard groans; that another witness at about 9:30 p. m., in passing the vicinity where the body was found, saw a man and a woman struggling, and heard a mumbling and gurgling sound, and saw a man drag some object down the alley; that they appeared to be engaged in an altercation. In our opinion, the foregoing, leaving out of consideration other circumstances of a probative character, constitutes substantial evidence tending to prove that the death of Mrs. Kennedy was not due to suicide, accident, or natural causes, and hence was the result of criminal violence.

[7] The crime with which the defendant was charged was that of murder. The court instructed the jury touching the question of manslaughter, and submitted, with other forms of verdict, one adopted by the jury based upon such instruction, to which no objection was interposed. While admitting that manslaughter, though defined as a separate and distinct offense by section 192 of the Penal Code, may be included in the crime of murder (section 1159, Pen. Code) as to which, where there is any substantial evidence tending to show the commission of such crime, instructions thereon should be given, and that upon a charge of murder a conviction of manslaughter is deemed an acquittal of the higher offense (People v. Gordon, 99 Cal. 227, 33 Pac. 901; People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128) counsel for appellant insist that upon the evidence adduced in the case at bar, since it tends only to prove that defendant committed the crime by means of poison for the purpose of robbery, which is defined in section 189 of the Penal Code as murder in the first degree, the instructions should properly have been limited to such degree of the crime. In support of their contention they cite, among other cases, that of People v. Wright, 167 Cal. 1, 138 Pac. 349, where the question involved death resulting from the performance of an unlawful abortion, the court saying:

> "Under our law, where death results from the performance of an unlawful abortion, the crime is murder in the second degree. Pen. Code, sec. 189. So if a defendant thus charged rests simply upon a denial of the offense, and no evidence of a lesser offense is before the court and jury, the instructions should go simply to murder in the second degree, and the verdict should be either guilty as charged or not guilty."

And People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 482, 126 Pac. 143, and that of People v. McNutt, 93 Cal. 659, 29 Pac. 243, in the last of which it is said that section 1159 of the Penal Code "contemplates the conviction of a defendant for the lesser offense, when the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction for the greater offense charged." Upon these and other authorities cited by appellant, we are of opinion that the court erred in giving to the jury the instruction complained of; indeed, it may be conceded that had the court refused at the request of defendant to give an instruction touching the question of manslaughter, the ruling upon review of the record would have been sustained. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 470; People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 555, 11 Pac. 183, and People v. Rogers, supra.

[8] The error in giving the instruction, however, does not entitle defendant to a reversal of the order appealed from, for the reason that section 1404 of the Penal Code provides that a verdict shall not be set aside and a new trial granted on the motion of a defendant, except for some omission or error prejudicial to his substantial rights. Murder is defined as "the unlawful killing of a human being, with malice aforethought" (section 187, Pen. Code); while "manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice" (section 192, Pen. Code). The unlawful killing, while the sole essential element of manslaughter, is an essential element of murder, to which, however, to constitute the latter crime, must be added that of malice aforethought. The greater offense, that of murder, includes all of the elements of the lesser, namely, that of manslaughter. The sufficiency of the evidence to prove that defendant unlawfully killed deceased is not and cannot be questioned. This being true, and conceding, as claimed by appellant, that if defendant was guilty of the unlawful killing, such act was by the evidence conclusively shown to have been accompanied by malice aforethought, thus making it murder in the first degree, how can it be said that he was prejudiced because the jury, due to the erroneous instruction, did not, as it should have done, find him guilty of the greater offense? Counsel for appellant say the jury might have disagreed, but we cannot indulge in such presumption. On the contrary, since the jury found that defendant unlawfully killed Maude Kennedy, the presumption is that, had the instruction complained of not been given, the jury would have found him guilty of murder. Therefore, conceding the effect of the erroneous instruction was to cause the jury to bring in a verdict for a lesser offense, nevertheless defendant is in no position to complain, since he is not prejudiced by reason thereof. It has been repeatedly held in this state that a defendant cannot complain where the determination of his case is more favorable to him than the evidence warrants. People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128. Appellant insists, however, that this doctrine is based upon cases where the charge was that of burglary, and the evidence conclusively established burglary in the first degree, notwithstanding which the verdict of the jury was that defendant was guilty of burglary in the second degree. People v. Barnhart, 59 Cal. 381; People v. Maroney, 109 Cal. 277, 41 Pac. 1097; People v. Coulter, 145 Cal. 66, 78 Pac. 348; People v. Lowen, 109 Cal. 381, 42 Pac. 32. And he undertakes to distinguish these cases from the one at bar by directing our attention to the fact that the attack made in such cases was upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, while here the complaint is based upon an erroneous instruction which brought about the verdict. We are unable to perceive any difference in the effect of the error, whether the unwarranted verdict be due to a want of proper consideration of the evidence by the jury under an instruction, or such lack of consideration without the instruction. The absence of prejudicial effect as to defendant is the same in either case, and if in the one case, as conceded by appellant, the court will not, upon a review of the evidence, set aside a too favorable verdict because defendant is not injured, it must likewise follow, in applying the same principle and for the same reason, the court will not set aside the verdict upon complaint that it followed as a result of an erroneous instruction more favorable to defendant than that to which he was entitled.

In People v. Muhlner, supra, a number of cases from other jurisdictions, together with text-books, are cited in support of the proposition that:

> "A verdict contrary to instructions—for a less degree of the offense than the evidence proves must be received and carried out. A new trial cannot be ordered. * * * A conviction of a lesser offense (necessarily involved in the indictment) than called for by the evidence is not cause for granting a new trial, or for reversal on appeal."

As in the case of People v. Huntington, 8 Cal. App. 614, 97 Pac. 760, counsel for defendant do not claim that the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict of murder, but they in effect insist that the evidence shows the crime to have been murder, as to which charge he has been acquitted. Giving full force and weight to the contention of counsel, it must follow, from a reversal of the case upon the ground that the error brought about the conviction of defendant for manslaughter, that upon a new trial he could not be convicted of murder (People v. Muhlner, supra), and hence might, with advantage to himself, aid the prosecution in establishing the commission by him of a most heinous murder, which would exclude any theory upon which a verdict of manslaughter could be based, and thus, since he could not be convicted of the greater crime, insist upon a verdict of not guilty. As said in the Huntington Case:

> "We do not think it incumbent on the court to give such narrow, technical interpretation as to the true meaning of the statute. If the killing was unlawful, with malice aforethought, it was murder, and it was also manslaughter, because, by the very definition of the statute, it was the unlawful killing of a human being."

Since the jury might very properly, upon the evidence adduced, have found defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, the error redounded to his advantage, rather than to his prejudice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re WELLS. (Cr. 2030.)

1. Courts 🔑212 — Constitutional Provisions—Transfer of "Cause."

Const. art. 6, § 2, giving Supreme Court in bank power to rehear any "cause" decided in department, has always been understood as applying to any matter regardless of its character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 511, 513–515.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cause.]

2. Courts 🔑485 — Constitutional Provisions — Transfer of "Cause" — Construction.

Const. art. 6, § 4, amended in 1904, authorizing Supreme Court to transfer any "cause" to or from the District Court of Appeal, must be construed in same manner as Const. 1879, giving power to rehear department "causes"; hence the word "cause" applies to all matters of whatever nature.

3. Courts 🔑485—Revocation of Admission to Practice — Jurisdiction — Transfer of "Cause."

A decision by the District Court of Appeal upon application to revoke admission of attorney to practice, on account of fraud, is a transferable "cause" under Const. art. 6, § 4, amended in 1904, giving Supreme Court power to transfer any "cause" to or from District Court of Appeal.

4. Attorney and Client 🔑4—Admission to Practice—Qualifications.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 848), providing disbarment for "any act involving moral turpitude," etc., whether or not connected with legal practice, an attorney's application for admission to practice may be rejected for want of good moral character, although not sufficient for disbarment.

5. Attorney and Client 🔑10—Admission to Practice—Burden of Proof.

The requirement that an attorney applying for admission on certificate from another state, shall produce "satisfactory evidence of good moral character" places the burden on him of proving this.

6. Attorney and Client 🔑53(1) — Disbarment Proceedings—Burden of Proof.

In disbarment proceedings the burden is on the accuser to prove the moral turpitude necessary under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 848).

7. Attorney and Client 🔑10—Admission to Practice—Evidence.

Upon an attorney's application to practice on certificate from another state, his general character as well as particular acts may be inquired into, and any evidence may be received showing his character for integrity and general morality.

8. Attorney and Client 🔑10 — Admission to Practice—Subsequent Inquiry.

Where attorney was admitted to practice on certificate and later inquiry suggested fraud in concealing his character, an investigation thereof is not a disbarment proceeding, but subject to the same broad inquiry into character as his original application, and is not limited to acts occurring since passage of the 1911 amendment (St. 1911, p. 848) of Code Civ. Proc. § 287, allowing disbarment for any moral turpitude, such rule not existing theretofore.

9. Attorney and Client 🔑4—Admission to Practice—"Good Moral Character."

An attorney who obtained a loan by concealing material facts, and who, in assisting another attorney before admission, advised witnesses to evade giving honest answers, is not one possessing "good moral character," necessary for admission to practice.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Moral Character.]

10. Attorney and Client 🔑52—Admission to Practice—Subsequent Inquiry—Pleading.

In a subsequent inquiry into character of an attorney, where fraud is claimed in his application for admission to practice, the form of the pleadings is not material, and any relevant facts may be inquired into.

11. Attorney and Client 🔑4—Admission to Practice—"Good Moral Character."

Where an attorney, after twice withdrawing his application for admission to practice, in one district when confronted with charges against his character, secured a certificate in another state and applied for admission thereon in another district, concealing his former applications, he committed a fraud upon the court and afforded additional proof that he did not possess the "good moral character" required for admission.

12. Courts 🔑488(4)—Revocation of Admission to Practice—Transfer of Cause.

Since the law has placed upon the District Court of Appeal the duty to investigate applications for admission to practice, the Supreme Court on transfer of the case will not conduct the investigation, but will retransfer the matter.

Angellotti, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Petition by the Committee of the Orange County Bar Association to set aside and vacate an order of the District Court of Appeal of the Third District admitting T. Alonzo Wells to practice law. Petition dismissed, and upon petitioner's application cause transferred to the Supreme Court under Const. art. 6, § 4, as amended in 1904. Motion to strike out petition denied, and demurrer to petition overruled, and cause transferred to District Court of Appeal of the Third District for further proceedings.

E. E. Keech, J. C. Burke, S. M. Reinhaus, L. A. West, and R. Y. Williams, all of Santa Ana (Wm. J. Hunsaker, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioners. H. N. Mitchell, of Sacramento, and W. E. Ferguson and M. C. Atchison, both of Los Angeles, for respondent. T. A. Wells, in pro. per.

SHAW, J. On October 20, 1915, T. Alonzo Wells applied to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for admission to practice law, under section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in support thereof produced a license purporting to admit him to practice law in the state of Nevada, issued to him by the Supreme Court of that state in October, 1915, and procured one H. N. Mitchell, an attorney at law regularly admitted to practice in this state, to vouch for the good moral character of said Wells, and to move said court that his said application be granted. Thereupon said District Court granted the application and made an order admitting said T. Alonzo Wells to practice law in the courts of this state.

Thereafter, on December 8, 1915, five attorneys, members of the bar association of Orange county and constituting a committee appointed by said association to act in that behalf, filed in said district court a petition to set aside and vacate the aforesaid order admitting said Wells to practice. The basis of this petition, in brief, was that said Wells was not a person of good moral character, as represented to said court upon his admission, but was an untrustworthy person who had committed several acts of corruption, fraud, and bad faith, particularly set forth, which showed him to be unfit for admission as an attorney, that he had twice applied for admission as an attorney to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District in which he resided, upon examination under sections 275 and 277, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and on each occasion he had withdrawn his application for admission because of similar objections to his moral character, made on behalf of said bar association to said court, that to avoid these objections, he thereafter, in May, 1915, went to the state of Nevada, where he was not known, and there procured a license to practice law in that state, that he procured the same with the intention of using it as a means of obtaining admission to practice law in California, that to carry out such intent he applied to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for admission, that the judges of said court had no knowledge of his previous applications to the Second District Court of Appeal, nor of his said bad character or fraudulent purpose, that said Wells, taking advantage of the ignorance of the justices of said court as to said facts, fraudulently concealed the same and did not inform said court thereof, but, as above stated, procured said Mitchell to represent to said court that he was a person of good moral character, and that by means of said fraudulent concealment and practices the said court was misled, and by reason thereof made the order admitting him to practice.

Upon the filing of this petition Wells was cited to appear and show cause why the order admitting him to practice should not be revoked. He appeared and demurred to the petition, and also moved to strike out all the allegations thereof, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to authorize any relief or action by the court, and that the matters alleged were irrelevant and immaterial. The District Court of Appeal sustained both the demurrer and the motion, and thereupon dismissed the petition. Within 60 days thereafter, this court granted the application of said petitioners to have said cause heard and determined before it and made its order to this effect.

When the matter came up for hearing in this court, the respondent, Wells, moved to dismiss the proceedings on the ground that the decision and order of the District Court of Appeal sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition is final, and that this court has no jurisdiction or power, in such a case, to order a rehearing before it, or to take jurisdiction of such a matter for further hearing and decision. The consideration of this question requires a determination of the meaning and effect of the following clause of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, as amended in 1904, creating District Courts of Appeal:

> "The Supreme Court shall have power to order any cause pending before the Supreme Court to be heard and determined by a District Court of Appeal, and to order any cause pending before a District Court of Appeal to be heard and determined by the Supreme Court. The order last mentioned may be made before judgment has been pronounced by a District Court of Appeal, or within thirty days after such judgment shall have become final therein. The judgments of the District Courts of Appeal shall become final therein upon the expiration of thirty days after the same shall have been pronounced."

The particular clause involved here is that which gives the Supreme Court power "to order any cause pending before a District Court of Appeal to be heard and determined by the Supreme Court." The contention is that the matter before the district court was not a "cause" within the meaning of that word as used in the above-quoted clause of the section.

[1] The purpose intended to be secured by this clause, particularly the part thereof now under consideration, may best be ascertained by considering the history of the development of the judicial system of this state. The present Constitution was adopted in 1879. Prior thereto the Supreme Court consisted of five Justices. The accumulation of business had demonstrated that the court was unable to dispose of the increasing business which came to it. It was necessary, therefore, to create a court with greater capacity for the dispatch of business. With that object in view a court of seven Justices was constituted, and, for further efficiency, it was divided into two departments composed of three Justices, and provision made that each department should have power to hear and determine causes coming before the court. It was foreseen, however, that differences would arise between the departments which, unless controlled, would result in two systems of law on some subjects, one followed by one department and another by the other department. To prevent this it was provided that where a cause had been decided in a department a rehearing might be ordered before the whole court. The clause providing for this reads in part as follows:

> "Where a cause has been allotted to one of the departments, and a judgment pronounced thereon, the order must be made within thirty days after such judgment, and concurred in by two associate justices, and if so made it shall have the effect to vacate and set aside the judgment." Article 6, § 2.

This provision has always been understood to apply to all cases, matters, and proceedings of every description. It has been the unvarying custom of the court in bank to entertain an application for rehearing of any matter decided in department, regardless of its nature or character. The rule has been applied in original proceedings of all kinds, in motions to dismiss appeals and other matters, as well as in ordinary cases on appeal. The word "cause," in the clause above quoted, was understood to be broad enough to include everything that could possibly come before the department for decision.

In 1903 the judicial business of the state had again increased to such an extent that the Supreme Court and its departments were unable to keep abreast with the work. This condition demanded a remedy and the Legislature set about the task of devising some method whereby the capacity of the higher courts to dispatch business could be increased. To this end the present system was adopted. The Supreme Court was continued with the same powers and departments as before with the exception of some minor changes in its appellate jurisdiction. Three District Courts of Appeal were created, each consisting of three Justices. These courts were given jurisdiction of appeals in certain cases. It was hoped that the division of jurisdiction would equalize the labors of the three District Courts of Appeal and the Supreme Court. It was seen, however, that the division might prove to be unequal. To remedy this the Supreme Court was given power to transfer at will from any one of the courts to another, before hearing or decision, so as to apportion with fairness the burden of the work. Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 6, 106 Pac. 222; People v. Davis, 147 Cal. 348, 81 Pac. 718. Again it was foreseen that in the District Courts of Appeal different conclusions would probably be reached and that different systems of law might thereby gradually become prevalent in the respective districts. In People v. Davis, supra, after stating that the power of transfer before decision was given to enable the Supreme Court to distribute thereby the work among the several courts so as to keep them all busy and thereby "secure a speedy disposition of pending cases," the court, obviously referring to the power of transfer after a decision by the District Court, said that its purpose was "to secure harmony and uniformity in the decisions, their conformity to the settled rules and principles of law, a uniform rule of decision throughout the state, a correct and uniform construction of the Constitution, statutes, and charters, and, in some instances, a final decision by the court of last resort of some doubtful or disputed question of law."

[2] The provision framed to accomplish these objects is similar to that in force respecting department decisions in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court was given power in any matter decided by the District Court of Appeal to vacate the decision and order it transferred to its own calendar for rehearing and decision. To describe the decisions subject to this power the word "cause" was selected. This was the word used in the clause of section 2 giving similar power over the department decisions, which in that clause, as we have said, has been understood to apply to every matter that could be decided by a department. The familiar rule of construction requires that it be given a similarly broad meaning in the new provision, and to include every matter decided by a District Court of Appeal and operating as a final decision or disposition thereof in that court. It is clear, therefore, that the power to transfer causes from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, either before or after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, was intended to have this all-embracing application.

[3] We see no reason to doubt that a decision made by the District Court of Appeal upon an application to revoke an order admitting a person to practice law on the ground that the original order was fraudulently procured comes within the purview of this power of transfer. Such a decision may determine important rights of the parties in the particular case, and may also establish important principles and rules of law and practice applicable generally. The same necessity that the law of the state should be harmonious and uniform exists with respect to such matters as with regard to any other branch of the law. Our conclusion is that a matter of this character may be transferred from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court in the exercise of this power by the latter.

The respondent cites, as holding to the contrary, the decision in Ex parte Zany, 164 Cal. 724, 130 Pac. 710, that this clause of section 4 is not applicable to habeas corpus proceedings. That decision was based upon the peculiar nature and effect of the writ of habeas corpus, the fact that a judgment in such cases had never in the history of the state been made subject to review, that it was not a bar where a prisoner was remanded to custody, but that he could immediately, without waiting 60 days, apply to the Supreme Court for a new writ and have his petition tried de novo, that no power of transfer or review was given after a discharge on habeas corpus on a writ issued by a single Justice of the District Court or by a Justice of the Supreme Court, and that no provision whatever was made by the clause for the custody of the prisoner during the 60-day interval; from all of which circumstances it was concluded that it could not have been intended to extend the power to such cases. None of the reasons given applies to cases of any other kind. The Zany Case is not analogous to the present case. The decision of the District Court in this case, if not vacated by this means, will be conclusive of the rights of the parties. It is not necessary and we do not deem it expedient to extend the rule of the Zany Case and make it applicable to other cases different in character and effect. The motion to dismiss the proceeding is therefore denied.

[4] Upon the merits of the case the first question naturally arising is whether or not the acts charged against the applicant, Wells, were sufficient to establish his lack of good moral character. Prior to the year 1911, after an attorney had once been admitted to practice he could not be disbarred or suspended for acts involving moral turpitude, except where they constituted elements of a crime of which he had been convicted, or unless they constituted a violation of his oath as an attorney or of some duty or responsibility resting upon him in his official capacity as an attorney. Code Civ. Proc. § 287; In re Collins, 147 Cal. 14, 81 Pac. 220. In 1911 (St. 1911, p. 848) section 287 was amended by adding subdivision 5 thereto, which reads as follows:

> "5. For the commission of any act involving moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption, whether the same be committed in the course of his relations as an attorney or counselor at law, or otherwise, and whether the same shall constitute a felony or misdemeanor or not; and in the event that such act shall constitute a felony or misdemeanor, conviction thereof * * * shall not be a condition precedent to disbarment or suspension from practice therefor."

[5-7] It is contended on behalf of the applicant that upon an attorney's application for admission the court cannot reject him for want of good moral character, unless it appears that he had been guilty of acts which would be cause for his disbarment or suspension. We think this proposition cannot be sustained. On his admission on certificate he must produce "satisfactory evidence of good moral character." The burden is on him to do this. In a proceeding to disbar an attorney the burden is on the accuser to prove moral turpitude. The requirement on his admission is to prevent the accrediting of untrustworthy persons as fit to receive the confidence attending upon the relation of attorney and client. The inquiry may extend to his general character as well as to particular acts. It is broader in its scope than that in a disbarment proceeding. The court may receive any evidence which tends to show his character for honesty, integrity, and general morality, and may no doubt refuse admission upon proofs that might not establish his guilt of any of the acts declared to be causes for disbarment.

[8] The fact that the order admitting Wells to practice has already been made does not convert this into a proceeding in disbarment. The charge is that he obtained that order by means of a fraudulent concealment of his real character. The allegations as to his character are necessary in order to show that if there shall be a bona fide inquiry regarding it, the court would be authorized to reject him because of the facts alleged. If the court should conclude that the fraudulent means were sufficiently established to justify a revocation of the order, it would then be its duty to inquire again into his moral character, and that inquiry would have the same scope and be subject to the same rules as if it had been made upon his original application. From this it would follow that the court would not be confined to acts which have occurred since the enactment of the aforesaid amendment of 1911 to section 287, but may consider any acts or conduct occurring at any time, provided they have a legal tendency to prove his present character.

[9, 10] We now come to the consideration of the sufficiency of the allegations relating to the moral character of the respondent. It is alleged, in effect, though not in the best form or manner, that in the year 1903 he obtained a loan of $550 upon the security of a note executed by his wife and himself, and upon the representation by him that his wife owned 25 acres of land free and clear of incumbrances, whereas in truth it was then incumbered by a homestead declaration duly made and recorded by her; that in the year 1914, while acting as adviser and assistant to the attorney for certain defendants in a criminal case in Orange county superior court, he advised and urged certain witnesses that they could testify that they did not remember material facts within their knowledge, without danger to themselves, and thereby induced them to so testify. In a matter of this kind the form of the averments relating to the character of the applicant need not be closely scrutinized. If the case reaches the stage of inquiry on that subject the court may inquire as to any facts bearing on the subject which are brought to its attention in any manner, whether by pleading or otherwise. In addition there are, of course, the facts above recited touching the manner in which he has sought to gain admission, which, if true, have a bearing upon his character.

While this conduct may not show great depravity of character, we think it must be admitted that it indicates in the respondent a want of that sincerity and integrity which the law demands of those who are to be allowed the privilege of practicing law. One who obtains credit by concealing material facts from the creditor and who, while endeavoring to practice in the superior court by indirection before he is admitted as an attorney, endeavors to induce witnesses to conceal the truth and to evade the giving of an honest answer, is not a person of that high character which the state intends shall be possessed by those who practice as attorneys in the courts.

[11] With regard to the part of the case relating to the fraudulent means by which, as it is alleged, he gained admission and evaded meeting the objections, little need be said except to state some additional facts. It appears that he did not change his residence to Nevada, but went into that state solely for the purpose of there obtaining admission to practice and securing a license from that state. Under the rules of the Supreme Court made for the government of the District Courts of Appeal, persons who desire admission upon examination must apply to the District Court of Appeal of the district in which they reside. Wells resided, and apparently still resides, in Orange county, which is within the second district. The court of that district had made a rule that applications for admission upon examination should be filed ten days before the date fixed for such examination. It was also an established practice there for the clerk to send a copy of the application to the president of the bar association of the county in which the applicant resided. Upon his two previous applications for examination in that court this course had been followed and, as above stated, upon being confronted with the objections now made, he had, on each occasion, withdrawn his application. It is alleged that he realized that he would be unable to secure admission upon examination, under these circumstances, and that with intent to evade the requirements above mentioned, to conceal the existence of the objections to his admission and then by indirection obtain admission, he went to the state of Nevada and secured admission there in October, 1915, and that in further pursuit of his intent to evade our laws and regulations he did not apply to the second district court of appeal for admission upon his certificate from Nevada, but presented the same and asked for admission in the Third District Court of Appeal, where the facts were unknown to the court, and thereby procured the order sought to be vacated. If the allegations are true they tend to show that he was conscious of the fact that he could not gain admission in any forum where he would be met by evidence regarding his character, and that to avoid this necessity and evade the efforts of the bar association to prevent his admission he resorted to the circuitous method above detailed, took advantage of the lack of knowledge by the Justices of the Third District concerning his case, and thus procured the order, notwithstanding his unworthiness. His conduct in this respect not only constituted a fraud upon the court, but it affords additional proof that he is not a fit person for admission to the bar. The courts should be vigilant, not lax, to investigate such charges as are here made in regard to the character of an applicant for admission to the bar.

[12] We do not think it avisable to take up in this court the investigation of these charges. It is proper to say that they are now mere allegations which put the court upon inquiry as to the truth of the matter. The law has devolved that duty upon the District Court of Appeal. The court that should conduct the investigation in this case, both as to the alleged fraud in obtaining the order and as to the good moral character of the applicant, is the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, the court which, it is alleged, was improperly led to make the order sought to be revoked.

The motion to strike out the petition is denied, and the demurrer to the petition is overruled.

It is ordered that the matter be transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent. My view is that this matter is not one as to which this court has the power of transfer under the provisions of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, that the order purporting to transfer the same to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is a nullity, and that we have no jurisdiction whatever in the matter. It may properly be added that it seems to me that what is said in the opinion as to the meaning of the word "cause" as used in the provision quoted in the opinion is contrary to our decision in the Zany Case, 164 Cal. 724, 130 Pac. 710, wherein it was held after most careful consideration, Mr. Justice Shaw alone dissenting, that no such power of transfer exists as to a habeas corpus proceeding. The opinion herein recognizes that decision as settling the law on that question.

WILLIAMSON v. MONROE. (Sac. 2389.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES 🔑51(1) — PROPERTY EXEMPT—SALE.

Civ. Code, § 3440, declaring fraudulent a transfer of personal property made by a person having at the time the possession when not accompanied by immediate delivery, but providing that section shall not apply to property exempt, does not apply to a sale of implements of husbandry exempt from execution by Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 3, and such sale is valid in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1140, 1141, 1721, 1739, which do not require immediate delivery.

2. EXEMPTIONS 🔑121—PROPERTY SOLD—NECESSITY OF CLAIM.

In the levy on and sale of personal property exempt to seller under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, a claim by buyer, as provided by section 689, without a specific claim that property is exempt to seller, is sufficient; exemption depending upon character of property and not upon assertion of claim.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES 🔑149(1)—DELIVERY—PROPERTY IN CHARGE OF KEEPER—"POSSESSION."

A sale by debtor of property in charge of a keeper under an execution levy is not a sale "made by a person having at the time possession," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 3440, and is valid without immediate delivery.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by George G. Williamson against J. W. Monroe. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Transferred from Appellate Court (28 Cal. App. 367, 152 Pac. 567). Reversed.

Williamson & Dibblee and W. F. Williamson, all of San Francisco (A. M. Donovan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Philip S. Driver, of Sacramento, and Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action upon the official bond of J. W. Monroe, sheriff of Yolo county, against said sheriff and his sureties, to recover damages for the alleged conversion by said sheriff of certain personal property, alleged to be of the value of $3,000. The defendants in their answer denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the property alleged to have been converted, and denied that the same was of any greater value than $742.50. On the trial the defendants justified under an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of A. A. Merkley against George S. Holmes and J. Fonnesbeck, in virtue of which execution said sheriff had levied upon the property as the property of said Holmes and Fonnesbeck, and had thereafter sold the same, after due notice, in the manner required by law. The court made its findings to the effect that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property aforesaid, that its value was only $724.50, and that the sale under said execution was lawfully and rightfully made. Thereupon judgment was given in favor of the defendants for their costs. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

On the 14th of November, 1910, the property belonged to J. Fonnesbeck, and he on that day sold the same to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration and in good faith. It was then under attachment in another action against Fonnesbeck and Holmes, and was in charge of a keeper named Howe. It was situated on a farm in Yolo county of which said Fonnesbeck was in possession under a lease for farming purposes. The lease was originally made to Fonnesbeck and Holmes, but Holmes had transferred his interest to Fonnesbeck before this sale. On the day aforesaid Fonnesbeck and Williamson went together to the farm to consummate the sale. Fonnesbeck there formally turned the property over to Williamson, and Williamson employed one Whitmarsh, who was living on the farm, to remain there and take charge of the property for him. A part of the agreement of sale was that Williamson was to release the attachment then levied on the property. He did so some days afterwards. Whitmarsh remained on the farm and looked after the property for Williamson until the levy and sale complained of. Fonnesbeck resided on the farm, and he also remained there until a short time before the levy and sale. The execution under which the sheriff made the sale was levied on the property in February, 1911. The sheriff levied upon the theory that upon the sale from Fonnesbeck to Williamson there was no immediate delivery nor actual or continued change of possession from Fonnesbeck to Williamson, as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code, and that, consequently, the property still remained subject to execution against Fonnesbeck, notwithstanding said sale. The main controversy at the trial arose over the question whether there had been such delivery and change of possession.

[1] A part of the property, claimed to be of the value of about $1,000, consisted of the farming utensils, implements of husbandry, and other property used by Fonnesbeck upon the farm aforesaid in his farming operations, and was exempt from execution under subdivision 3 of section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 3440 provides as follows:

> "Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession; * * * provided further, that the provisions of this section shall not apply or extend to * * * any sale, transfer or assignment of any property exempt from execution."

The plaintiff contends that, under these provisions, the farming utensils and property used on the farm as above stated are not subject to the provisions of the section, that a sale thereof in good faith, although not accompanied by an immediate delivery to the vendee or followed by an actual and continued change of possession, is not fraudulent or void, as there declared. We can see no escape from this conclusion. The language of the proviso is clear. In the absence of the restrictions placed upon sales of personal property by the opening clause of the section, a valid sale thereof could be made which would pass the title without delivery. Civ. Code, §§ 1140, 1141, 1721, 1739. A bill of sale was duly executed by Fonnesbeck to Williamson on November 14th, and the title passed to Williamson thereby, unless these restrictions applied to prevent it. As the proviso declares that these restrictions do not apply to property exempt from execution against the vendor, it necessarily follows that Williamson's title was perfect to all the property of that class included in the sale, even if there was no immediate actual delivery or change of possession. The sheriff had no right to levy upon this property, even if Fonnesbeck had been openly in possession thereof, if it then belonged to Williamson.

[2] At the time of the levy in 1911 and at the sale, Williamson made a claim to all the property in the manner provided in section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but neither he nor Fonnesbeck ever made a specific claim that any of the property was exempt from execution against Fonnesbeck. Respondents contend that the property was not exempt from execution unless a claim to that effect was made, and that consequently the proviso does not apply in this case. The statute, however (section 690, Code Civ. Proc.), declares in positive terms that such property is exempt from execution. The exemption is not declared to be conditional upon the assertion of a claim of exemption by the debtor. Its status as exempt property comes from its character and use, and not from any claim for exemption. It is true that the right of exemption may be waived, and that, when the officer actually makes a levy upon such property, if the debtor does not claim his right within a reasonable time thereafter, the delay may be sufficient evidence of such waiver. Gavitt v. Doub, 23 Cal. 80. But here, when the sale was made on November 14, 1910, the vendee assumed the burden of the attachment lien then existing, and immediately discharged it. There was no occasion at that time to claim the exemption, and no person to whom such claim could be made. No other execution or attachment was outstanding. The sale then became complete, there was no waiver of the exemption, the title vested in Williamson, and the exempt property was not afterwards subject to execution against Fonnesbeck.

The decision in Barton v. Brown, 68 Cal. 11, 8 Pac. 517, was made prior to the amendment adding the proviso to section 3440. It has no application to sales of exempt property made after that amendment. This was expressly held by this court in considering and denying the petition for rehearing in Meyer v. Perkins, 20 Cal. App. 661, 130 Pac. 206, 208. In that case the District Court of Appeal decided, in effect, that a claim of exemption was not essential to the operation of the proviso. By denying a rehearing with the additional statement above mentioned this court, in effect, approved that decision.

[3] The appellant further insists that the evidence, with respect to the property not exempt, was insufficient to prove that there was not an immediate delivery to Williamson, followed by an actual and continued change of possession. With respect to an immediate delivery this court has held that when there is an execution levy upon property and it is in charge of a keeper, a sale made by the debtor during such possession of the keeper is not a sale "made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property," within the meaning of section 3440, and is valid without immediate delivery. Williams v. Borgwardt, 119 Cal. 82, 51 Pac. 15; Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 35, 60 Pac. 462.

There was a conflict in the evidence upon the question whether Whitmarsh or Fonnesbeck was in possession of the property from the time of the release of the first attachment in November, 1910, until the execution levy in February, 1911. There was also doubt whether the keeper in charge at the time of the sale to Williamson was in actual possession and control of the property at that time so as to bring the case within the rule of the decisions above cited. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the case must be reversed because of the failure to allow the plaintiff damages for the part of the property exempt from execution, as aforesaid, we do not deem it advisable to express any opinion concerning the sufficiency of the evidence with respect to the remaining items of property. The case is somewhat similar to Cahoon v. Marshall, 25 Cal. 201. The question as presented by the record is one of fact for the trial court. Upon a new trial the doubts and uncertainties now existing in the evidence on one side or the other may be removed.

BROWN v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑361—Workmen's Compensation Act—Status as Employé.

In each case, the question whether a canvassing agent or salesman is an employé within the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) is one of fact, depending for its determination solely upon the particular circumstances which tend to show whether, at the precise time of the accident for which compensation is sought, the employer had the power to exercise over the applicant for compensation such personal control as to attribute to the latter the characteristic of an employé.

2. Master and Servant 🔑3(2) — Terms of Contract—Governance of Relation.

The terms of a contract of employment do not necessarily determine the existing relation between the parties, but such relation may be and often is governed entirely by the subsequent conduct of the parties.

3. Master and Servant 🔑88(3) — "Independent Contractor."

The test of an independent contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in the results of the work, but not in the means whereby it is to be accomplished.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

4. Master and Servant 🔑367 — Independent Contractor.

The circumstance that the amount of commissions of an agent employed to sell lots was dependent upon the number of lots he sold in itself did not create the relationship of independent contractor between himself and the party for whom he sold.

5. Master and Servant 🔑367—Workmen's Compensation Act—"Employé."

Where a person was employed to sell lots for a commission of 20 per cent. of the selling price, etc., and contracted to devote his whole time and energy to selling his employer's lots, further agreeing not to sell any other real estate in the vicinity for any other person without the employer's consent, the commissions earned by him not being transferable or assignable without his employer's written consent, and such agent was injured in an automobile accident while carrying on his employer's business, he was an employé within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and not an independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

In Bank. Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Charles E. Skidmore, opposed by Herbert F. Brown, the employer. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, the employer petitions for writ of review. Award affirmed.

Joseph P. Lucey, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The Industrial Accident Commission found that Charles E. Skidmore, the applicant, was injured by accident near Cloverdale, Cal., while in the employment of the petitioner, Herbert F. Brown. By the writ of review the petitioner presents a single question for consideration: Are the facts found sufficient to establish between himself and the applicant the relationship of employer and employé? The details concerning the employment are stated in special findings of fact which were made by the Commission upon his request. It was found:

> "That the circumstances surrounding the employment of applicant at the time of his injury were as follows: That the applicant had been in the employment of the defendant for over two years as salesman for the selling of certain Contra Costa real estate properties owned and which were being sold by the defendant through agents for his own benefit; that in payment for his services as salesman the applicant was promised, in a certain written contract, a commission of 20 per cent. of the selling price of each lot sold, this commission to be deducted from each installment due upon each lot, as paid; that the applicant was further to retain $20 upon each initial payment of $25 upon lots sold, such moneys to be used for traveling and living expenses, but to be accounted for as a part of the whole commission due upon such sale; that all future commissions were to terminate, as to any lot, upon the forfeiture of the contract for the purchase of that lot; that the applicant furthermore contracted to devote his whole time and energy to selling the lots of the defendant, and further agreed not to sell any other Contra Costa real estate for any other person without the consent of defendant, and for a violation of such provision it was provided that the applicant was to obtain the balance of his commission on lots sold thereafter only when such lots had been fully paid for, instead of receiving his share of each payment as made; that it was furthermore provided in said contract of employment that commissions earned by the applicant were not to be transferable or assignable by the applicant without the written consent of the defendant; that the defendant exercised the right to designate the territory in which applicant should work for the sale of defendant's real estate properties; that defendant supplied applicant with circulars and instructed him in the manner of selling his properties, required applicant to report all proposed sales and to receive his (defendant's) sanction to the closing of sales of defendant's properties, required applicant to make sales according to terms and conditions described by defendant, wrote applicant general letters of instruction, advanced applicant his expenses at various times, but exercised no further or direct control over applicant's time or the manner of doing his work; that the applicant was steadily engaged in defendant's business for nearly two years without selling real estate for any other party during that time; that the defendant had a large number of similar contracts of other salesmen with varying degrees of attention paid by said salesmen to the rendering of services under such contracts; that the applicant was directed by the defendant in May, 1914, to go to Ukiah, Cal., to sell the defendant's property at this place and was directed by the defendant to accompany one Wellock to Ukiah by automobile, said Wellock to introduce the applicant and to aid him in becoming familiar with the community and people; that while on said trip by automobile to Ukiah to commence his labors with said Wellock, the applicant was injured by the wrecking of the automobile, receiving the injuries which form the basis of this proceeding."

The award of the Commission was not unanimous. A dissenting opinion was filed by Commissioner Pillsbury, from which we quote the concluding paragraph as it accurately states the contentions which the petitioner urges upon us here:

> "The present case is fairly typical of a general situation, namely, that of real estate agents, book agents, canvassers, aluminum utensil sellers, magazine sellers, etc., or of other persons selling articles upon commission and canvassing the country, very generally confined to particular fields until they have fairly worked out such fields. In my opinion a canvasser selling upon commissions, going to work when he pleases and quitting when he wishes to do so, reporting infrequently and not with reference to how he spends his time, is ordinarily an independent contractor and is not so subject to the control of his principal as to make him an employé within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act."

[1] It is not necessary, however, for us to determine the general proposition whether all salesmen of the class mentioned are employés. In each case, the question is one of fact, depending for its determination solely upon those particular circumstances present which tend to show whether, at the precise time of the accident for which compensation is sought, the petitioner had the power to exercise over the applicant such personal control as to attribute to him the characteristic of an employé. It is pointed out that:

> "Brown had made more than 100 contracts similar to the one made with Skidmore with agents in different parts of California, some of them giving their whole time to the work of selling Brown's properties, and some only selling lots occasionally, and others reporting no sales whatever."

[2] But these facts are material only in throwing light upon the contractual relations commonly entered into between Brown and the salesmen employed by him. The terms of the contracts do not necessarily determine the existing relation of the parties, but such relation may, and often is, governed entirely by the subsequent conduct of the parties. Anderson v. Foley Bros., 110 Minn. 151, 124 N. W. 987. The findings show that Skidmore had worked for Brown for more than two years, devoting all of his time as a salesman for his properties. The contract itself expressly provided that he should do so—"you are to devote your whole time and energy to selling my lots while under this contract." So long as Skidmore elected to receive the commissions he had earned at the times the respective installment payments should be made on the lots sold by him, he was not at liberty to devote to the work only such time as he pleased.

[3] It may be conceded that the test of a contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent employment or occupation, following his employer's desires only in the results of the work, but not in the means whereby it is to be accomplished. Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337. See Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721. But Skidmore did not contract to produce any particular result. The contract was fully performed on his part when he had devoted all of his time to endeavoring to sell Brown's lots, irrespective of the number of sales, if any, which he might make. He could leave the service of the petitioner at any time without being charged with a breach of contract, and was liable to discharge as any employé.

[4] The results obtained, so far as Skidmore was concerned, were important merely as a means of ascertaining the amount of commissions he should receive, a circumstance which in itself does not create the relationship of an independent contractor. Cameron v. Pillsbury et al., 159 Pac. 149. Nor could he delegate others to carry out the terms of the contract. It called for his personal services. Even his commissions were not to be transferred or assigned without Brown's "written consent and approval." On the other hand, the findings show, and they are not questioned, that Brown not only kept in close touch with the means employed by Skidmore in the performance of his work, but exercised a general control over his movements and methods of salesmanship, while especially reserving the right to approve all proposed sales, a reservation which necessarily implies the power of designating and directing in advance the terms upon which each lot must be sold. And at the time of the accident, so Skidmore testified, he was proceeding to Ukiah because Brown had "sent" him there to sell his properties with the assistance of one Wellock who had been directed by Brown to accompany him.

[5] In short, the petitioner had adequate means to control the applicant in the performance of his services (State v. District Court, 128 Minn. 43, 150 N. W. 211), and the case comes within the principles supporting Cameron v. Pillsbury et al., supra. It follows that the Commission was warranted in finding that Skidmore was an employé of the petitioner.

Award affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). Skidmore was engaged by Brown to sell real property. His contract was that he should devote his whole time to that service. At the time he was injured he was acting under Brown's special instructions to go to Ukiah with Wellock to continue his services there. While on that trip he was injured. I am satisfied that during that trip, at least, he was in the service of Brown under a contract of hire, within the spirit as well as the letter of the Workman's Compensation Act. The fact that his compensation was to be a commission on sales made is immaterial. It was none the less a contract of hire. On this ground I concur in the opinion of Justice LAWLOR.

I am not satisfied that a person who is employed to sell real estate on commission and who chooses his own time, place, and manner of seeking purchasers, and who pays his own expenses, would be an employé of his principal in the sense of that act, and I express no opinion on that branch of the case.

I concur: MELVIN, J.

ALBERT v. McKAY & CO. (S. F. 7111.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 29, 1917.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑101, 102(1)—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

The duty to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place to work is limited to the premises where the employé is required to be for the purposes of his employment.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑276(10)—DEATH OF SERVANT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In action for death of servant, evidence held to warrant finding that the servant was acting within the scope of his duties in going to a lower floor of his employer's lumber mill to fasten bolts which held the filing room machinery in place.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑103(2) — SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

The rule requiring a master to provide a safe place for his servant to work does not apply when the place at which the work is to be done, or the appliances for doing it, are to be prepared by the servant himself.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑236(12) — INJURIES TO SERVANT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the employé of a lumber mill himself removed the guard from a setscrew, and such unguarded setscrew caused his injury and death, his widow could not recover against the employer therefor, since the condition which the employé himself brought about could not be charged against the employer as an act of negligence.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(17) — INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In action for death of a lumber mill employé, evidence held insufficient to show that the machinery of the mill was negligently started after the employé had begun work thereon.

6. WITNESSES 🔑397—IMPEACHMENT—PRIOR INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

When a witness is impeached by proof of prior inconsistent statements, the effect is merely to discredit him as a witness; the former statements made by him are incompetent for any other purpose, and do not constitute evidence of the truth of the facts so stated by him.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑265(5)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

In an action for death of a servant, where the widow charged that his death was caused by the negligent starting of the machinery after the servant took his position near it, but the testimony was undisputed that the machinery had not been started at all, and therefore could not have been started negligently, the employer's negligence could not be inferred under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, which had no application to the facts.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑265(4)—INJURIES TO SERVANT — PRESUMPTION OF FREEDOM FROM NEGLIGENCE—STATUTE.

The presumption, under Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, that a deceased servant exercised ordinary care could not avail to support verdict for his widow against his employer, in the absence of substantial evidence tending to show a breach of duty by the latter.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Action by Ella W. Albert, as administratrix of the estate of Frank H. Albert, deceased, against McKay & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, Denver Sevier, and Sevier, Coonan & Ricks, all of Eureka, for appellant. Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. For some years prior to March 10, 1913, Frank H. Albert had been in the employ of the defendant, McKay & Co., a corporation owning and operating a lumber mill at Eureka, in Humboldt county. On the day named, Albert's clothing was caught in an appliance attached to one of the shafts used in the transmission of power for the mill machinery, his body was drawn against the rapidly revolving shaft, and he received injuries which caused his death. He was survived by a widow and a minor child. This action was brought by the widow, as administratrix of his estate, to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Upon the trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict in the sum of $8,000, and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant appeals from the judgment, bringing up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

Albert's employment was that of a saw filer. He worked in a filing room, which was on the sawing or mill floor of defendant's mill. The engines, together with the shafts, pulleys, and belts for the transmission of power were located upon a lower floor. In the filing room were several machines, which were used by Albert in his work. These were driven by a belt running through the floor and connecting with a pulley attached to a shaft running under the floor of the filing room. One end of this shaft was set in a box or bearing. At the point where the shaft entered the box, a collar was attached to the shaft by means of a setscrew, which projected five-eighths of an inch beyond the collar. Some 12 or 13 inches from this collar a pulley, with a diameter of 30 inches, was attached to the shaft. The shaft in question received its power from the main shaft driven by a belt from the engine. A "tightener" was used in transmitting power to the main shaft. The shaft was set in motion by lowering the tightener so as to bring it in contact with a belt connecting with the engine. Raising the tightener stopped the main shaft and with it the shaft which furnished power to the machines in the filing room.

The precise way in which the fatal accident occurred was a subject for inference from the circumstances shown. No one was with Albert when he was caught in the machinery. A fellow-employé found Albert's lifeless body hanging on the shaft, between the box holding the end of the shaft and the pulley, which we have described as being 12 or 13 inches away.

The complaint was in three counts. In all three it was charged that Albert had occasion, in the performance of his duties, to reach across the shaft in order to adjust one of the machines used by him in the filing room above, this machine being held in place by means of bolts passing through holes in the floor, and fastened by nuts attached and tightened from below. The first count alleged that Albert's clothing was caught in the protruding setscrew which has been described. The averment was that the defendant negligently left this setscrew unguarded, and that this negligence was the cause of Albert's death. The setscrew, it was alleged, could not be seen when the shaft was in motion. The theory underlying this cause of action was that Albert undertook to do his work of adjustment while the shaft, and the setscrew upon it, were revolving.

The second and third counts were framed on the theory that the shaft was not in motion when Albert began, but that while he was engaged in his work, the shaft was set in motion through the negligence of the defendant. The second count alleges that the starting of the machinery was occasioned by the act of the defendant in negligently dropping the tightener on the belt, thereby causing the shaft to revolve. The third charges that the appliances for holding the tightener in place were improperly constructed, and that by reason thereof the tightener fell onto the belt and thus started the machinery in motion.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted as to the third count, there being no evidence tending to show that the tightener had dropped as charged in this count. The main question raised by the appeal is whether the verdict can be sustained on either the first or second cause of action alleged.

[1, 2] The appellant urges with much earnestness that the evidence totally fails to show that Albert was acting within the scope of his employment when he undertook to work in the place where he met his death; that in fact the activities in which he was then engaged were undertaken in direct violation of the orders of his employer. This point, if sustained, would answer the plaintiff's claims under both the first and the second count. The negligence charged in the first count is the failure to comply with the employer's duty to furnish his employé with a reasonably safe place to work. The duty is limited to "the premises where the employé is required, for the purposes of his employment, to be." Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 640, 52 Pac. 33, 35 [63 Am. St. Rep. 153]. So, also (referring to the second count), if Albert, while working in a place where he was not required to be, was injured by the starting of the machinery, such starting would not constitute negligence in the absence of proof that the defendant knew, or had reason to know, that Albert was in a position of danger. There is considerable evidence to the effect that Albert was directed to confine his work to the filing room and not to go on the floor below except when the mill was not in operation. More specifically it was testified that he had been forbidden to change the location of the filing room machinery. But there was evidence of contrary import, and, on the whole case, we think the jury was warranted in concluding that Albert was acting within the scope of his duties in going to the lower floor to fasten the bolts which held the filing room machinery in place.

But, conceding so much, we must still hold that the evidence totally failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant. The breach of duty charged in the first count was that the defendant improperly left the setscrew unguarded. That it was so unguarded at the time of the accident is clear. But several witnesses testified that the collar and setscrew had been protected by a guard for a considerable time prior to the accident. The protection consisted of a piece of rubber belting over this part of the machinery, and a drip box or pan under it. Four witnesses so stated, and their testimony is uncontradicted. One of them testified, further, that on the Wednesday or Thursday before the accident (which occurred on a Monday), Albert had borrowed a bar from the witness, and had pried off the belting with it, removing the drip pan at the same time. This statement was also uncontradicted. The testimony of these witnesses could not be arbitrarily discarded. There was nothing to throw doubt on its credibility. On the contrary, other evidence tended strongly to fortify the probability of the claim that Albert had removed the protective covering in the process of changing the position of the shaft, a change which was actually made a few days before the accident, and was necessary to the moving of the machine in the filing room.

[3] The rule requiring the master to provide a safe place for the servant does not apply when "the place at which the work is to be done, or the appliances for doing the same, are to be prepared by the servant himself." Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 603, 45 Pac. 1017; Peterson v. Beck, 27 Cal. App. 571, 150 Pac. 788.

[4] If the cause of Albert's injury and death was the unguarded setscrew, the condition was one which he himself had brought about, and which could not be charged against the defendant as an act of negligence.

[5] The only remaining basis for sustaining the verdict is that set forth in the second count, i. e., that the machinery was negligently started after Albert had begun to work. Here, too, the evidence totally fails. Testimony of numerous witnesses is unanimous to the effect that the machinery, including the shaft in question, was running before Albert went to the lower floor, and that it was not stopped until the discovery of his body on the shaft. There was no competent evidence in contradiction of this. Two witnesses for plaintiff testified that immediately after the accident they had met Milotte, the master mechanic of the mill, one of the employés charged with the duty of raising and lowering the tightener, and that Milotte was pale and his voice trembled. To one of these witnesses he had said: "Don't talk about it. I cannot stand it. I am sick"—and to the other: "For God's sake go in and take that man off the shaft." This testimony is relied on by the respondent as tending to show that Milotte had lowered the tightener, thus starting the machinery in motion and causing Albert's death. To give it any such effect would be to indulge the wildest surmise and conjecture. Milotte's words and actions may have indicated no more than the horror and distress which any man might feel on seeing that another had met violent death. They certainly contained no basis for the inference that Milotte had been guilty of any wrong, still less that he had committed the act of negligence described in the complaint. The jury could not view the evidence of Milotte's conduct as overcoming the direct testimony that the machinery was running when Albert approached the shaft, without disregarding the instruction of the court that their verdict "must be based upon a fact, or facts, and not on speculation."

[6] The respondent points to one other item of evidence as tending to show that the machinery was not running when Albert went to work. Among the witnesses who testified that the machinery had been running continuously was one Elener, a blacksmith in defendant's employ. The proper foundation having been laid by cross-examination, the plaintiff sought to impeach him by calling in rebuttal a witness who testified that Elener had said, shortly after the accident, that the machinery had not been running, and that somebody must have left the tightener down after Albert had started working. When a witness is impeached by proof of prior inconsistent statements, the effect is merely to discredit him as a witness. The former statements made by him are incompetent for any other purpose. They do not constitute evidence of the truth of the facts so stated by him. 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1018; Keyes v. Geary Street, etc., R. R. Co., 152 Cal. 437, 441, 93 Pac. 88; Worley v. Spreckels Bros. Com. Co., 163 Cal. 60, 71, 124 Pac. 697.

[7] In the absence of any conflict, the jury had no right to find a verdict based upon the theory that the machinery had been negligently started after Albert had placed himself in close proximity to the shaft. This is not a case in which such negligence can be inferred under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The rule has no application to the facts of this case. The plaintiff charged, in the count under discussion, that Albert's death was caused by the negligent starting of the machinery. If there had been any evidence to show that the machinery was started after Albert took his position near the shaft, it might be said that the mere occurrence of the accident warranted an inference that the defendant had been negligent in setting the shaft in motion. But such inference cannot, of course, be indulged in face of the undisputed testimony that the machinery had not been started at all, and therefore could not have been started negligently.

[8] The presumption that Albert himself exercised ordinary care (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963; Crabbe v. Mammoth C. G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 506, 143 Pac. 714) relied on by respondent, cannot avail to support the verdict in the absence of any substantial evidence tending to show a breach of duty by the defendant.

In re McMAHON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7779.)

Rehearing Denied March 15, 1917.)

1. WILLS 🔑133—OLOGRAPHIC—EXECUTION.
The face of an instrument offered as an olographic will must establish fact that it is a completely executed document, and, if signed elsewhere than at the end, must show this to have been intended as an executing signature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 342–344.]

2. WILLS 🔑206—ADMISSION TO PROBATE.
Only a will showing upon its face due and complete execution is entitled to probate.

3. WILLS 🔑133—OLOGRAPHIC—EXECUTION.
Testatrix's belief that her olographic will was duly executed has no weight in considering the question of its legal sufficiency.

4. WILLS 🔑133—OLOGRAPHIC—EXECUTION—SIGNATURE.
Olographic will, stating in exordium, "This is the last will and testament of Elizabeth R. McMahon," and concluding, "I do hereby publish and declare the foregoing, entirely written, dated and signed by my own hand to be my last will and testament," held sufficient to indicate that testatrix adopted her name written in exordium as the executing signature, hence will satisfied Code provisions and was entitled to probate.

5. WILLS 🔑133—OLOGRAPHIC—EXECUTION.
Absolute precision of execution is not expected in the case of an olographic will; it being sufficient if will clearly shows upon its face a legal execution.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Appeal from decree, probating will of Elizabeth R. McMahon, deceased. Affirmed.

W. A. Breen and Mastick & Partridge, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. In this case a written instrument was admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Elizabeth R. McMahon, deceased. The writing was unwitnessed and unattested. It was therefore olographic in its nature. In its exordium it declared: "This is the last will and testament of Elizabeth R. McMahon." Following this the writing contained certain specific bequests and devises, with a residuary clause, and a clause appointing an executor. It concluded as follows:

> "I do hereby publish and declare the foregoing, entirely written, dated and signed by my own hand, to be my last will and testament, this second day of January, 1912."

No signature followed this declaration. No signature of the testatrix appeared in any other place upon the instrument, saving in the exordium as above noted. Upon this showing the court entered its decree admitting the will to probate, and from that decree this appeal is taken.

[3] The language of the instrument here in question is much more definite and convincing, to the effect not alone that the testatrix believed her will to be duly executed, which would, of course, have no controlling weight in the consideration of the question as to whether or not it was in law duly executed, but to the effect that she has sufficiently in law on the face of the instrument adopted the signature written by herself in the exordium of her will as her signature in execution of it. If she has done this and with sufficient exactitude has stated the fact, she has, in legal effect, declared that she has adopted her signature as written in the body of the will as being the signing of it in execution of it within the meaning of the Code provision, and this would be sufficient to entitle the instrument to probate.

[4, 5] We hold that the testatrix in this case has sufficiently accomplished the object indicated. An absolute precision of execution is not expected in the case of an olographic will. What is required is a clear showing upon the face of the instrument of its execution in conformity with the law. In this case the difficulty arises over the fact that the signature is not found in the usual place at the bottom of the instrument. But the language last employed by the testatrix clearly indicates that the testatrix had concluded her writing and thus had completed the expression of her testamentary intent, and it is a most reasonable construction of that language to say that she adopted her signature in the exordium as her signature in execution of the will when she declares that "the foregoing, entirely written, dated and signed by my own hand" is her last will and testament.

So recently has this court discussed this question and reviewed the authorities that nothing further need be added, and for the reasons given the decree appealed from is affirmed.

CHAFOR et al. v. CITY OF LONG BEACH. (L. A. 4100.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 2, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 29, 1917.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑734—PUBLIC BUILDINGS—DUTY TO MAINTAIN.

A building constructed by the city under St. 1903, p. 412, authorizing the city to incur indebtedness for a public assembly hall, was not one enjoined upon the municipality by positive law, and the duty of maintenance was not therefore imposed by law.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑848—PUBLIC BUILDINGS—FAILURE TO MAINTAIN—INJURIES TO PERSONS — "LICENSEE" — "TRESPASSER."

Where a municipal public assembly hall was rented to an organization which invited all interested persons to a celebration of Queen Victoria's birthday, a citizen who attended was not a trespasser, but a licensee by permission or invitation, and if the city was at all responsible for injuries, it was responsible for the exercise of ordinary care.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Licensee; Trespasser.]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑734—TORTS—LIABILITY—PRIVATE OR "GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS."

The true test whether a municipality is liable in tort for injuries to a person is not whether the municipality from renting its auditorium wherein the injury was caused was reaping a profit, and an act does not become governmental merely because the city from its performance reaps no profit.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Governmental Functions.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑724—LIABILITY FOR TORTS — "GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS"—COMMON LAW.

Under common law the municipality is protected from liability only while exercising the delegated functions of sovereignty, which include police regulation, crime prevention, preservation of health, fire prevention, care of the poor, and education of the young.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑734 — PUBLIC BUILDINGS—INJURIES TO PERSONS—LIABILITY.

While schoolhouses, city halls, jails, and fire houses are governmental instrumentalities for injuries to persons in which the city is not liable the rule does not apply to public auditoriums or other buildings, though for the benefit, convenience, or advantage of the people, and even in the case of strictly governmental buildings if the city rents portion thereof, it is liable to the tenant for negligent maintenance.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑734—PUBLIC BUILDINGS—INJURIES TO PERSONS—LIABILITY.

When a municipal building is constructed and maintained not for governmental purposes, even though under permission of statute, and though maintained for the benefit of inhabitants or such of them as desired to use it, the city acts in a private proprietary capacity, and is liable for its torts.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑848—PUBLIC BUILDINGS—INJURIES TO PERSONS—LIABILITY.

Where the city under St. 1903, p. 412, constructed an auditorium partly over a bay, which it rented to any persons desiring the use of the same at fixed rentals for various classes of entertainments, and during a celebration by a private organization, to which all citizens were invited, the approach to the auditorium collapsed, with injuries to persons, the city was liable to the same degree as if the building had been owned by a private owner.

Angellotti, C. J., and Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by George Chafor and another against the City of Long Beach. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan and Byron C. Hanna, all of Los Angeles, Stephen G. Long and Geo. F. Kapp, both of Long Beach, Geo. L. Hoodenpyl, of Los Angeles, and Wilbur F. Downs, of Long Beach, for appellant. William A. Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by the husband and by the minor son of Edith Chafor to recover damages for the death of Edith occasioned by the negligence of the defendant city. Trial was had before a jury, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiffs. Judgment followed the verdict, and from that judgment and from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial it prosecutes this appeal.

Long Beach is a maritime city. Prior to the accident it had constructed and was maintaining a wharf or pier extending into the ocean. The superstructure of this pier was supported by piles driven into the beach and ocean bed. Near the outer end of this pier and a little distance from it, the city had built and was also maintaining a structure known as an auditorium. The approach to the auditorium from the pier, a distance of about 40 feet, was by means of a platform. From this platform doors gave entrance onto the main floor of the auditorium. The 24th of May, 1914, was the birthday of Queen Victoria. Certain of the inhabitants of Long Beach and of adjacent territory proposed to assemble in the auditorium for the purpose of celebrating this "Empire Day." A set program for the ceremonies and entertainment had been announced. In effect such part of the public as was interested in the event was invited to attend. Edith Chafor was a resident of the city of Los Angeles, and went to Long Beach for these ceremonies. They were inaugurated by a street parade, headed by the municipal band. This parade was to end at the auditorium. While it was on the march people assembled on the platform, seeking admission to the auditorium. The doors were closed, so that a crowd collected on this platform. It gave way under the weight of this crowd, and carrying with it a part of the underpinning and superstructure of the auditorium building proper, precipitated some 200 of the assemblage onto the beach sands 20 or more feet below. Edith Chafor was one of these, and her dead body was removed from the wreckage.

[1] As the question whether or not the city of Long Beach, which admittedly had built and was maintaining this auditorium and its approach, was doing so in a governmental capacity is the principal question presented on this appeal, it becomes pertinent to point out that the construction and maintenance of this auditorium, which was essentially a hall for public assemblages and gatherings, were not enjoined upon the municipality by positive law. Therefore the duty of maintenance was not a duty imposed by law. The auditorium was constructed under the permission of a statute of 1903. Stats. 1903, p. 412. This statute authorized and permitted a municipality to issue bonds and incur indebtedness for the purpose of constructing and maintaining such "public assembly or convention hall." It provided that the legislative body of the city "shall have power to appoint such officers, or agents, and to make and enforce such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the management, control, letting, and use of such public assembly or convention halls." It further provided that "all moneys derived from the use or hire of such assembly or convention hall shall be deposited in the treasury of the municipality to the credit of said public hall fund." After specifying the first applications to be made of the moneys thus received, it further declares that "any surplus remaining * * * may be appropriated and used for general municipal purposes." It is not in controversy but that this particular assembly hall was maintained under the provisions of this act, and that its management and control, also under the provisions of the act, were in the hands of defendant's board of public works. Control of the actual letting or permission to use the hall was retained by the city council.

[2] The evidence discloses that upon the day in question the right to the use and occupancy of the hall had been given to an organization known as the Sons of St. George, and that the auditorium would be open to the general public after the Sons of St. George with the paraders and their friends had been admitted. The parade was led by a lieutenant of the city's police, with a number of the police force. These were followed by the municipal band. The mayor of the city and his wife were in the first automobile. The destination of all was the auditorium, which, under these circumstances, the mayor himself had entered just prior to the disaster. It cannot be said then that Edith Chafor was a trespasser at the time and place of her death. She was at least a licensee by permission or invitation, and if the city is responsible at all it is responsible for the exercise of ordinary care to see that such a licensee is not injured. Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580; Means v. So. Cal. Ry., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Cal. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Hontz v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 161 Pac. 971. With the ground thus cleared of these minor obstructions we can approach unhampered the consideration of the principal proposition: Was the city of Long Beach at the time and on the occasion of this accident managing this assembly hall in its governmental capacity or in a private and proprietary capacity?

To the resolution of this question we now come, prefacing the consideration by the statement, which will hereinafter be abundantly established, that there is no substantial controversy over the governing law. With the decision of the case of Russell v. The Men of Devon, 2 T. R. 667, and the cases which followed it, it became an established principle of the English common law that an individual could not sustain an action against a political subdivision for negligence in its performance of any governmental function, nor of any public function expressly ordained and commanded by law. The reasonings supporting this were various. At times it was declared that it was better for the individual to suffer than for the public to be inconvenienced, and that this principle was stronger than that other and conflicting one which declared that for every injury the law gives a remedy. The city was but a hand of the sovereign, and it was the "right divine of kings to govern wrong." Later it was argued that the moneys of a municipal corporation were designed to be devoted to public ends, and that it would be a misapplication of them to permit any part of them to be used in the liquidation of private damages. But this principle of decision, while firmly established where not abrogated by statute, failed to commend itself alike to jurists and to legislators, and, it was argued that as neither a political subdivision nor yet the state itself could injure a man's property without compensation, it seemed somewhat fallacious and absurd to say that it could negligently injure him or destroy his life without the liability to compensation for its wrongdoing. It was a clear instance, so it was argued, of making the rights of property higher and more sacred than the rights of man. Thus it came about that courts soon made a discrimination in these cases between the purely governmental or ordained functions of the municipality, for remissness in the performance of which it was not liable, and those which, though undertaken and performed for the general benefit of the inhabitants of the municipality, were neither ordained nor in their nature essentially governmental. And recognizing, as has been said, the inherent injustice of the established rule, the disposition of the courts on the one hand was to uphold such actions under a very rigid construction of the phrase "governmental functions," while upon the other hand the Legislatures in many states by positive enactment did away entirely with the distinction and made municipal corporations liable to precisely the same extent for the same acts as were private corporations. And indeed it may be added that even without legislative sanction in at least one instance the highest court of a state has repudiated as unsound the distinction between the governmental and private functions of a municipal corporation, and has declared that in every case the mode and measure of the liability of a public corporation should be that prescribed as to an individual or a private corporation. Bowden v. Kansas City, 69 Kan. 587, 77 Pac. 573, 66 L. R. A. 181, 105 Am. St. Rep. 187, 1 Ann. Cas. 955. And in this state it is not without interest to point out that the Legislature has in terms imposed this liability upon all counties, cities, and cities and counties by a statute enacted in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1115), though by reason of the fact that the substance of this enactment was neither declared nor hinted at in its title it is undoubted that in this respect the act is void. Brunson v. City of Santa Monica, 27 Cal. App. 89, 148 Pac. 950.

[3] Again it is important to note that the true test does not rest upon the determination as to whether or not the municipality is reaping a monetary gain. A very large class of cases arises where this fact is established, as where parts of public buildings, such as a city hall, are leased or rented to private individuals, when it is uniformly held that the city in doing this thing is acting in a private capacity. But while it is true that the exaction of a rent or the making of a private profit is a very potent factor in determining the character of the act, the converse is not true. In other words, the act does not become governmental merely by virtue of the fact that the city from the performance of it reaps no direct pecuniary return. It may be and is equally a private, proprietary act if no financial return at all be exacted, or if the financial return which is exacted does not amount to a profit on the enterprise. The true principle has too often been confounded with the mere question of pecuniary gain. We may be excused, therefore, in elucidating this fact for quoting at some length. Thus in Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 109, the principle is thus aptly and admirably stated:

> The powers of a municipal corporation are denominated "governmental, legislative or public; the other, proprietary or private. * * * On distinction of these powers rests the doctrine of the common-law liability of municipal corporations. In its governmental or public character the corporation is made, by the state, one of its instruments, or the local depository of certain limited and prescribed political powers, to be exercised for the public good on behalf of the state rather than for itself. * * * But in its proprietary or private character, the theory is that the powers are supposed not to be conferred, primarily or chiefly, from considerations connected with the government of the state at large, but for private advantage of the compact community, which is incorporated as a distinct legal personalty, or corporate individual; and as to such powers and to property acquired thereunder, and contract made with reference thereto, the corporation is to be regarded quoad hoc as a private corporation, or at least not public in the sense that the power of the Legislature over it or the rights represented by it is omnipotent."

The text of the learned author will be found supported by every well-considered adjudication. Noteworthy amongst these is the case of City of Galveston v. Posnainsky, 62 Tex. 118, 50 Am. Rep. 517, where the distinction between governmental and proprietary functions is elaborately considered, and it is said:

> "The tendency of the decisions is evidently to recognize the liability of even quasi corporations to suit not expressly given by statute, when injury results from the negligence of officials or agents exercising powers purely ministerial in reference to matters which cannot be said to pertain to duties purely public; to matters which, though in a restricted sense are public, yet more directly affect the welfare and pecuniary interest of the inhabitants of the quasi corporation, upon whose will rests the determination whether the given act shall be performed and how it shall be performed, and upon whom rests solely the expense of the work put in operation by themselves, through which, at least indirectly, they receive benefit in which the general public, if at all, but slightly participates. * * * It would seem that, in so far as municipal corporations of any class, and however incorporated, exercise powers conferred on them for purposes essentially public—purposes pertaining to the administration of general laws made to enforce the general policy of the state—they should be deemed agencies of the state, and not subject to be sued for any act or omission occurring while in the exercise of such power, unless, by statute, the action be given; that, in reference to such matters, they should stand as does sovereignty, whose agents they are, subject to be sued only when the state, by statute, declares they made be. * * * In so far, however, as they exercise powers not of this character, voluntarily assumed—powers intended for the private advantage and benefit of the locality and its inhabitants—there seems to be no sufficient reason why they should be relieved from that liability to suit and measure of actual damage to which an individual or private corporation exercising the same powers for a purpose essentially private would be liable."

We have thus been at pains to set forth the principle determinative of the question as to whether or not a particular act pertains to the governmental rather than to the proprietary activities of a city, because the discussions of some courts, notably those of Massachusetts, have been misconstrued upon the element of pecuniary gain. Hill v. City of Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, illustrates this. It is to be noted that the court is there dealing, and so expresses itself, with the "neglect of a public duty imposed upon it (the municipality) by law for the benefit of the public, and from the performance of which the corporation receives no profit or advantage." The particular case was an action of tort against the city of Boston to recover damages for injuries received by a child while attending a public school, under the express duty imposed by general law to maintain such public schools, and it is held that the municipality is not liable. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts did not in any way broaden the definition of governmental functions as applied to municipal acts. It did not rest its decision, as well it might, upon the proposition that the maintenance of public schools, being a duty enjoined upon the municipality, partook of the nature of a governmental function. Nor yet, while recognizing and declaring that it was a duty the performance of which was enjoined upon the city by general law, did it exonerate the city for liability on this account, but held and declared that in the performance of such ordained duties the city would not be liable when the performance of the duty was not connected with any pecuniary benefit to the municipality, thereby plainly implying that even though the duty were ordained by general law, if it contemplated any pecuniary benefit to the municipality it would stand liable as would a private individual. To illustrate the unwillingness of the Massachusetts courts to extend the doctrine of municipal immunity, the case of Dickinson v. City of Boston, 188 Mass. 595, 75 N. E. 68, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 664, is instructive. The city of Boston was by law responsible for the negligent maintenance of its public streets. To prevent accidents on those streets it was not required by law to light them at night. However, by a permissive statute the city "was authorized but not required to maintain lamps to light its streets." St. 1825, c. 3. It maintained such lights for the general benefit of the inhabitants, for their general safety, and specifically to lessen the danger of accidents upon the highways. One of its lamp posts, negligently maintained, fell and injured the plaintiff. In his action brought to recover damages these matters are discussed, and it was urged, amongst many other reasons, that the city was not liable in that it was reaping no pecuniary benefit from the maintenance of the lights, but that the benefit was a general public benefit to the inhabitants. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts made answer:

> "It was unnecessary for the plaintiff to show that any direct commercial profit had been derived. The indirect benefit thus conferred supplied a sufficient motive for the defendant's action. Having voluntarily undertaken the enterprise for its private benefit, and not acting in the performance of any public duty, it is liable for negligence in the management of its corporate property when used for such purpose" (citing numerous cases).

Still further, as showing the limits within which the courts circumscribe the meaning of the phrase "governmental function," may be cited Ehrgott v. Mayor of New York, 96 N. Y. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 622, where it is held that it is settled by a long line of decisions that municipal corporations proper, having the powers conferred upon them respecting streets within their limits, owe to the public the duty to keep them in a safe condition for use in the usual mode by travelers, and are liable in a civil action for special injury resulting from neglect to perform this duty. And the City of Kokomo v. Loy (Ind.) 112 N. E. 994, where the Supreme Court of Indiana applies the same doctrine to injuries resulting from the negligent upkeep of a public park as well as public streets.

That the distinction between governmental and private functions has been adopted as the principle governing the adjudications in this state our decisions leave no doubt. Thus in the early case of Touchard v. Touchard, 5 Cal. 307, it is said:

> "A corporation, both by the civil and common law, is a person, an artificial person; and although a municipal corporation has delegated to it certain powers of government, it is only in reference to those delegated powers that it will be regarded as a government. In reference to all other of its transactions, such as affect its ownership of property in buying, selling, or granting, and in reference to all matters of contract, it must be looked upon and treated as a private person."

In Bloom v. San Francisco, 64 Cal. 503, 3 Pac. 129, in the conduct of the municipal hospital the city and county maintained a nuisance. Action was brought to recover damages occasioned by this nuisance, and it was held that "the city and county of San Francisco had such proprietorship of the city and county hospital as rendered it liable for damages in the case as presented." In South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 Pac. 490, it is declared that in the carrying on of a water service for the benefit of South Pasadena the city of Pasadena will not be acting in its political, public, or governmental capacity. And in Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847, this court, reviewing our cases, and drawing the indicated distinction between governmental and proprietary functions, held that the negligent operation of an electric light plant by the city, which light plant was operated for the twofold purpose of lighting the city and furnishing electric light and power to its inhabitants, made the city liable, upon the ground that it was not exercising any governmental power or function.

[4] Nor is it difficult to set forth the definition of governmental functions as applied to a city. Under the theory of the common law, that the municipality is protected from liability only while exercising the delegated functions of sovereignty, the governmental powers of a city are those pertaining to the making and enforcing of police regulations, to prevent crime, to preserve the public health, to prevent fires, the caring for the poor, and the education of the young. And in the performance of these functions all buildings and instrumentalities connected therewith come under the application of the principle. City of Kokomo v. Loy (Ind.) 112 N. E. 994.

[5] But it is of course true that modern cities and towns enter upon many forms of activity, operate utilities for the benefit of the inhabitants, and provide many means for the easing or improving of the condition of the people that were never dreamed of at common law. Nevertheless the uniform holding as to all such activities on principles manifestly just to the people themselves is that no matter how beneficial they may be in a general sense to the inhabitants of the municipality, unless they are governmental in their essence, the municipality's conduct in managing them is controlled by the same rules of liability that apply to an individual. Thus, while schoolhouses, city halls, jails, fire houses, are with much uniformity held to be instrumentalities for governmental purposes, no such rule applies to other buildings constructed by a municipality, though for the benefit, convenience, or advantage of its people. And even in the case of strictly governmental buildings, if the city shall let a portion of one of them to a private tenant, while retaining control of the rest, that tenant is entitled to his recovery for the city's negligent maintenance of his premises. Worden v. New Bedford, 131 Mass. 23, 41 Am. Rep. 185.

[6] But when the building is one constructed and maintained not for governmental purposes, then are the authorities uniform that even though it be so maintained under permission of the statute, and though it be maintained for the benefit of the inhabitants, or for such of them as may desire to use it, the municipality acts in a private, proprietary capacity, and is liable for its torts as would be a private individual. The cases so holding with reference to municipal water plants and their structures, and gas plants and their structures, are so numerous as not even to call for specific citation. The same rule is universally applied to market houses built by the municipality and maintained for the convenience of the people. Barron v. Detroit, 94 Mich. 601, 54 N. W. 273, 19 L. R. A. 452, 34 Am. St. Rep. 366; Town of Suffolk v. Parker, 79 Va. 660, 52 Am. Rep. 640; Weymouth v. New Orleans, 40 La. Ann. 344, 4 South. 218; Baltimore v. Brannan, 14 Md. 227. As instances of the application of the same rule to other buildings may be cited Libby v. Portland, 105 Me. 370, 74 Atl. 805, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 141, 18 Ann. Cas. 547, Henderson v. Kansas City, 177 Mo. 477, 76 S. W. 1045, and Cowley v. Borough of Sunderland, 6 Hurlst. & N. 233. In this last case the borough of Sunderland, under the permission of a Victorian statute, maintained baths and washhouses for the use of the inhabitants. The argument was there made that the woman, injured in a mangle, which it was charged was negligently constructed and maintained, was a mere volunteer and licensee, and electing to use the machine could not recover. But answer was made that the statute was passed for the benefit of the poor and more ignorant classes of the population. The corporation chose to avail itself of its powers to erect these washhouses, and in the discharge of the statutory duty thus undertaken it was bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence.

[7] What, then, remains to be said concerning the building here under consideration? It was not a structure, the maintenance of which was enjoined by law. It was not a building used for any of the governmental functions of the municipality. True, it was maintained for the benefit of the municipality in the sense that it afforded the populace a meeting place for many forms of amusement and instruction. But in all these respects it differed no whit from any other auditorium or assembly hall built and maintained by private capital for the same purposes. The city had full charge of it, could let it out, or refuse to let it out at its pleasure. The act under which it was authorized, though not compelled to build it, contemplated that it should be let for profit, and that the proceeds of these lettings should go to defray the expense of maintenance and the cost of construction. That in any individual instance the city allowed it to be used without a rental charge, no more affected the governing principle than it would be affected if a private proprietor did the same thing. The payment of rent, much or little or none at all, did not transform the particular use of this assembly hall, which use was let or permitted for the celebration of the birthday of a foreign potentate, into a governmental function of the city of Long Beach. Appellant in its brief declares the proposition to be "whether the law authorizing the act was such as authorized a proprietary or governmental institution, and in this respect the design of the act is the main thing to be held in mind and not the result." Contemplating that design, and therein noting that the act provides for a rental charge for the use of the assembly hall, and contemplates that that rental charge should or may be sufficient to pay for the operating expenses, to provide a sinking fund, and even to contribute to the general funds of the city, can it be doubted for one moment that in the contemplation of the Legislature the city was simply empowered to enter into a proprietary business for its personal advantage and financial gain? Upon the other hand, that the city of Long Beach maintained this assembly hall for the very purposes indicated by the legislative permission is made manifest by the offered official resolution of the city, "fixing the charges for the use of the public auditorium in the city of Long Beach." In this resolution we find that conventions or mass meetings not for the purpose of financial gain, whether the assemblage be of the residents or nonresidents of the city of Long Beach, may have the use of the auditorium free. If financial gain enter into the purpose of the convention or mass meeting, then the charge shall be from $25 to $100 per day. When used by nonresidents of the city of Long Beach for purposes of entertainment and amusement the charge is $35 a day. When used by residents of the city of Long Beach for like purposes of amusement the charge is $15 a day. When used by nonresidents of the city of Long Beach for purely charitable or philanthropic purposes, if "an admission is charged, the proceeds to be used outside of the city of Long Beach, the charge shall be $25 a day. If only a collection is taken, the charge shall be $15." Wherein is to be drawn the slightest distinction between the use and operation of the city of Long Beach of this hall and the same use and occupation if it were owned by an individual and let for identical purposes? Nor does the fact that in an individual instance no rental charge was made at all affect the proposition, nor work a modification of the governing principle. A private individual granting the use of his hall for this occasion without rental charge would not be exonerated. The city of Long Beach, doing precisely the same thing, stands in precisely the same legal position. Therefore we consider the conclusion absolutely unescapable, upon principle and under the authorities, that the city of Long Beach was acting in a private and proprietary capacity in the general maintenance of this assembly hall, and was likewise so acting upon the specific occasion here in question when it was there let or its use permitted for the celebration of "Empire Day."

Neither of the California cases relied upon by appellant is at all in point. In Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416, plaintiff sought to recover damages from the state for injuries received at the state fair at Sacramento, and received a verdict which was set aside on motion. This court held that the state was not liable for two reasons: First, that it had distinctly disclaimed liability for the acts of its agents—the state board of agriculture—in declaring that "in no event shall the state be liable for any premium, award, or debt created by said board of agriculture," and it declared that such a liability for injury was within the meaning of this language. Second, it held that the state board of agriculture was a mere corporate agency of the state for public and governmental functions, saying:

> "We find none of the elements of a private corporation in its creation, its powers, or the mode of their exercise. Its objects are public and educational. * * * It exists for the sole purpose of promoting the public interest in the business of agriculture and kindred objects. It is an agency of the governemnt, and in no sense an organization for pecuniary profit to the state."

Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 Pac. 1000, was an action by an employé of the harbor commission to recover for injuries received while in the employ of the commission as a night deck hand on a tug belonging to the state. This case is distinguished in Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra, and in the latter case it is pointed out:

> "That the plaintiff, when injured, was employed in a distinct branch of the service, viz. the protection against or extinguishment of fires, which, even in the case of municipal corporations, is uniformly held to be the exercise of a purely governmental function."

The negligent maintenance of the structure was sufficiently established by the evidence to justify the implied finding of the jury.

The conclusion already expressed concerning the general purpose of the construction of this auditorium, and the specific purpose of its use upon the day in question does not at all depend upon the evidence which was introduced to the effect that the city did not charge any rental upon the day in question, and that it did rent portions of the auditorium for purposes of private gain. The fact that no rental was charged upon this particular day is in no wise determinative of the question, and the evidence of the rental for gain of portions of the structure and of the pier, even if excluded, could not have changed the inevitable result.

The appellant sought to introduce evidence to prove that the building was constructed in part upon tide lands belonging to the state, and that its construction and maintenance of the building under these circumstances was ultra vires. We can perceive no possible force to this contention, and state it only that it may appear that it has not been overlooked.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.; SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court. On the main question of the liability of municipalities for the negligence of their officers whereby personal injuries are caused, I am satisfied with the views expressed by Victor E. Shaw, Justice pro tem., upon the decision of the case at the former hearing. The following are the parts of that opinion wherein the question is discussed:

"Conceding negligence on the part of the officers and employés of the city by reason of which Edith Chafor was killed, is defendant liable in damages to the plaintiffs for such loss as they may have sustained by reason of her death? Municipal corporations in the performance of their functions act in a double character. Sections 38 and 1303, Dillon on Municipal Corp. (5th Ed.). In the one they, as subordinate agencies of the state, are intrusted with the exercise of limited governmental powers for the benefit of the local public, in the performance of which, in this state there being no statutory provision, they are not liable for the negligence of their officers, agents and servants through whom they act. See concurring opinion of Justice Shaw in the case of Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 75 [84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847], and authorities there cited. In the other, they may exercise powers conferred, not for the benefit of the public, but for their own private and pecuniary profit, in which case they are, in exercising such powers, liable for damages resulting from the negligence of their officers, agents and employés to the same extent and governed by the same rules as are applicable to corporations or individuals engaged in like business. Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra; Esberg Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Or. 282 [55 Pac. 961, 43 L. R. A. 435, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651]; Western S. F. Society v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 183 [72 Am. Dec. 730].

"This distinction is recognized and conceded by counsel for respondents, who insists that the construction, maintenance, and use of this assembly hall was not a governmental function, but that it was maintained, used, and operated purely as a corporate enterprise from which the city in its private or proprietary character received revenue, emolument, and gain, just as a city does in operating a lighting or water plant by means whereof the city distributes to its citizens, for hire and tolls, electric current or water. If respondents' position be sustained, it must follow that the city should be held liable to plaintiffs in damages. In support of their contention, respondents insist: First, that the statute heretofore referred to, pursuant to which bonds were issued for the construction of the hall, fixes the character thereof as private and proprietary; and, second, that the evidence shows that the assembly hall was erected and maintained by the city in its proprietary capacity, and from the letting of which and exacting rentals for the use thereof it derived revenue, gain, and profit.

"Respondents' proposition that the character, use, and maintenance of the assembly hall or auditorium is conclusively fixed as proprietary, as distinguished from governmental, is based upon section 8 of the legislative act referred to (Stats. 1903, p. 412), pursuant to which, as stated, bonds were issued and from the proceeds of the sale of which the building was constructed. This section provides: 'All moneys derived from the use or hire of such assembly or convention hall shall be deposited in the treasury of the municipality to the credit of said public hall fund, and shall be applied, exclusively, to the following purposes, to wit: First, for the necessary expenses of conducting, maintaining, and insuring such hall, and of making all improvements and repairs thereof. Second, for the payment of installments of interest or principal becoming due on said bonds until the whole of said bonded indebtedness shall have been paid. Third, any surplus remaining after providing for the purposes, first and second above specified, may be appropriated and used for general municipal purposes.' At the time in question the city of Long Beach, operating under a freeholder's charter, had a board of public works, which, not only as provided in section 9 of the act, but in the charter as well, committed to said board the control, management, letting, and use of such hall. Save as to these provisions, the act is silent as to the capacity, whether governmental or private, in which the city should construct and maintain the hall. That the city might let the hall for private use, exacting a rental therefor, admits of no question. The act itself, however, does not restrict nor purport to limit the power of the city to such use of the hall. On the contrary, as declared pursuant to section 2 thereof, the public interest and necessity demanded the construction of such hall, which, as we construe it, was intended for use by the city in a dual capacity; that is, both governmental and private. It might be and, as shown by the evidence, was used as a meeting place for its legislative body, for gatherings to discuss questions of public interest, for religious and political conventions, for recreation, amusement, or educational purposes; the function of providing a place for such meetings being purely governmental in character for the general benefit of the public. Clarke v. Inhabitants of Brookfield, 81 Mo. 503 [51 Am. Rep. 243]. On the other hand, as determined by the city, it might, through its proper officers, let all or any part of the structure for private uses, exacting rentals therefor, in which case the revenue derived must be applied as provided by section 8 of the act. In the case of Davis v. Rockport, 213 Mass. 279 [100 N. E. 612, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139], it is said: 'A municipality has the power to let for profit real estate held for public purposes and not needed for the present for such a purpose. It is not compelled to let the property lie idle. * * * It either could allow the property to remain unused or it could let the same or any part thereof for profit. If it took the former course, it was answerable only as a municipality in possession of property intended for public use. If it took the latter course then it became answerable as a private owner.' Not infrequently cities, anticipating future needs, acquire property for a public use and until devoted to such purpose let the same for private use for hire. The city of Los Angeles furnishes an illustration of the principle here stated. It holds real estate purchased for public purposes which, not presently required therefor, it lets for private uses. In Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1657, it is said: 'It has been held that the maintenance of a city hall for the use of the city officers and employés, as well as for the transaction of the city's business, is the exercise of a governmental function, and that the city cannot impliedly be held liable for negligence on the part of its officers and agents in maintaining and repairing the city hall or in controlling and managing the same. But the liability of the city has been sustained where the city has rented out the city hall building or some considerable part thereof, and the person injured had come to the building to transact business with the city's tenants.' Little v. City of Holyoke, 58 N. E. 170. The principle is further illustrated by city water systems which, like this hall, serve a dual purpose; one being governmental in supplying water through hydrants for fire protection, and the other private in supplying water for profit for the use of its inhabitants. If an individual sustains damage by reason of the negligence of the city in the operation of a plant for supplying water to its inhabitants, it, like an individual, is liable therefor. Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316 [55 Pac. 1000]; Esberg Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Or. 282 [55 Pac. 961, 43 L. R. A. 435, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651]. On the other hand, if the damage results from the operation of the plant in the exercise of the power of the city in affording protection from fire, then the city is not accountable for such damages. Judson v. Borough of Winsted, 80 Conn. 384 [68 Atl. 999, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 91]. Our conclusion is that the act was not designed as requiring the hall to be constructed and maintained by the city in its private corporate character for emolument and gain, but that it was intended for either private or governmental use, varying from time to time as the city, through its proper officers, might determine.

"Since there is nothing in the act of the Legislature which fixed the capacity in which the city held and conducted the hall or restricted the purpose for which it should be used, the question becomes one of fact to be determined from the evidence.

"This brings us to respondents' second proposition, namely, that defendant at all times conducted and operated the assembly hall, not in the exercise of a governmental function, but in the capacity of a private corporation and proprietor thereof, by letting the same for private uses and reserving rental for such use. It does not appear from the record that the board of public works which, under the charter and act of the Legislature, had control of the letting and charge of the hall, ever at any time authorized the use of it for holding the exercises on what was termed 'Empire Day' to commemorate the birthday of Queen Victoria. Indeed, so far as disclosed, the committee of persons in charge of the celebration assumed the right to hold the exercises there, without consulting with defendant or any of its officials. Waiving this informality, however, and conceding that such authority and right were implied, no pretense or claim is made that the hall was let for hire, or that any rental or revenue was exacted for its use on said occasion. Indeed, with the exception of one occasion in March, 1910, when the assembly hall was by the city council, for a consideration of $25 paid to the city clerk, let for the purposes of a lecture delivered therein, the record fails to disclose that the assembly hall proper, as disconnected from two booths or rooms, was ever at any time let for hire for any private purpose whatsoever. On the contrary, during the same period of time, it appears that the city, at large expense for services of janitors and other necessary charges of maintenance, has devoted it to the use of the public, wherein to hold political, religious, and other meetings, concerts by the municipal band, school commencements, and, indeed, all sorts of meetings of a public nature and for the public benefit, for which no rental or charge was exacted. Notwithstanding such fact, however, the trial court, upon the apparent theory that the structure wherein the hall was located, together with the pier and wharf, should be regarded as one unit and the whole thereof be deemed a 'public assembly convention hall,' permitted plaintiffs to introduce evidence showing that since 1908 defendant had received as hire for the two booths, one in the northwest corner and one in the northeast corner of the building, the combined area of which was 1,582 square feet as compared with an area of 17,446 square feet in the hall proper, the sum of $1,461; that for certain booths and rooms erected at the ocean end of the pier extending more than 1,000 feet beyond the assembly hall building, the city had received several thousand dollars revenue for rent thereof, and the sum of $2,000 for a franchise or permit issued to a bathhouse company to construct and maintain a pipe line along the pier by means whereof to obtain water for its bathhouse, besides receipts of other revenues from the use of the pier and wharf. In admitting such evidence the trial court committed prejudicial error. In our opinion, the pier and wharf and booths at the end thereof were no part of the assembly hall building, but entirely distinct and separate therefrom, as much so, indeed, as though the approach or way covering the intervening space between the pier and entrance to the hall had never been constructed. Hence the rental received from this pier and wharf could not be deemed revenue derived from the letting of the assembly hall for hire.

"We perceive no reason why a municipality having a city hall building erected solely for public uses, may not let rooms therein which are not immediately required for such public use, as to which it would occupy the position of a corporate proprietor and as such, like a private owner, be liable for damages sustained by reason of its negligence in connection therewith. 'When a city or town does not devote such building (public hall) exclusively to municipal uses, but lets it or a part of it for its own advantage and emolument, by receiving rents, or otherwise, it is liable while it is so let in the same manner as a private owner would be.' Worden v. City of New Bedford, 131 Mass. 23 [41 Am. Rep. 185]; Little v. City of Holyoke, 177 Mass. 114 [58 N. E. 170, 52 L. R. A. 417]; Chicago v. Selz, 202 Ill. 545 [67 N. E. 386]; Davis v. Rockport, 213 Mass. 279 [100 N. E. 612, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139]. This being true, the letting for hire of these two small booths, disconnected as they were from the assembly hall, as to which defendant's character was that of a private owner, did not fix or affect its character or function in the maintenance of the assembly hall. They were no part of the hall and, like the wharf, the rental received for the use thereof was not for the letting of the hall for hire. Hence it follows that the ruling of the court in admitting evidence of the letting of these two booths was likewise erroneous.

"Not only was there no evidence of the letting of the assembly hall by the city or its officers, but there was no evidence nor is there any claim or pretense, that any rental was exacted or paid for such use upon the occasion of the accident wherein Edith Chafor lost her life.

"The building or structure abutted a street on the easterly side thereof from which the hall could be reached by a stairway leading to the entrance of the building. The building was a two-story structure, the lower floor being uninclosed and at all times open to any one desiring to go there. The second floor upon which the assembly hall was located was surrounded by an open and covered balcony 11 feet wide, furnished with seats, and open at all times to the general public, the use of which and the lower floor may be likened to the use of a public city park. It thus appears that the building was not only designed and constructed for a double use, but that in the conduct and maintenance thereof the city has in part used it in its private corporate capacity in letting for hire the two small booths referred to; that it has used a part thereof, to wit, the balconies and lower floor, at all times in its governmental capacity, like a public park, and that, with the exception of one occasion, in March, 1910, has used the assembly hall at all times without profit, gain or emolument for the benefit of the general public.

"If correct in our conclusion that the maintenance and use of the hall was not impressed with an exclusive proprietary character, but that the character of the use on the occasion in question must be determined from evidence showing a letting of the hall for private use for hire, as to which the record is wholly silent, it necessarily follows that the court committed highly prejudicial error in, of its own motion, instructing the jury that 'the construction, erection and maintenance of the auditorium building by the city of Long Beach was an act of said city in the exercise of its proprietary or private capacity, and the measure of its responsibility or liability in relation thereto is the same as that of any other individual or private corporation engaged in similar conduct, and no more or no less.'"

For the foregoing reasons, I am of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

LEGERTON v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1892.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Jan. 26, 1917.)

1. Judges 🔑5—Superior Judge—Election—Necessity of Commission by Governor.

Pol. Code, § 1288, requires a county clerk after election of officers chosen at large and judicial officers to make out a statement of the vote of his county as entered upon the records of the board of supervisors and certify the same to the secretary of state. Section 1290 provides that the secretary of state must make out and file a statement of election and submit a copy to the Governor. By section 1291 the Governor is required to issue commissions to parties elected. Section 907 provides that an officer shall within 30 days after notice take his oath of office. On November 3d petitioner was elected judge of the superior court. On December 6th following he received his commission from the secretary of state signed by the Governor. Prior thereto petitioner sought to qualify by taking his oath and filing a copy with secretary of state; the board of supervisors having completed canvass of returns and declared petitioner elected. Held that, until secretary of state had certified the results of the election to the Governor and the Governor issued his commission, petitioner was not entitled to take office.

2. Officers 🔑95—Compensation—De Facto Officers.

The collection of the salary annexed to the office is an incident to the title, and a de facto officer cannot recover compensation for his services.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Curtis C. Legerton against John S. Chambers, State Controller. Writ denied.

Curtis C. Legerton, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

JAMES, J. Petitioner herein was at the general election held in November, 1914, elected to the office of judge of the superior court in the county of Los Angeles for the "short" term; that is, the term intervening between the end of the term of the incumbent who was appointed to fill a vacancy and the commencement of the regular term next succeeding. In this case the short term ended upon the incoming of the newly elected officer, who was other than this petitioner, in January, 1915. The election took place on the 3d of November, and on the 6th day of December following petitioner received from the secretary of state a commission signed by the Governor. Prior to that date, however, and on the 19th day of November, petitioner sought to qualify for the office by taking the oath and filing a copy thereof with the secretary of state. He did in fact enter upon the duties of the office at that date, and so continued up to the time he received his commission, and afterwards during the short term. On the 18th day of November, 1914, the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles completed the canvass of the returns, and petitioner alleges that said board thereupon "declared your petitioner elected to said office of judge of the superior court." These facts are set forth in the petition which was filed herein. The answer as made by the controller in effect raises issues of law, and the matter has been submitted upon the points and authorities filed by petitioner and a brief for respondent.

[1, 2] The two principal questions presented are: (1) Was petitioner, upon the canvassing of the vote as made by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, entitled to immediately assume office as an officer de jure? (2) If he was not so entitled, and because of his assumption of the duties of the office he became a de facto officer, was he under such circumstances entitled to the salary attached to the office? In many of the cases cited by the petitioner, all, however, from other jurisdictions, it is held that the issuance of a commission is not a necessary prerequisite to the determination of the fact that an officer has been duly elected. Under our statute, however, the various duties to be performed by not only the canvassing boards at the election, but the certifying officers thereafter, are held to be a part of the machinery of the election, until the performance of which there can be no legal determination as to the results. In the case of a superior judge the board of supervisors is without power to issue a certificate of election, because the office is viewed as a state office. The statute expressly excludes the board of supervisors from any such right when it provides that, after election returns have been canvassed:

"The county clerk must immediately make out and deliver to such person (except to the person elected superior judge) a certificate of election signed by him, and authenticated with the seal of the superior court." Pol. Code, § 1284.

Section 1288 of the same Code requires each county clerk, in the cases of "officers chosen by the electors of the state at large, or for judicial officers," to make out a statement of the vote of his county as entered upon the records of the board of supervisors, and certify the same and transmit the statement to the secretary of state. Section 1290 of the same Code provides as follows:

> "On the fortieth day after the day of election, or so soon as the returns have been received from all of the counties of the state, if received within that time, * * * the secretary of state must compare and estimate the vote, and make out and file in his office a statement thereof, and transmit a copy of such statement to the Governor, except in the cases of senators and members of the assembly."

Section 1291, immediately following, reads:

> "Upon receipt of such copy the Governor must issue commissions to the persons who from it appear to have received the highest number of votes for offices, except that of Governor or Lieutenant Governor, to be filled at such election."

The provision as to the taking of an oath of office contains the requirement that the oath shall be subscribed and filed within 30 days after the officer has "notice" of his election or appointment, or before the expiration of 15 days from the commencement of his term. Section 907, Pol. Code. In People v. Shaver, 127 Cal. 350, 59 Pac. 785, speaking of the requirement that the county clerk shall issue a certificate of election to a candidate, our Supreme Court has declared that this procedure is something more than a mere form for the private advantage of the candidate. The court says:

> "It is the mode prescribed for the orderly announcement of the result of an election, and is as much a part of machinery of the election as are the provisions for the canvassing of the returns and the registration of the result."

The court cites State v. Meder, 22 Nev. 264, 38 Pac. 668, and People v. North, 72 N. Y. 128. The opinions in the cases last referred to fully sustain the quoted portion of the opinion of the court in the Shaver Case. It must be concluded, therefore, that until the secretary of state had certified the result of the election to the Governor, and the Governor had upon examining the same issued his commission, the person elected was not entitled to take office. This is not a case where there was any failure on the part of the certifying officers to act within the time required by law; hence any questions which might be presented affecting such condition do not arise.

It has been repeatedly held that, as the collection of salary or compensation annexed to an office is an incident to the title to the office, de facto officers, whose acts for the sake of public interest may be held legal, cannot recover compensation for their services. People v. Potter, 63 Cal. 127; Burke v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 182, 7 Pac. 488; Anderson v. Lewis, 29 Cal. App. 24, 154 Pac. 287.

It follows as a necessary conclusion that the petitioner is not entitled to the writ, and the prayer of the petition is therefore denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Curtis C. Legerton against Walter A. Lewis, County Auditor. Writ issued, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with costs.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Robert B Murphey and David R. Faries, Deputies Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Curtis C. Legerton, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

JAMES, J. An appeal was taken in this case by the county auditor of the county of Los Angeles from a judgment awarding writ of mandate to compel the issuance of a warrant in favor of petitioner for the sum of $131.99 as payment for that portion of the salary of a superior judge payable from the county of Los Angeles for a period from the 19th day of November, 1914, to December 5, 1914. The preliminary facts in this case are the same as those in Legerton v. Chambers (Civil No. 1892) 163 Pac. 678, this day decided. There was interposed in this case a defense additional to that presented in the case referred to, whereby the auditor showed that there had been filed with him an abstract of a judgment rendered against petitioner in the justice's court of Los Angeles township in the sum of $299.77. It is stipulated by counsel that this matter may be submitted upon the briefs and authorities filed in this and in the case of Legerton v. Chambers. The trial judge by his judgment determined that petitioner was a duly elected superior judge and a de jure officer from the 19th day of November to the 5th day of December, and that he was entitled to his salary as such. He determined the issue as to the filing of the abstract of judgment in favor of the county auditor, but in the conclusions of law attached to the finding declared:

"That the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as said provisions affect the salary of a judge of the superior court, are unconstitutional."

What is said in the opinion in the case of Legerton v. Chambers disposes of this appeal in favor of the appellant, and it will be unnecessary to repeat what has been in that opinion declared as our view of the law.

[1, 2] Petitioner being held to have acted only as a de facto officer, under the authorities cited he is not entitled to collect the salary. We are furnished with no argument either attacking the constitutionality of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure or opposing such a position. From a careful reading of the section, however, there occur to us no constitutional grounds upon which it may be concluded that the officers' salaries subject to the process of garnishment thereunder are salaries of officers other than judges of the superior court. In the absence of argument or citation of authority, it is unnecessary to express any final conclusion as to that matter.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the superior court to enter upon the findings made a judgment in favor of the defendant auditor; appellant to have his costs.

1. Corporations ⟹577—Change of Name—Identity.

The identity of a corporation is not destroyed, nor its legal obligations obliterated, by the mere fact of reincorporation under the same or different name, and the transfer of corporate assets from the old to the new corporation will, where it is sought to escape debts, be considered as done to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors of the old corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Paul Strahm against George G. Fraser and others, and Fraser Studios, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Curtis Hillyer, of San Francisco, for appellant. Carl W. Mueller, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff was employed by Vaughn & Fraser, a corporation, as assistant operator in a photographic studio at a salary of $90 per month. Subsequent to the rendition of his services Vaughn & Fraser transferred all of its properties to the defendant corporation Fraser Studios. Plaintiff sued for labor and services, rendered, joining as defendants George G. Fraser and Mary L. Fraser, individually and as trustees of Vaughn & Fraser, a corporation; George G. Fraser, doing business as Vaughn & Fraser; Vaughn & Fraser, a corporation, and Fraser Studios, a corporation. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against defendants, including the appellant, Fraser Studios, a corporation, for the sum of $735, with interest and costs, and this appeal is from said judgment.

The point presented for reversal is that there was no evidence to support a finding that Fraser Studios—which was organized and incorporated subsequent to the termination of the employment of the plaintiff—could be held liable as an original contractor, no showing having been made that it ever assumed the obligation in suit. The sole question, therefore, is whether or not Fraser Studios and Vaughn & Fraser are substantially the same corporation.

[1] As indicating the substantial identity of the two corporations, it appears in evidence that the same premises were occupied by the two corporations, that the same furniture was used in the business of the two corporations, and that the old names were publicly displayed at the original place of business. It is well settled that the identity of a corporation is not destroyed, nor are its legal obligations obliterated, by the mere fact of reincorporation under the same or a different name, and a transfer of the corporate assets from the old to the new corporation will, when warranted by the pleadings and proof, be considered as having been done to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors of the old corporation. Koch v. Speedwell Motor Car Co., 24 Cal. App. 123, 140 Pac. 598, 600; 2 Clark & Marsh on Corp. § 342.

[2, 3] It is insisted, however, by appellant that under the new incorporation a new stockholder had invested a certain sum for a half interest therein, and that as the evidence fails to show what proportion the property transferred bears to the amount so invested, it would be inequitable to subject the new interest to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. However this may be, the old corporation and its property were liable to the demands of the plaintiff, and the new corporation must respond to the extent of the property thus acquired, which, if it be insignificant, as is claimed on behalf of the appellant, was a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the new corporation, and no attempt was made by it, in its defense to the action in the court below, to show what was the fact in this behalf. The evidence shows that the old corporation, Vaughn & Fraser, forfeited its charter for the nonpayment of a license tax, and transferred all of its property to the defendant corporation, Fraser Studios, which apparently was but a mere continuation and reorganization of the old corporation of Vaughn & Fraser. Under these circumstances and the authorities cited, plaintiff, we think, was entitled to have the new corporation respond to his demand. Hibernia Ins. Co. v. Transportation Co. (C. C.) 13 Fed. 516.

In an action against an indorser of a note, evidence held to warrant a finding that plaintiff by his agent made due and diligent search to locate the residence and place of business of the indorser to serve her with notice of presentment, dishonor, and nonpayment, and hence that notice of dishonor was excused under Civ. Code, § 3155.

2. Pleading ⟹236(5) — Amendment — At Trial—Conforming to Proof.

In an action on a note, where the evidence showed facts excusing service of notice of dishonor upon the defendant indorser, it was no abuse of discretion for the court to allow plaintiff at trial to amend his complaint, which originally alleged service of the notice of dishonor, so as to allege facts showing the excuse.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by F. E. Seely against Stoltz's, Inc., C. A. Meyer, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant Meyer appeals. Affirmed.

Marshall B. Woodworth, Edward Lande, and Emilio Lastreto, all of San Francisco, for appellant. S. C. Wright, of San Francisco (Nathan Newmark, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Mrs. C. A. Meyer, one of the defendants in this action, was an accommodation indorser of a negotiable promissory note executed to the plaintiff by the defendant Stoltz's, Inc. Defendant Meyer alone appeals from the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial.

The plaintiff's original complaint, in so far as it purported to state a cause of action against the defendant Meyer as an indorser, proceeded upon the theory that she had been given the notice of dishonor required by section 3116 of the Civil Code, and that such notice had been given in the manner and within the time required by sections 3147 and 3148 of the same Code. During the progress of the trial, however, it developed that the plaintiff had not strictly complied with the statutory requirements concerning the giving of notice of dishonor, and thereupon, in response to defendant's motion for nonsuit, the plaintiff sought and was granted permission to amend his complaint to conform to the proof by alleging that his failure to give the required notice was attributable to the fact that after due and diligent search he was unable to ascertain the residence, place of business, or whereabouts of the defendant Meyer. With the complaint thus amended the trial of the action proceeded, and when the plaintiff again rested, the motion for nonsuit upon behalf of the defendant Meyer was renewed upon the ground that the plaintiff's evidence failed to show that he had exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain the place of residence and whereabouts of said defendant, and that therefore his failure to give the notice of dishonor was not excused by the provisions of section 3155 of the Civil Code.

[1] Upon this phase of the case the evidence was to the effect that on the afternoon of the day when the note in suit fell due the agent of the plaintiff called at the office of the defendant corporation, the maker of the note, for the purpose of demanding payment, and was informed by a stenographer in charge of the office that both the president and secretary of the corporation were not in. Later on the same day the plaintiff's agent again called, and meeting either the president or secretary, demanded payment of the note. Payment was refused. At about 5 o'clock on the same day plaintiff's agent called upon the defendant Aronsohn, who was also an indorser on the note, and presented him with a written notice of dishonor and a demand for payment. Plaintiff's agent at the same time asked Aronsohn for the address of the defendant Meyer. Aronsohn thereupon gave to him a written memorandum, showing the resident address of Mrs.

Meyer to be 1654 Divisadero street in the city and county of San Francisco. Plaintiff's agent then proceeded to the office of the defendant corporation, where he met Stoltz, Sr., and Jr., respectively the president and secretary of the corporation, and, after some conversation concerning the note and its nonpayment, rewrote on an envelope in the presence of the Stoltzes the address of defendant Meyer as previously given him by Aronsohn. On the following day close to the noon hour, plaintiff's agent went to the address given him by Aronsohn, but was unable to find the defendant Meyer there or ascertain her whereabouts. Plaintiff's agent then proceeded to his office, arriving there about 1 o'clock, and there prepared a notice of nonpayment and dishonor, which was mailed to Mrs. Meyer later in the afternoon.

This evidence, we think, justified the denial of the motion for nonsuit, and sufficiently supports the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiff by his agent had made due and diligent search to locate the residence and place of business of the defendant Meyer for the purpose of serving her with notice of presentment, dishonor, and nonpayment of the note in suit.

[2] We see no abuse of discretion in the ruling of the trial court permitting the plaintiff to amend his complaint.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

The petition for a rehearing is denied. It is based upon the sole ground that the court failed to consider and pass upon the sufficiency of the complaint as finally amended at the trial. The only appellant herein is the defendant Meyer. The original complaint was insufficient in its averments as to notice of dishonor as against the special demurrer of Meyer. The amendment, however, made during the trial pleaded an excuse for giving Meyer notice of dishonor substantially in the language of subdivision 1 of section 3155 of the Civil Code. To this amendment, which obviated the effect of appellant's original special demurrer, no demurrer, either general or special, was presented. We think it sufficiently rectified the defect in the original complaint in the absence of a special demurrer.

BETTENCOURT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KINGS COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2191.)

1. Divorce 🔑161 — Judgment — Default — Time for Opening.

Service and filing of a notice that a motion will be made on a day after expiration of six months to vacate and set aside an interlocutory decree of divorce is not an application within six months within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the vacation of certain judgments where application is made within six months after the taking of judgment.

2. Judgment 🔑153(2) — Default — Setting Aside—Motion—Sufficiency.

In August defendant served and filed a notice that on September 11th she would move the court to set aside an interlocutory judgment. The minutes of the court for September 11th show the following: "The motion to vacate and set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce coming on regularly to be heard at this time, and H. Scott Jacobs, Esq., attorney for plaintiff, and J. L. C. Irwin, Esq., attorney for defendant, being present, it is ordered by consent of attorneys for both parties that the same be continued to Saturday, September 16th." September 16th was more than six months after judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizes the vacation of certain judgments where application is made within six months after entry. Held, that the proceedings had before the court on September 11th, being treated by judge and attorneys as such, was an application, and that, although the order was not made until September 16th, court did not lose jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 300.]

Petition by Joe A. Bettencourt for a writ of review against the Superior Court of the County of Kings and another. Writ granted, and order of the Superior Court affirmed.

H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for petitioner.

J. L. C. Irwin, of Hanford, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On March 13, 1916, in an action for divorce wherein petitioner, Joe A. Bettencourt, was plaintiff and Antonia de Gelloria Bettencourt was defendant, and wherein the default of the defendant had been duly entered, an interlocutory judgment of divorce was duly filed and entered. In August, 1916, the defendant served and filed a notice of motion, together with affidavits and a copy of her proposed answer, stating in the notice that on September 11, 1916, she would move the court to vacate and set aside her default and the said interlocutory judgment, upon the ground that said default and interlocutory judgment of divorce were taken, made, and entered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of the defendant. The minutes of the superior court for September 11, 1916, show the following proceeding in said action:

> "The motion to vacate and set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce, coming on regularly to be heard at this time, and H. Scott Jacobs, Esq., attorney for the plaintiff, and J. L. C. Irwin, Esq., attorney for the defendant, being present, it is ordered, by consent of attorneys for both parties, that the same be continued to Saturday, September 16, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m."

The minutes of September 16th in the same action show the presence in court of the same attorneys—

> "and the motion to vacate and set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce, coming on regularly to be heard at this time, the same was argued by the respective counsel, and the court, being fully advised, orders that said motion be granted."

The foregoing facts appear from the return of respondent to the writ of review heretofore issued out of this court on petition of the plaintiff, Joe A. Bettencourt.

[1, 2] The order setting aside the interlocutory decree was concerning a matter arising under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect—

> "provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken."

Petitioner claims that from the foregoing record it appears that the application for relief was not made within six months after the 13th day of March, 1916, at which time the six months' period mentioned in section 473, began to run, and therefore that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order of September 16th. If the record of proceedings had on September 11th is sufficient to support the inference that the application for relief was made on the 11th day of September, then the fact that the continuance was had and the order was not made until September 16th would not impair the jurisdiction of the court. Notice that an application or motion will be made to the court at a specified time, even though such notice be filed, as well as served, is not itself an application or motion. And it has been held that, where notice of motion for relief under section 473, was served and filed prior to the expiration of the six months' period, and the notice gave warning that the motion would be made on the stated day, which was after the six months expired, the application was not made in time, and the court was not authorized to act thereon. Thomas v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 629, 632, 92 Pac. 739.

The principal difficulty with this case arises from the absence of a specific statement in the record that on September 11th the motion or application was made. In Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 29 Pac. 299, the court was considering an appeal from an order refusing to recall an execution. Notice had been given that the motion would be made on a certain day. The only thing tending to show that a motion was made was a recital in the order appealed from that "the cause came on to be heard this day on defendant's motion to vacate and set aside writ of execution." The Supreme Court held that the record was insufficient to show that a motion was actually made. But in Townsend v. Parker, 21 Cal. App. 317, 131 Pac. 766, the First District Court of Appeal reached a different conclusion upon somewhat similar facts. The case was one referring to an order of the justice's court setting aside a judgment, and the question was whether the application was made within due time under section 859, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring that the application for such relief be made within ten days after notice of entry of judgment. On January 6, 1912, notice of motion was given that the stated motion would be made on Monday, January 8th, which was the last day of the time within which the application might be made. The justice's docket, as shown by the return to the writ of review, showed that on January 8th, at the hour mentioned in the notice, attorneys for the plaintiff and attorneys for the defendant appeared "for the hearing upon the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment of default made and entered herein." But at that time, upon request of the plaintiff's attorney and consent of defendant's attorney, the hearing of said motion was continued until January 10th, which was beyond the time limited for making such an application under section 859. It was held by the District Court of Appeal that the foregoing facts stated in the docket of the justice were sufficient to make it appear that the defendant did move on the 8th day of January, and that the application was made within time. The court thereupon affirmed the judgment of the superior court affirming and approving the order of the justice's court. A petition for rehearing by the Supreme Court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal was denied.

It appears to us that there is no material difference between the facts shown by the record in the present proceeding and the facts set forth in Townsend v. Parker. Upon the authority of that case we hold that the application for relief by defendant in the case of Bettencourt v. Bettencourt was made within time. This is the more satisfactory conclusion also, because it is in harmony with the requirement of good faith between parties litigant. In substance, if not in form, the application was before the court on the 11th day of September. It was treated as such, both by the judge and by the attorneys in the case. Under such circumstances this court should incline, as far as it reasonably may, toward construing the facts favorably to the jurisdiction of the lower court to proceed further, rather than to sustain an objection which was not urged at the proper time.

The order is affirmed.

HOMICIDE ⚷250—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held sufficient to justify conviction of murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Joseph M. Perry was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. N. Peter, of Quincy, and S. C. Young, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was informed against for the crime of murder, and was found guilty by the jury, and was sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the state penitentiary for the period of his natural life. He appeals from the judgment of conviction. The transcript was filed July 26, 1916. Defendant's attorneys have filed no brief or points and authorities. The case was placed upon the January calendar, and, there being no appearance for defendant, on motion of the Attorney General the case was submitted on the record. We have examined the evidence, and are satisfied that it was sufficient to justify the verdict.

The homicide occurred at the Feather River Inn, Plumas county, on the night of May 8, 1916. Deceased, James Harrigan, was occupying a tent about 50 feet from another tent occupied by witness Rorabaugh. During the night of May 8th, at about 1:20 a. m., witness Rorabaugh testified that he was awakened by loud talking and quarreling going on at Harrigan's tent; that he recognized the voice of the man other than Harrigan as that of defendant, Perry. He was asked what was said and what they were quarreling about.

"A. Well, they started in—I heard Harrigan say, 'Get away from here you old ———,' and the other party says, 'Well, I will stay here as long as I want to,' and Harrigan says, 'Get away, get away from here—get the hell out of here.' In that manner, and the quarreling went along just so, and this man left, says, 'I will go get my gun and I will fix you.' Q. Who was that man? A. Joseph Perry. * * * Q. And how were you able to observe the man leaving there? A. Looking out from under my tent—the side of it next to Harrigan's tent. Q. After Perry left there did he return? A. Yes, sir; in the neighborhood of five minutes. Q. Upon his return please state to the jury what took place. A. Well, he came up and says, 'Well, I am back again.' And Harrigan again told him, he says, 'Get away from here.' He says 'Get away, G—— d—— you, get away.' And the quarreling went on as I have used the language at first, and they quarreled there for about perhaps a minute or a minute and a half; then I heard the gun fired; I heard the gunshot; I also seen it; I also seen the fire."

He testified that Perry had a lighted lantern on his left arm and "the gun in two hands" (showing). The tent was closed, Harrigan on the inside and Perry on the outside "about two feet—about two foot in front of the tent—from the tent." It appeared that a bullet hole was found "right close to the flap, the opening of the tent," and Harrigan was found "lying there dead." Witness Margon occupied a tent about 200 feet from Harrigan's and between Harrigan's and Perry's. Margon testified that defendant came to his tent during the night of June 8th and awoke him. He testified:

"Well he came there and call me four or five times, 'Margon, Margon.' I said, 'What you want?' 'Open the tent,' he said, 'I want to come in.' 'No,' I said, 'Joe, better go home; I want to sleep; it is too late now.' Well he said, 'I want to tell you,' he said, 'I have trouble with one man up there,' he said, 'I want to fix him.' I said, 'Go on home,' I said, 'go home.' 'Well, I go home,' he says, 'and get my gun and come up and fix him.' Q. He said, 'I go home and get my gun and fix him'? A. Yes, sir; four or five minutes I see the light go by there and hear the shot. Q. How long was it you say between the time you saw the light go by and you heard the shot? A. One and one-half minutes."

Witness Martini was sleeping in Margon's tent at the time, and was awakened by Perry's call to Margon. He testified to facts about the same as given by Margon.

There were other facts and circumstances shown tending to corroborate the testimony of Rorabaugh and make it reasonably certain that defendant killed the deceased.

When the sentence was imposed the court made the following statement:

"The Court: On the 10th day of May, 1916, an information was filed in this court against you by the district attorney charging you with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on the 8th day of May, 1916, in the county of Plumas, state of California, by then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought killing and murdering one James Harrigan, a human being. On this information you were arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and, having no means to employ counsel, the court appointed two attorneys of this court to defend you. These attorneys did everything that is possible for an attorney to do for a client, and took care of your interests, the court believes, as well and as conscientiously as they would had you been paying them a handsome compensation. The court will now ask you if you have any legal reason to urge why the judgment of the court should not be pronounced upon you. (No answer.) The Court: It appearing none, the judgment of this court is that you be imprisoned in the state's prison at San Quentin for the term of your natural life. The evidence presented shows this crime to have been one which may well be classed as that of murder of the first degree. The jury after hearing the evidence determined that you were the person who committed the crime, and, viewing the matter in that light, the court, in its judgment, has imposed upon you the life sentence."

The jury appears to have been fully and correctly instructed as to the law, and we discover no prejudicial rulings made in the course of the trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HENSON. (Cr. 518.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑517(4)—Confessions—Foundation—Corpus Delicti.

In trial for robbery, testimony of the victim as to being held up as stated in the information was sufficient proof, without corroboration, of the corpus delicti, to render admissible testimony of accused's confessions.

2. Criminal Law 🔑511(7) — Accomplice — Corroborating Evidence.

Facts admitted by accused in his conversations with police officers, for which proper foundation was laid by testimony showing these confessions were free and voluntary, constituted evidence sufficient to corroborate testimony of an accomplice under Pen. Code, § 1111, as to corroboration, since in itself and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice it tended to connect defendant with the commission of the offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Frank Henson was convicted of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

C. B. Conlin, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and has been sentenced to a term in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant claims that the court erred in admitting testimony of confessions made by him, because the people had failed to establish the corpus delicti. This claim is manifestly wrong. The first witness at the trial was E. Lubansky, the victim of the robbery, who testified fully to the facts showing that he was held up and robbed at the time and place referred to in the information. There is no merit in the proposition of counsel for appellant that corroboration of the testimony of Lubansky was legally necessary.

[2] It is next complained that the testimony of the witness Brown showed that he was an accomplice, and that his testimony was not corroborated. But the record shows that in so far as the testimony of the witness Brown had any tendency to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, such testimony was amply corroborated by other evidence "which in itself and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." Pen. Code, § 1111. The facts admitted by the defendant in his conversations with certain police officers were sufficient to establish his guilt. A proper foundation was laid for the evidence by testimony showing that these confessions were free and voluntary. One of these statements was made by defendant in the presence of his father. The criticisms directed by counsel toward this evidence relate to the weight of the evidence, rather than to its admissibility. But it was for the jury and is not for this court to determine whether such evidence was worthy of belief.

Complaint is further made that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking certain questions and in making certain statements to the jury. These matters are of such slight importance that we are not justified in entering into a discussion of them. It appears that the defendant had a fair trial, and that upon entirely sufficient evidence he was found guilty of the crime charged.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Application by the County of Modoc for writ of review to annul award of the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California to Otto Lytle. Award annulled.

There is no real controversy as to the law. It is conceded that the inquiry here can extend only to the question of jurisdiction, and that, if there is no substantial evidence to support a material finding of the commission, the award must be set aside and annulled. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35; Employers' Assurance Corporation Limited v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., 170 Cal. 800, 151 Pac. 423.

[1] It is also not disputed that the question of whether the accident occurred in the course of the employment involves a vital jurisdictional consideration, and it may be stated in the language of the county that "the principal question upon which petitioner relies for an annulment of the award in this case is that there is no evidence to support the finding that the accident arose out of and in the course of employment or while the injured employé was performing a service growing out of or incidental to the employment," as contemplated and required by section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1913, p. 283), providing as an essential condition of the liability that, "at the time of the accident, the employé is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and is acting within the course of his employment as such."

A careful reading of the record compels, in our opinion, a conclusion in harmony with petitioner's said contention. It can hardly be gainsaid that the applicant was employed as a laborer to shovel gravel, and it is admitted that he was injured while driving a team. As to this the finding of the commission is that:

> "While driving a team hauling a gravel wagon, the team became frightened, and applicant was thrown from the wagon, sustaining a fracture of the neck of the femur of the left leg; that there was no specific duty assigned to applicant in his said employment; that he had started his work as a shoveler, but later changed places with a teamster, his injury occurring while driving a team; that it was customary for teamsters and shovelers to exchange as applicant had done; and therefore that applicant was acting in the course of his employment when injured."

It is true that the applicant testified that he was not assigned specifically to any particular kind of work, but there can be no doubt from his testimony that he understood he was to shovel gravel. He said he was up at the pit, and he asked the supervisor if he needed any help, and the latter said:

> "'Yes; come up in the morning.' He said for me to come up there and go to work. I was right there. Nothing was said about what work I was to do. I started loading wagons, shoveling gravel."

He worked at that till about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when one of the teamsters, who had been out in the rain, wanted to get warm, and requested applicant to exchange with him, and in coming back on the first trip the team ran away, and the driver was thrown out, resulting in the injury as before stated. At the time of the investigation before the commission the following statement was made by the applicant's attorney:

> "We admit that that statement is a mistake, and that at the time of the accident he was not employed as a teamster."

It appears also that the applicant, as is required by law, filed with the board of supervisors a verified claim for the wages due him, specifying the kind of work as "shoveling gravel." The father of applicant testified that he had a conversation with the supervisor at said pit as follows:

> "He says, 'Where is your other boy?' I said, 'Down home.' He said, 'What is he doing?' I said, 'He is not doing anything at the present time.' He said, 'Well, we could use another man up here at the present time, at the pit.' * * * He said, 'Tell him to come up in the morning.' I went home and told Otto to come down. * * * He said for me to tell the boy to come up and he could go to work. I would not swear definitely; he may have said 'come and go to work in the pit' or 'go to work,' but he said he would put him to work, that was all there was to it."

It also appears in the record that the custom as to work on the road was to employ the number of men and teams required, each man to furnish and drive his own team, and in addition the number of laborers that might be required, and all were sent to a certain place to engage in work.

We think there can be no doubt that, while the expression of the nature and character of the work might have been more precise and complete, it was understood that the applicant was to do the work of a laborer in shoveling gravel. If so, it needs no argument to reach the conclusion that in driving a team he was acting outside of the scope of his employment, and that the accident did not arise "out of and in the course of employment." Indeed, to hold that the beneficent provisions of the Compensation Act apply to this case we must place upon the acts and declarations of the parties an unnatural and unreasonable construction. The commissioners saw the difficulty, and, in their commendable zeal to favor as far as possible the claim of the applicant, sought to bring the case within the operation of the law by finding that a custom existed as to exchange of labor. As to this it may be said that the evidence hardly amounts to proof of such custom. There was some showing that occasionally the employés did exchange work. The applicant himself, in response to the question, "Do you know whether it is common for men to change work in that way?" answered, "Well, they had done it before."

Mr. Goodwin, with whom the exchange was made, testified that he did not know that it was common "for men to exchange work in that way."

[2, 3] It is undoubtedly true that before an alleged course of conduct can be legally held to have developed into a "custom" it must be of such general and continuous practice among those engaged in the work as to constitute a regular course of conduct, and an occasional and sporadic departure from the usual and prescribed course of procedure among a part only of those to whom the custom is attributed does not meet the requirement of the rule. Besides, it does not appear that the employer had any knowledge or notice of any such custom, and he cannot be bound in absence of knowledge of the custom. Mr. Fritz, the supervisor, who, it is claimed, employed the applicant, testified that he did not recognize any such custom, and that it was understood in that kind of work what each man should do, and that he was not expected to exchange with any one doing a different kind of work.

Authorities are cited to the effect that a custom or usage, in order to have any binding effect, must be certain, well known, long established and acquiesced in. The proposition is virtually conceded, and we need not dwell upon it. We may call attention, however, to the quite recent case of Pacific Coast Casualty Company v. Pillsbury et al., reported in 162 Pac. 1040, wherein it was contended that, by reason of a certain custom of the employés in using a freight elevator for going to and returning from the office in which they were employed, the applicant was justified in thus departing from the instructions given him not to use such elevator. The court emphasized the importance of the circumstance that there was a failure to show that "these instances of the disregard of the instructions and warnings on the part of its employés were ever brought" to the notice of the employer. It would, indeed, be quite unreasonable to hold that such custom among the employés, unknown to and unrecognized by the employer, would or could operate to change one kind of employment into another so as to render the accident compensable, notwithstanding it was not incidental to or in the course of the work for which the injured person was employed.

The law itself is a piece of humane and beneficent legislation that should be upheld and accorded a liberal interpretation. The present case, it may be said also, makes a strong appeal to sympathetic consideration, but, applying the terms of the law to the facts disclosed by the record, it clearly appears that there is no legal ground for the relief sought.

We need not review the many cases cited as analogous to this. They constitute interesting illustrations of the application of the principle, but it is manifest that each case must stand or fall according to its own peculiar facts. If investigation of the manner in which the subject has been treated by various courts should be desired a guide to the examination may be found in the notes on page 464 of volume 1 of Honnold on Workmen's Compensation.

We think the award should be annulled; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

Action by B. Lauer against C. O. Williams and J. P. Harter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. F. Shartel and J. T. Sharp, both of Alturas, for appellants. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the defendant, C. O. Williams, to the plaintiff, to secure the payment of a promissory note made and delivered to the plaintiff by said Williams. The defendant Harter, although duly served with process, did not answer the complaint or otherwise make an appearance. The findings were in favor of the plaintiff. As to the defendant Harter, the court found that he had, subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, purchased the premises described therein and in the complaint, and that the "claim and interest of the said J. P. Harter in and to the said real estate, and each and every part thereof, are subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's said mortgage." By the decree entered upon the findings, the mortgage was foreclosed and a sale of the mortgaged premises by the sheriff for the purposes of satisfying the amount due on the note to secure which it was given was ordered and directed. This appeal is by the defendant Williams, from said decree or judgment, and is supported by a bill of exceptions.

The appellant contends: (1) That the plaintiff cannot maintain this action for the alleged reason that he is not the real party in interest in the subject-matter thereof; (2) that the findings are not sustained by the proofs—that is to say, that, while the execution of the note and the mortgage as alleged in the complaint is admitted, it is the contention that the evidence discloses that, prior to the commencement of this action, the appellant paid the principal of and interest accruing on the note in full.

The note was executed in the sum of $12,500, and the balance remaining due thereon, according to the complaint, and to satisfy which foreclosure of the mortgage was sought, is the sum of $3,085.77. The note and the mortgage were executed and delivered to the plaintiff on the 23d day of January, 1909. Contemporaneously with said transaction and as a part thereof, the plaintiff and Williams signed and executed a writing in which it was set forth that the note and the mortgage were given "as collateral security to secure to said mortgagee the payment by said mortgagor of certain promissory notes of the said mortgagor, of dates and amounts as follows," following which are the dates and amounts, and in which it is further stated and stipulated "that said foregoing note [referring to the note in suit] and this mortgage shall be considered original security for any further advances of cash or merchandise made by said mortgagee to said mortgagor to the amount of the difference between the aggregate amount due upon the above enumerated notes and the amount of the foregoing note (note in suit), secured by this mortgage."

The note to secure which the mortgage involved here was given provided for interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and was made payable on or before the 15th day of October, 1909, or approximately nine months from its date. The note was, by indorsement on the back thereof, transferred and made payable by the plaintiff to the Bank of Modoc County. At the time of the transaction above referred to, Lauer, the plaintiff, was the cashier of the Bank of Modoc County. He was at the same time also a member of the firm of E. Lauer & Sons, doing business as general merchants at Alturas, Modoc county. The Bank of Modoc County carried on its banking business in a room of the building in which the store of E. Lauer & Sons was located. The defendant Williams was engaged in the business of raising sheep in Modoc county. He bought his supplies or merchandise from the firm of E. Lauer & Sons. It will be observed that, according to the written agreement between Lauer and Williams, above adverted to, the note was to cover advances by the mortgagee to the mortgagor made either in cash or merchandise.

Lauer testified that, notwithstanding that he was the named and ostensible payee of the note, as a matter of fact, in the transaction in which the note and the mortgage were made, he was acting only as an agent for the bank and not for himself, individually.

Williams, from time to time, made payments to Lauer until the early part of 1912, when the plaintiff received information that Williams had conveyed by deed the mortgaged lands to the defendant Harter. The plaintiff thereupon called upon Williams for a settlement, and on the 1st day of April, 1912, the two men came together and agreed upon a settlement. This agreement was reduced to writing, was signed by Lauer and Williams, and was dated the 1st day of April, 1912. By said agreement, it was stipulated and agreed that a settlement had been effected with respect to the indebtedness evidenced by the note here in question, and that there was then due and unpaid upon said note and payable to the Bank of Modoc County the sum of $3,085.77. It appears that after the above settlement was made, and about the 23d day of July, 1912, the Bank of Modoc County went into liquidation, and the assets thereof taken possession of by the state superintendent of banks. The note and mortgage involved herein were among the assets so taken over.

> "After the depositors of the Bank of Modoc County were paid off, which was done by E. Lauer & Sons," testified the plaintiff, "these assets and this note and mortgage were turned back and indorsed over to me in lieu of the bond which was given by the United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company for the entire assets of the Bank of Modoc County, which were in the neighborhood of $85,000, this bond being given to protect Mr. W. R. Williams (the superintendent of banks) against any depositors, known or unknown, that were not on the ledger of the bank. * * * We paid some twenty-eight thousand and some odd dollars, besides the bond, as a consideration for the assets of the bank. This was paid to the depositors of the Bank of Modoc County."

Williams testified that the settlement referred to above was effected and agreed to between the plaintiff and himself, but said that it was incorrect and did not accord with the actual figures and facts. He declared that he so told the plaintiff at the time of the settlement, but that finally he was forced into an agreement to the settlement by the threats of the plaintiff that, unless he did so, foreclosure proceedings would at once be instituted against him. He further testified that, prior to the settlement, he at various times paid to the plaintiff certain sums of money, aggregating in amount over $15,000, more than enough, he said, to extinguish that obligation. He enumerated the payments, giving the dates and the amounts. He testified that he supposed the moneys so paid would be credited on the note, but did not say that he gave the plaintiff specific directions, either before or at the times of such payments, that they should be applied to the extinction of the note. He admitted having bought merchandise during the existence of the note at the store of E. Lauer & Sons.

In rebuttal, the plaintiff testified that some of the payments made by Williams were credited on the store account with E. Lauer & Sons for goods and merchandise, and that some were credited on the notes. He said that the books of the bank were then in the possession of the state superintendent of banks, and that he was therefore unable to say what proportion of said payments was credited to the note. Nor did he appear to be able to say what proportion was credited on the store account. There appear to have been no steps taken or effort made by the defendant to get either the bank or store books of account before the court.

We have now briefly stated the testimony submitted by the parties on the issues before the court. The statement is itself sufficient to demonstrate that neither of the legal propositions upon which the defendant relies for a reversal can be sustained.

[1] 1. The plaintiff was the proper party to bring and maintain this action. While it is true that he was, in the transaction culminating in the execution and delivery to him of the note and mortgage, acting solely as a representative or agent of the Bank of Modoc County, and that the latter was the party beneficially interested therein, yet the note and the mortgage were made to him and in his own name and he was the holder of the legal title to the same as a trustee for the bank. Nor was it necessary that the bank should have been joined as party plaintiff to the suit. Code Civ. Proc. § 369. Said section provides:

> "An executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section."

In Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 595, 12 Pac. 723, the action was brought to recover possession of property sold under a decree foreclosing a mortgage thereon, the plaintiff having purchased the property for the mortgagee, a bank. The claim was, as here, that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and therefore could not maintain the action. The court said that:

> While it was true that no facts were stated in the complaint showing the plaintiff to be a trustee of an express trust, the complaint was, nevertheless, sufficient and the action properly brought. "A trustee of an express trust," continued the court, "is a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, and he is authorized to sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. Code Civ. Proc. § 369. The plaintiff bid in the property, and received the certificate of sale and sheriff's deed in his own name, and thereby became the purchaser. As between him and the bank, he was the trustee of an express trust, but that fact did not concern the defendant. As to her, he was the real party in interest, and might sue without alleging or proving his trusteeship."

See Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 90; Walsh v. Soule, 66 Cal. 443, 6 Pac. 82; Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 403, 11 Pac. 833, 59 Am. Rep. 423; Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8; Hoagland v. Trask, 48 N. Y. 686.

[2] 2. The evidence amply supports the findings. It is wholly unnecessary to recapitulate it here. It may be observed, however, that, even if it be true, as the defendant Williams, testified, that the payments he made to the plaintiff totaled a sum equal to the principal and interest of the note, it is also true that he did not show that he was not indebted to E. Lauer & Sons for merchandise, or that some of the moneys so paid were not applied to the payment of his merchandise account. Nor did he show that he directed or by any means manifested a desire to Lauer that the moneys so paid should be applied exclusively to the payment of the note (Civ. Code, § 1479; Ray v. Borgfeldt, 169 Cal. 253, 146 Pac. 679); and, while he asseverated that the settlement had on the 1st day of April, 1912, whereby it was agreed between him and Lauer that there was then still due and unpaid on the note the sum of $3,085.77, was wholly and entirely incorrect, and that, as a matter of fact, he had at that time paid the principal and interest of the note in full, still he signally failed to show, other than by his mere naked asseverations, that the amount then agreed upon as being due was not the correct amount, or that he was not still indebted upon the note in the sum arrived at and agreed to in said settlement.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte MAGIDSON. (Cr. 389.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1917.)

1. RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS 🔑1—ATTEMPT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where accused, when told that stolen copper wire was hidden in a certain place, hired a vehicle and procured cloths to cover the wire, and went to the place where the wire was supposed to be hidden with the intention of taking it, he completed the offense of attempting to receive stolen property; there being the intent and the overt act.

2. RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS 🔑5—ATTEMPT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—IMPOSSIBILITY OF OFFENSE.

Though the wire had been removed by police officials, and it was impossible for accused to receive it, the impossibility of completing the crime did not render his acts any the less an attempt to receive stolen goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receiving Stolen Goods, Cent. Dig. § 7.]

Barney Magidson was committed to answer to the Superior Court to the charge of an attempt to receive stolen property, and applied for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Harry Ellis Dean, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner seeks his discharge on the ground of the want of probable cause for the order made by a committing magistrate holding him to answer to the superior court to the charge of an attempt to receive stolen property. There is no contention of any lack of intent to commit the crime. Indeed, as to that the evidence seems clear and convincing. It is claimed, however, that the showing made extends no farther than to reveal the intent and some degree of preparation, but falls short of disclosing an overt act necessary to complete the offense charged.

> "Mere intention to commit a specific crime does not itself amount to an 'attempt' as that word is employed in the criminal law. There must, in addition to the wicked intent—the mens rea—be some act done toward the ultimate accomplishment of the purposed crime. But even such acts do not always of themselves amount to an 'attempt,' or to an offense of which human laws will take cognizance; for, if they be but acts of preparation, however elaborate, our municipal law would not assume to deal with them. For instance, the construction of the dynamite bomb by the prisoner at his home on the night of the 15th of February, with the deliberate intention on his part to employ it the next morning in destroying the lives and property of others, atrocious as it was, and indefensible in foro conscientiæ, was but an act of preparation, and when perfected did not render him amenable to the municipal law as then existing, or punishable by its rules. But when the prisoner left his house on the morning of the 16th day of February, and went to Turk street pursuant to the antecedent arrangement between his confederate and himself, it amounted to an overt act done by him for the purpose of effecting the crime intended, and was in law and fact a criminal attempt."

So here it may be said that, if petitioner had simply agreed to take the goods and had obtained a conveyance and canvas and had done no more, it would not be sufficient, but when he drove to the place where the goods had been concealed he committed the overt act that made the offense complete.

In this connection reference may be had to the interesting cases of People v. Paluma, 18 Cal. App. 131, 122 Pac. 431, and People v. Petros, 25 Cal. App. 236, 143 Pac. 246, wherein it was held that the evidence showed an "attempt" within the contemplation of the law. The facts disclosed therein were no more striking and significant as evidence for such purpose than are the facts in the case here.

[2] Probably a more serious question arises out of the contention that there could be no "attempt" for the reason that when the effort was made it was impossible to commit the crime itself. In other words, before petitioner drove to the place where the goods had been secreted, the police officers had taken possession of them. It is therefore argued that the offense was impossible, not only because the goods had been removed, but because they were taken out of the category of stolen goods by having been virtually restored to the owner through the action of said officers. However, there is no necessary infirmity in the contention that there may be a criminal attempt, although the consummation of the attempt may be impossible, and there is ample authority for holding that such attempt may exist under such circumstances. In People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 668, 30 Pac. 800, 17 L. R. A. 626, 29 Am. St. Rep. 165, it is said:

> "It is a well-settled principle of criminal law in this country that, where the criminal re> sult of an attempt is not accomplished simply because of an obstruction in the way of the thing to be operated upon, and these facts are unknown to the aggressor at the time, the criminal attempt is committed. Thus an attempt to pick one's pocket, or to steal from his person, when he has nothing in his pocket or on his person, completes the offense to the same degree as if he had money or other personal property which could be the subject of larceny. State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 500; Commonwealth v. McDonald, 5 Cush. [Mass.] 365; People v. Jones, 46 Mich. 441 [9 N. W. 486]; People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254 [25 N. E. 412, 10 L. R. A. 109, 20 Am. St. Rep. 732]."

In the Wilson Case, supra, it is said:

> "There must undoubtedly be present ability to perpetrate the offense. * * * But it is not true that the thing intended to be taken must be where the attempting thief supposes it to be, or that there must be in fact property where he supposes there is. It is sufficient if he supposes there is property in the pocket, trunk, or other receptacle, and attempts, by some act adapted to the purpose to obtain it feloniously."

In the McDonald Case, supra, this language appears:

> "But it was said in argument for the defendant that he could not be said to have attempted to steal the property of the unknown person, if there was no property to be stolen; and that therefore the indictment should have set out the property and shown the existence and nature of it by the proof. But it will appear, at once, by a simple reference to the import of the term 'attempt,' that this proposition cannot be maintained. To attempt is to make an effort to effect some object, to make a trial or experiment, to endeavor, to use exertion for some purpose. A man may make an attempt, an effort, a trial, to steal, by breaking open a trunk, and be disappointed in not finding the object of pursuit, and so not steal in fact. Still he remains nevertheless chargeable with the attempt, and with the act done towards the commission of the theft."

In the New York Case it is declared:

> "Whenever the animo furandi exists, followed by acts apparently affording a prospect of success and tending to render the commission of the crime effectual, the accused brings himself within the letter and intent of the statute. * * * The question whether an attempt to commit a crime has been made is determinable solely by the condition of the actor's mind and his conduct in the attempted consummation of his design. * * * So far as the thief is concerned, the felonious design and action are then just as complete as though the crime could have been, or in fact had been, committed, and the punishment of such offender is just as essential to the protection of the public, as of one whose designs have been successful."

The court, after calling attention to some English decisions to the contrary, continues:

> "In this country, however, the courts have uniformly refused to follow the cases of Reg. v. McPherson and Reg. v. Collins, and have adopted the more logical and rational rule, that an attempt to commit a crime may be effectual, although, for some reason undiscoverable by the intending perpetrator, the crime, under existing circumstances, may be incapable of accomplishment."

In the Jones Case the Supreme Court of Michigan approved the McDonald decision, saying:

> "We think this is not only the better, but the only, rule of law that could be adopted or recognized with safety to the rights of the public or of individuals."

There is a class of cases pointed out in State v. Wilson, supra, apparently similar to those herein considered, but clearly distinguishable where a different decision has been made. Thus where, with intent to defraud, a writing was falsely made which could not by legal possibility defraud any one, it was held that no offense had been committed, because a person could not be legally presumed to intend that which was legally impossible, and where an attempt was made to poison with an article believed to be poisonous, but which was in fact innoxious, and where an attempt was made to shoot a person with a pistol which was not in fact loaded, it was held that no offense had been committed, because no act had been done which was intrinsically adapted to the then present successful perpetration of the crime. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 517, 518.

> "Here the perpetration of the crime was legally possible, the persons in a situation to do it, the intent clear, and the act adapted to the successful perpetration of it; and whether there was or was not money in the pocket was an extrinsic fact not essential to constitute the attempt."

So in the case at bar it was legally possible for petitioner to receive the stolen property. His intent to do so is entirely clear, he took the steps that were adapted to the successful accomplishment of it, and the circumstance that the said stolen goods had been removed involved an extrinsic fact not material to the crime of an attempt to commit said offense of receiving stolen property.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Pen. Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Mary Weston was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Bray, of Placeville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of El Dorado county for the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. Upon her trial the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and she was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of ten years. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

It appeared that one Harry J. Stevens had a mining claim in the near vicinity of the defendant's home and had been accustomed to go to and from his cabin by a road leading past the Weston house. It was shown that this road, for some distance beyond the Westons' house, had been used as a public highway for 30 or 40 years. It had not been used beyond the Westons' place for wagons for the past 2 or 3 years, since about the time the Westons came there, but was used for horsemen and footmen. Stevens' mining claim was situated at one side of this part of the road and was reached from the road by a trail. It appeared that, some time in the early part of 1916, some one shot a dog belonging to the Westons, but it appeared that Stevens had nothing to do with this shooting, though the defendant accused him of doing it. Up to this time his relations with the Westons were friendly, and he had used this road without objection, and was told that the notices against trespassing, posted by the Westons, were not intended to prevent his using the road, but were rather aimed at stockmen who left their gates open. However, in April, 1916, after the dog shooting (the dog was not killed), the Westons, husband and wife, went to Stevens' cabin and told him he was forbidden to use the road, and if he did so "must take the consequences." Stevens ceased using the road and found his way to and from his cabin by another but circuitous route considerably longer than by this old road. On the 4th of June, 1916, he had been at a neighboring place and was taking from there to his cabin a bag of soiled clothing, as he testified, to be washed, and as he was on foot and the nearest way to his cabin was by this old road past the Westons, he took that route. When he reached a point on the road in view of the Weston premises the Westons were engaged in planting garden seeds at a point south of their house and about 180 feet from the road where Stevens appeared. Defendant left her husband and hurriedly went to the house and got a gun, and, according to Stevens' testimony, she appeared next near the northwest corner of the hen house with the gun at her shoulder in a position to fire at him, and commanded him to stop and go back. He testified:

> "As I came around the turn I saw Mr. and Mrs. Weston standing below the house working in the garden. Q. You were coming down the road, going easterly to your place? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the Weston house would be off to the south? A. It would be right off to the lower side of the road. * * * They were apparently putting in a garden below the ditch. * * * Q. State what transpired then. A. I saw Mrs. Weston run towards the house. Q. What house is that? A. The Weston house. The next thing I knew I saw her standing out by the chicken house with a rifle apparently pulled to the shoulder. Q. One minute—this chicken house, whereabouts is that? A. It sets in a northerly direction from their house, about 10 or 15 feet from the house I should judge—between the house and the road. Q. What kind of a gun, do you know? A. As near as I can say what I would call it was a Marlin rifle that they own. Q. What was her position with that rifle? A. Apparently to the shoulder when she came to a stop. * * * As near as I can place it, she was very near to the northwest corner of the chicken house; that is as near as I could state. * * * Weston was down in the garden. Q. Now, what transpired? A. She told me, she says, 'You have been warned what you may expect for traveling here'; she said for me to go back. I asked her, as near as I can remember, if she would not put the gun down." (He testified that he thought it was 100 or 150 feet from where he stood to where Mr. Weston was at this time; that he was on the road and she was inside the fence and by the hen house.) "Q. When you said that what transpired? A. It was a very few seconds when she fired. I fell to the ground where the blood spot was seen by the sheriff and others that went there." (This blood spot and other objects in the immediate vicinity > were located by the county surveyor, who made a diagram or map of the premises and other objects, which was used at the trial.) "Q. What was the effect of that shot? A. I was blinded instantly. I fell to the ground. George Weston came up and I says, 'I want to go to Indian Diggings.' They was talking there for a few minutes, and he says to her to get a bucket of water, and she immediately went and got a bucket of cold water and started to bathe off the blood, and she says, 'You are not badly hurt'; she says, 'you have just got a little of the same thing you caused my dog to get.' She said further, she says, 'I am treating you better than you would treat me, because you would go off and leave me.' Q. Go on. A. So in a few minutes—I don't know how long—I got to my feet and reached for my sack; I says, 'I want to go to Indian Diggings;' and George, he says, 'All right.' I started to walk, and I walked to the top of the hill going back the same way I came, but instead of going up the road I went down towards Indian Diggings; I went a little ways, and then I said I could go no further, and I laid down, and he went on to Indian Diggings, and when he returned he brought Lon Votaw back with him. Q. What was the nature of this shot; what was in the charge? A. It was charged with bird shot. Q. Where did it strike you? A. It struck me full on the forehead and in the face. There were a few scattered ones; one struck my hand, a couple struck against the teeth, but the heavy shot struck my forehead. It also showed at the examination after the swelling was removed from the eyes, it showed that there was two shot in the eye on the right side, and one went around the ball of the eye on the left side and left it permanently blind. Q. Can you see out of your eyes? A. I can see a little light with the right eye. Q. You cannot see with the left eye at all? A. Not at all. Q. How long was it after you saw the Westons there in the garden south of the fence and by the ditch—how long was it after you saw them there before Mrs. Weston fired this shot at you from the hen house? A. The time between? Q. Yes, between those. A. It was a very few minutes, because it was a short distance to the place where I stood still."

Weston assisted in taking Stevens to the Staten Mill, a few miles from Weston's, where he received temporary treatment by Dr. Wrenn soon after the shooting, and was later removed to Plymouth, and still later to Sacramento for treatment. The left eye was destroyed, and the sight of the other so far impaired as that he could only distinguish day from night. Dr. Wrenn testified that shot was found in all parts of his face and in his hand with which he was supporting his bag of clothes on his shoulder; that he extracted or found evidence of 75 separate shot that struck Stevens about the face and head —"the scalp was badly plowed up, as is shown by the scars on his head." He bled profusely at the point where he was shot, and the doctor found his wounds still bleeding.

On cross-examination Dr. Wrenn testified:

> "Q. Would the others, Doctor, as a professional man, be of any danger to life, those you have testified to, one in the arm, one in the hand, one on the lip, two or three through the ears, and 25 or more lodged around the eye; would either one of those under any circumstances be likely to produce death? A. Well, hardly. Q. Well, as a matter of fact, would they produce death? A. Where these shot lodged it is doubtful it they could produce death, or they would have done so. Q. You testify as a professional man that a shot fired that way could not produce death? A. I testify this way, that the shot that struck him at the points where they struck evidently could not produce death or they would have done so; had they hit in other parts it could. Q. What other parts? A. If the 25 shot that struck him around that eye had struck the soft portion of the neck here (showing) it could easily have punctured the jugular vein and the carotid artery. The pneumogastric nerve and the phranic nerve which control the action of the heart and the respiration, if any of those had been struck it could have caused death, but striking where it did it could not cause death."

On re-direct he testified:

> "Q. What you mean to say in this case is this, that in so far as these wounds are concerned that happily they turned out not quite mortal at present, that is the idea? A. They are not mortal. Q. At the present time, but had the same impact—the same shot hit a little lower down, for instance here (pointing to own throat) in the region of the jugular vein and carotid artery, the chances are that the same impact, the same five or seven shot would have been mortal if they had penetrated to the same depth? A. It could have been."

There were no witnesses to the shooting except defendant and her husband and Stevens. Mrs. Weston's testimony was that as soon as she saw Stevens coming along the road she went to the house, got the gun which she said was a 30-30 Marlin rifle loaded with bird shot No. 6, which she took "for her protection"; that she went out of their inclosure to the road and confronted Stevens. She testified:

> "I told him to go back up the trail; that he had been forbid trespassing across the premises, and I didn't want him to go across. Q. What did he say to you in response, if anything? A. He said he would not do it; he said he wished me to understand he was not afraid of me nor my gun; that me nor my gun could not bluff him."

She testified:

> That Stevens pushed her out of the road and faced her again down by the gate. "Q. Did he come towards you or threaten you then? A. Yes, sir; I raised the gun, and then he stopped, and then I lowered the gun; he started again; I didn't know whether he was going to grab me or what he was going to do; anyway I raised the gun and fired at the same time, and that is all I remember. Q. What position did you have the gun in when you fired? A. I had it up like this (showing). Q. By your side? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you fire that gun intentionally? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did you intend to shoot Mr. Stevens? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Do you know how that gun went off, whether you pulled the trigger or whether you did not? A. I can't say that; I was excited at that time. Q. Were you afraid of Mr. Stevens? A. I was afraid of him—I did not intend he was going by me."

Her testimony was that when the "gun went off" she was within 8 or 10 feet of Stevens. It appears that at the request of her husband she got some water and bathed Stevens' face. On cross-examination she testified:

> "Q. What did you get the gun for? A. For protection. Q. Why didn't you stay with your husband if you wanted protection? A. Well, I didn't intend Mr. Stevens were going through my premises after I had forbid him of crossing, and he still insisted on crossing. Q. Well, you would have had all the protection you wanted if you had stayed with your husband; Stevens was not coming up to where you were, was he? A. I know, but it was my premises; I am entitled to defend them after my dog had been shot. Q. So you went and got your gun? A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. You went out to where Stevens was? A. Yes, sir; I want up to where Stevens was coming in the road. Q. The gun was shot off there, was it? A. It was fired off there. Q. You left your husband where he was? A. Yes, sir; I didn't cart him along. Q. You didn't need him for protection, did you? A. Need my husband? No. I was capable of taking care of myself. Q. Now, you shot him because he was trespassing, didn't you? A. Yes, sir; after he had been forbid."

She admitted having told the sheriff that she shot Stevens because he was trespassing:

"Q. Did you tell the sheriff that it was an accident at the time? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Did you say anything about it being an accident? A. No, sir. Q. You did tell him that you shot him because he was trespassing, is not that right? A. I shot him after he was trespassing because he had been forbid. Q. And you so told the sheriff? A. I so told the sheriff them same words. Q. But you didn't tell him that the gun had gone off accidentally or anything of that kind? A. Well no; I did not."

[1] Weston's testimony was that defendant did the shooting with a Marlin 30-30 rifle which he had loaded with black powder and No. 6 shot to kill a hawk which had been troubling their chickens. There was no dispute as to the size of the shot. The Westons were known to have a shotgun, but Weston testified that it was at a neighbor's house at the time of the assault on Stevens. Stevens thought the gun used was a Marlin rifle, although from where he stood he may have been mistaken. He was mistaken as to the distance from where he stood to the hen house, where he testified defendant stood when she shot him. The measured distance was 67 feet. Defendant's testimony was that she was within 8 or 10 feet of Stevens when the gun was fired. The evidence tended to show that if the gun used was a Marlin rifle, and was loaded as Weston said he loaded it, and if it was discharged within 8 feet of Stevens, he would have had a slim chance of escaping with his life. There is a direct conflict between Stevens' account of the shooting and the defendant's account of it, and it was with the jury to decide which one to believe.

[2, 3] So, also, was the question of intent one of fact and for the jury. While, to constitute murder, the guilty person need not intend to take life to constitute an attempt to murder he must so intend. He must specifically contemplate the taking of life; and though his act is such as, were it successful, would be murder, if in truth he does not mean to kill, he does not become guilty of an attempt to commit murder. People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 Pac. 80.

[4] The evidence showed that defendant cherished a feeling of ill will toward Stevens which was exhibited in her forbidding him from using the road where it passed her house (she claimed to own the premises); that in giving him warning he was told that if he used it he might expect to take the consequences. When she first saw Stevens coming along the road she ran to the house for a gun, and from a place where she was in no danger from anything Stevens might do she opened fire upon him, according to his account of the shooting, immediately after he had asked her to put down the gun and before she could know whether he intended to go back as she ordered him to do or to continue along the road. That she got the gun for her "protection" seems not to have been necessary or called for, as nothing had happened after her warning to him in April to lead her to suppose he would injure her in any way. He had not used the road during the interval. She testified that she shot him because he was trespassing on her property, and so admitted to the sheriff. She testified, it is true, that she did not intend to kill him and sought by her testimony to convey the impression that the gun was not discharged intentionally—in fact, that it was an accident. If she shot Stevens because he was trespassing the shooting could not have been accidental. The reason she gave implies a purpose in doing the act, and a purpose implies an intent. What that intent was must be determined from all the circumstances—among them the character of the weapon and the consequences likely to follow the use made of the weapon. There was evidence that had the charge of shot hit Stevens a few inches lower the result might have been fatal.

Defendant, conceding that she might properly have been convicted of a lesser crime, urges "that the jury brought in an excessive verdict." This contention is based upon the assumption that the gun was accidentally discharged, and that defendant's testimony showed that she did not intend to kill Stevens. Defendant overlooks the fact that the jury may not have believed her account of the shooting, which manifestly they did not.

Among the grounds in support of the motion for a new trial was alleged misconduct of the jury. Defendant's attorney deposed that at the close of the trial the jury were placed in charge of Coroner Ruoff and his deputy, Ball, and that, "while the said jury were in said jury room engaged in the deliberation of said cause so submitted to them, Dr. Joseph T. Wrenn, one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution on the trial of said cause, was permitted by the officers in charge of said jury to enter the said jury room and to speak to and communicate with said jurors without any order of court made or entered authorizing them to do so." No other fact is alleged in support of the motion.

Ruoff deposed that, about 6 o'clock of the evening of the day when and after the cause was given to the jury, one of the jurors, Morris, "became temporarily ill and asked the officers to call a physician to attend him, * * * and affiant believed that it was necessary for him to have treatment by a physician without delay"; that at the time the judge was absent from the courthouse "and there was no one within reach to whom affiant could apply for an order permitting him to call a physician to visit said Morris or to whom he could apply for advice or instructions in that regard"; that he "telephoned for Dr. Joseph T. Wrenn to come to the courthouse at once, and upon the arrival of said doctor, permitted him to immediately enter the jury room and prescribe for and treat the said juror Morris for his said illness." Ruoff further deposed that he and his fellow elisor were present within sight and hearing of the doctor all the time he was in the jury room, and heard and saw everything that transpired, which consisted only of questions by the doctor to and answers by the said juror relative to his sickness, and that at no time did the said doctor speak to any other juror, and that during all the time he was in the jury room no mention of the said trial or of anything connected therewith was mentioned by any one. Elisor Ball and Juror Morris deposed to like facts, as did Dr. Wrenn. The latter deposed that he found "Morris suffering from acute gastritis, and conversed with him concerning the symptoms of his illness, and prescribed for his said complaint, but did not converse with him upon any subject connected with the above-entitled cause, nor upon any subject whatever except that of his illness," and that he remained within the jury room but a few minutes; that the juror's illness was not serious, and that he was "quickly relieved from his pain."

[5] The admonition given by the court to the elisors to suffer no person to speak to the jurors or communicate with them, nor to do so himself, "on any subject connected with the trial," was in accordance with section 1121 of the Penal Code. The provision is important and should be observed. The statute, however, is to be given a reasonable construction. An emergency might arise making it imperative for the officer in charge of the jury to enter the jury room for the purpose of meeting the emergency and to take with him a person suitable to assist him. This section of the Penal Code also provides that the jury may be permitted to separate, in the discretion of the court. In People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 562, 571, 108 Pac. 511, 515, the court said:

> "Where the jury has been permitted to separate while deliberating upon a verdict, under such circumstances as to make it appear that they might have been tampered with, a new trial should be granted, unless there is affirmative proof upon behalf of the people explaining the separation and showing that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. (Citing cases.) If this burden is met by the people the new trial should be denied. We think in this case there was reasonably strong proof that the jury was not tampered with, and that defendant suffered no prejudice from the confusion and slight separation growing out of the alarm of fire. * * * There was no attempt to show the slightest bad conduct on the part of any member of the jury, or any effort by any person to approach or influence them in any way."

So here no attempt was made to show any communication with the jury either by the elisors or by the doctor except as he explained, and it was shown that no one spoke to any juror "on any subject connected with the trial." If the strict rule laid down in the Cord Case applies here we think the burden of showing that no prejudice to the defendant resulted from what occurred in the jury room was fully and successfully met by the prosecution.

[6] Misconduct of the district attorney in addressing the jury is also claimed to have been prejudicial to defendant. The alleged misconduct consisted in the district attorney's advancing a theory, based upon his view of the evidence, that defendant had used a shotgun instead of a Marlin rifle. Stevens did not claim to be certain as to the kind of gun used; he thought it was the Marlin rifle the Westons were known to possess. They also owned a shotgun, but Weston testified it was not then at their house. There was much evidence as to the effect of a charge of shot fired from a 30-30 rifle loaded with a shot cartridge and the same from a shotgun. The facts and circumstances placed before the jury left the question of the kind of gun used and the character of the charge for the jury to determine. In arguing from the evidence and circumstances that a shotgun was the weapon used, we do not think the district attorney went outside and beyond the evidence. No motion was made by defendant to have the remarks complained of withdrawn, nor was the court requested to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks.

CREDIT ASS'N OF CALIFORNIA v. GRIFFIN et al. (Civ. 1891.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 26, 1917.)

BANKRUPTCY 🔑198—DISCHARGE — ATTACHMENT BOND — DISCHARGE OF SURETIES—BANKRUPTCY OF PRINCIPAL.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67f, 30 Stat. 565 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9651), making void all attachments or other liens obtained against an insolvent at any time within four months before filing petition in bankruptcy against him, and discharging the attached property, the adjudication of bankruptcy within four months after attachment of insolvent's property does not release sureties upon attachment bond, where the bankruptcy proceedings are instituted after the bond has discharged the attachment lien; such lien not being then in existence to be affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of the principal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 296–316.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by the Credit Association of California against E. W. Griffin and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Rosendale, of Salinas, for appellants. Leopold Oppenheimer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment against them as sureties upon a bond given by them for the release of an attachment.

In an action against John Olson, Jr., and another the plaintiff recovered judgment against Olson for $386.35. At the time of its commencement an attachment was duly issued, and to prevent the levy thereof the defendants in the present action executed the undertaking above referred to, which obligated the defendants as follows:

> "Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, * * * in consideration of the premises and to prevent the levy of said attachment, do hereby jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of $772.76, and promise to the effect that if the plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action we will pay to the plaintiff upon demand the amount of said judgment."

Within a period of four months after the commencement of the attachment suit said Olson was adjudicated a bankrupt by the District Court of the United States; and the defendants contend that thereby they were exonerated from the obligation of their bond under the provisions of section 67f of the National Bankruptcy Act.

The point thus raised has been squarely decided against the contention of the defendants in two cases in this state. In the case of Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 55 Pac. 804, a provision of the state insolvency act (St. 1880, p. 82), similar to the one here involved was construed. That provision named one month as the time prior to the commencement of an action during which, if an attachment were levied, it became void by the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, in the same way as under the federal act four months is the period fixed. Referring to that provision, the Supreme Court said:

> "It is clear, for reasons which need not be enlarged upon, that if at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is instituted there is no attachment in force on which the proceeding can operate, if the attachment lien has already been discharged by a bond for that purpose, then the liability of sureties on the bond is not affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of their principal. * * * The mistake of defendants lies in supposing that the lien of the attachment in Rosenthal against Brusie, continued on the attached goods after they had been released to Brusie in consequence of the delivery of the bond. Our statute and the inferences which follow from the decisions of this court seem to put that question at rest."

In the case of S. F. Sulphur Co. v. Ætna Co., 11 Cal. App. 695, 106 Pac. 113, the provision of the federal Bankruptcy Act here involved was construed, and the court followed the rule applied in the case of Rosenthal v. Perkins, supra.

One other point is stated in the brief, but it is not at all discussed, and is without merit. We need not therefore refer to it at length.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

John Kirk was convicted of selling alcoholic liquors contrary to the Wylie Local Option Law, and appeals from judgment and order denying new trial. Affirmed.

J. O. Traber and A. Ellenburg, both of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged with having committed a misdemeanor by selling alcoholic liquor contrary to the provisions of what is known as the Wylie Local Option Law. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] The principal point made by the defendant for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the trial court erred in refusing to grant his motion to dismiss the prosecution, based upon section 1324 of the Penal Code, which, so far as it is applicable to the facts of this case, provides in effect that where a witness offending against any of the provisions of the Penal Code objects to testifying against any other person so offending, or failing to so object, and the section is not read to him, his testimony shall not be used in any criminal prosecution against him, nor shall he be liable thereafter to prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, or for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may have testified or produced evidence.

In this case it appears that the defendant and one Al Meador were separately prosecuted for violations of the provisions of said Wylie Local Option Law, and it is contended by the appellant that the acts charged against him and Meador were in effect and in fact one transaction, and that he having testified on behalf of the people in the case of People v. Meador, without section 1324 having been read to him, he is, under the provisions of that section, exempt from prosecution in this case. This might be true if the respective sales in which Meador and the appellant were concerned were one transaction; but from the facts in the case it appears that the sales were separate and distinct, and that the testimony given by the appellant in the case of People v. Meador was confined and limited to the sale of liquor by Meador, and nothing that the appellant then testified to tended to show that he in any manner had committed any offense. In other words, at the Meador trial, the appellant told of the circumstances of the sale of beer by Meador, and said nothing about the sale of whisky with which he personally was charged, and which took place about an hour before the transaction in which Meador was concerned. This case therefore does not come within the purview of section 1324 of the Penal Code.

[2, 3] Section 19 of the Wylie Local Option Law provides a severer punishment upon conviction of a second offense under the act. In the information in this case the defendant was charged with a prior conviction, to which charge upon his arraignment he refused to plead. At the trial the district attorney adverted to the prior conviction of the defendant in connection with his offer to prove such conviction, upon the sound assumption we think that the defendant having upon his arraignment refused to answer to the prior charge, he must be regarded as having pleaded "not guilty" thereto, with the result that such conviction was a matter to be passed upon by the jury. Section 1025, Pen. Code. The defendant, however, objected to the introduction of this testimony, upon the contention that it was a matter exclusively for the consideration of the court at the time of sentence if the defendant should be found guilty by the jury of the main charge. The court adopted this view, excluded the testimony, and upon request of the defendant instructed the jury to disregard all references to the alleged prior conviction. The claim is now made by the appellant that there being no evidence before the jury of the prior conviction the reference to it by the district attorney was prejudicial to him, and that his motion for a new trial should therefore have been granted. But the exclusion of this evidence was upon the objection of the defendant himself, and he is in no position to complain of the district attorney's reference to a matter as to which there was no competent evidence before the jury when its proper admission was the result of his own objection.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. ALLEN et al.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN ⟹203(1)—NATURE AND EXTENT OF SERVITUDE—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding in eminent domain by a city to subject property of a street railroad to street uses parallel with its track, evidence of the nature and extent of the proposed improvement and the changes in the railroad necessitated thereby are admissible to show extent of damage.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN ⟹120—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—TAKING WITHIN MEANING OF CONSTITUTION.

Taking property of a street railroad for street uses parallel with its track is a taking entitling the railroad to actual compensation within Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 4, providing that the court may fix the terms and conditions upon which property may be taken, and vesting in city right to regulate.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⟹251—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States is restrictive of the powers of the federal government only, and is not applicable to a state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 726, 727, 732.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚷280—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

While the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution does not regulate compensation to be paid, it prohibits a city in condemnation proceedings from depriving a person of property without due process of law.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚷227—EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

While the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution does not regulate the compensation to be paid, it prohibits a city in a condemnation proceeding from denying the party the equal protection of the laws.

6. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚷141(1)—SUBJECTING PROPERTY OF STREET RAILROAD TO STREET USES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Under Street Opening Act (St. 1903, p. 379) § 10, as amended (St. 1909, p. 1038), providing that the actual value of property shall be the measure of compensation for all property to be actually taken and the basis of damages to property injuriously affected, the measure of damages for property of a street railroad taken by a city for street use parallel to its track is the decrease in value of the use of the land for the first purpose by reason of its being concurrently used for the second purpose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the City of Los Angeles against Samuel S. Allen and others and the Pacific Electric Railway Company and the United States Mortgage & Trust Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial by the two defendants last named, they appeal. Reversed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Charles D. Pillsbury, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action was brought by the city of Los Angeles for the condemnation of certain lands for the opening and widening of Sunset boulevard within described limits, pursuant to proceedings theretofore had under the Street Opening Act of 1903. Part of the land sought to be condemned is a parcel which is owned in fee by Pacific Electric Railway Company, subject to a mortgage interest thereon held by the other appellant, United States Mortgage & Trust Company. The premises to which the controversy refers are a continuous strip of land (with the exception of the intersection of a street crossing), 25 feet in width and approximately 1,100 feet in length, upon and over which the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company maintains and operates an electric interurban railroad for the transportation of passengers and freight. After the issues had been framed, the cause was referred to referees to compute the damages of the respective parties defendant, and those referees, after taking evidence, made their report, to which report exceptions were filed on behalf of the appellants. After receiving evidence concerning the value of the land and the damages to be awarded, the court confirmed the report of the referees so far as the same related to the said parcel, and an interlocutory judgment was entered condemning the demanded interest in this land, together with other lands, and thereby provided for the payment of $1 to the Pacific Electric Railway Company for the taking of said parcel, without other compensation, and determined that the security of the mortgagee was not impaired by the taking, and that it was not entitled to receive compensation herein. The above-named defendants have appealed from the interlocutory judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

In its complaint the plaintiff alleged that it does not by these proceedings seek to prevent the defendant railway company from operating its electric road over and across the described land, "but seeks only to condemn said land to a public use for the opening and widening of Sunset boulevard in the manner proposed in this action by plaintiff, and does not seek to interrupt the maintenance and operation of said electric railway over, along, and across said parcel or parcels of real property last above described. Plaintiff further alleges that it seeks to condemn said parcel or parcels of land in such manner as to regulate and limit the said use thereof so that said use may not interfere with the proper use of said parcel or parcels of land as a public street under the law." The interlocutory decree limits the condemnation in like terms as above stated.

[1] There were numerous defendants, but in this decision when we refer to the defendants, we mean the present appellants. The defendants insisted that the court should require the plaintiff to prove the nature and extent of the proposed improvement and the extent of the structural changes in the railroad which will be necessitated thereby. This the court declined to do, and the plaintiff offered no such evidence. The defendants then introduecd evidence to show the value of the land on the 6th day of October, 1913, which it is not denied was the correct date to which the evidence in this case should refer. Their witnesses testified to substantial valuations, amounting to many thousands of dollars, and it is not necessary for us to state or compare the figures given. This evidence related to the market value of the land as held in fee, subject to the right to maintain and operate the railroad thereon, but without the street. Other testimony introduced by the defendants was to the effect that the value of such fee, subject to the right to maintain the railroad, and also subject to the easement for public street purposes, was nothing. The court also rejected evidence offered by the defendants upon the same points above noted and which it had held that the plaintiff need not prove. The court also sustained objections of plaintiff to questions propounded for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of paving the street and of reconstructing the railroad as would become necessary according to plans and specifications for street improvements which, as defendants offered to show, are proposed and expected to be made as soon as the street opening proceedings are completed. It is now insisted that these rulings constituted prejudicial error.

Section 10 of the Street Opening Act of 1903, as amended in 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 1038), provides that the actual value of the property sought to be taken at the date of the order appointing referees or of the order setting the cause for trial, as the case may be, shall be the measure of compensation for all property to be actually taken and the basis of damages to property not actually taken but injuriously affected, in all cases where such damages are allowed by the provisions of that act. It is further provided that the referees or court or jury, as the case may be, shall find separately:

> "First, the value of each parcel of property sought to be condemned, and all improvements thereon pertaining to the realty, and of each separate estate or interest therein; second, if any parcel of property sought to be condemned is only a part of a larger parcel, the damages which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned, and to each separate estate or interest therein, by reason of its severance from the portion sought to be condemned, and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. * * *"

Section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is the general statute as to proceedings in condemnation cases, is to like effect. Section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where property has been appropriated to a public use by any individual, firm, or private corporation, the use thereof for a public street of a city or for any public purpose shall be deemed a more necessary use than the public use to which such property has been already appropriated.

Section 1240, Code of Civil Procedure, in subdivision 4 thereof, declares that where property already appropriated to a public use or purpose by any person, firm, or private corporation is sought to be taken by a city for another public use or purpose which is consistent with the continuance of the use of such property or some portion thereof for such existing purpose, to the same extent as such property is then used, or to a less or modified extent, then the right to use such property for such proposed public purpose, in common with such other use or purpose, either as then existing, or to a less or modified extent, may be taken by such city, and the court may fix the terms and conditions upon which such property may be so taken, and the manner and extent of the use thereof for each of such public purposes, and may order the removal or relocation of any structures, or improvements therein or thereon, so far as may be required by such common use. This provision of subdivision 4, although since amended, was originally added to that subdivision in the year 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 620), which is subsequent to the date of section 10 of the Street Opening Act of 1903, as that section was last amended. Under its power of control over streets, the city, after the easement (commonly so called) for street purposes has been acquired, will have the right to establish and change grades, to require that the railroad conform to the grades established, to order changes in location of poles, and other structural changes, and to enforce ordinances as to speed of trains, and other regulations necessary to conform to the established general uses of the street, but which may be not beneficial to the defendants. These requirements being made under the police power, and not as a further exercise of powers of condemnation, the railway company will not then receive compensation, although it may be put to large expense in obeying the city's orders. And while the taking of the easement for street purposes will vest in the city all these rights affecting the railway company in the exercise of the company's reserved right to operate its railway over that land, it is not necessary to require proof by plaintiff of any particular regulations or improvements which may be determined upon hereafter. But it does not follow that in the condemnation proceeding the defendants, in proving the amount of their rightful compensation, should be denied the right to show what kind of a street probably will have to be constructed, or be denied all compensation for damage caused to the value of the property interests retained by them, if that value is being diminished by the fact that the city is taking over an interest in the property for street purposes

[2] "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner. * * *" Constitution of California, art. 1, § 14. Here the city proposes to take from the owner a certain interest in land, leaving the owner in possession of the land for the exercise of certain valuable rights. But although those rights, as well as the fee, are to remain vested in the owner, it is proposed to create conditions affecting the owner in the use of those rights; conditions which will diminish the value of the company's remaining interest in the land. To say that a condemnation of this kind is not a damaging of property thus affected, within the meaning of the Constitution, is to deny to that instrument a meaning which it must have under any reasonable interpretation of its language. We cannot agree with the implication in the argument of respondent's counsel, that the process of condemnation is a mere abstraction or intellectual concept. Its results are concrete, its interferences are to be actual, and the compensation therefor should be real.

In ordinary cases where the condemnation is for a right of way for a use which constitutes a perpetual easement and which will require practically the exclusive use of the surface, evidence is permitted to show, and the condemning party must pay, the value of the fee as the measure of damages sustained. Under such circumstances, in the nature of things there can be no difference in value between the easement taken and the fee. "When, however, such a difference does exist, the rule is different, and the value of the easement taken as distinguished from the value of the fee, is alone to be ascertained by the jury, and the owner compensated therefor." Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. S. F. Savings Union, 146 Cal. 290, 79 Pac. 961, 70 L. R. A. 221, 106 Am. St. Rep. 36, 2 Ann. Cas. 962. In the cited case the proposed right of way consisted of a strip of oil-bearing land along the boundary of a tract of oil-bearing land owned by the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to show that the oil beneath the surface was a valuable right in property, reserved to the owner and which might be utilized by wells sunk on the adjoining tract. This being so, the plaintiff was entitled to prove the value of these property rights vested in the owner of the fee, and to have that value considered in reduction of the amount of compensation to be awarded. If such evidence is admissible on behalf of the plaintiff, it would seem that on the same principle similar evidence should be admitted on behalf of the defendant for the purpose of proving the true value of the easement imposed upon his land, and the reduction in value of the rights that will remain vested in the defendant, in any case where the power of eminent domain is being used to acquire less than the entire valuable interest in the property. Let it be admitted, for example, that the value of the property in the hands of the defendants prior to condemnation by the city, and as it stands devoted to perpetual use for railroad purposes, is $20,000. Let it be further admitted that the value of the fee, apart from the railroad use, is nominal. The result follows that the railroad's right to use its land for railroad purposes is worth $20,000. Now comes the city and seeks to take an interest in the same land for use as a street, without requiring the absolute removal of the railroad therefrom. If, now, it can be shown that the actual establishment of the street, with the incidents attached thereto, will probably require structural changes in the railroad, and limitations not now existing upon the operation of the railroad, which changes and limitations will reduce the value of the property for railroad purposes, the conclusion must follow that the city in condemning the property for street purposes is taking from the defendants valuable property rights, or, stating it perhaps more accurately, is causing damage to the remaining interest of the defendants in the property; a damage for which, according to the fundamental law of the state, the owner is entitled to compensation.

[3-5] It has been suggested that the rulings of the court below and its award of only nominal compensation to the defendants were based upon the authority of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979. That decision affirmed a judgment the Supreme Court of Illinois sustaining a judgment wherein the sum of $1 was awarded as the just compensation to be paid to the railroad company for taking by condemnation a part of its right of way for putting a public street across that right of way in the city of Chicago. The United States Supreme Court was called upon to determine whether the rulings of the state court were in disregard of that part of the Fourteenth Amendment which provides that no state shall deprive any person of his property without due process of law, or deny the equal protection of the laws to any person within its jurisdiction. Having determined that the rulings and decision of the Illinois courts were not in conflict with the requirements of the federal Constitution, the United States Supreme Court adopted the law as declared by the Supreme Court of Illinois as the controlling statement of the law in a matter which was only of state concern. "We may say in the present case that the state court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and being under a duty to guard and protect the constitutional right here asserted, the final judgment ought not to be held to be in violation of the due process of law enjoined by the Fourteenth Amendment, unless by its rulings upon questions of law the company was prevented from obtaining substantially any compensation." It is the Constitution of the state of California, as it was the Constitution of the state of Illinois, and not that of the United States, which pledges the state that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. The similar provision in the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States need not be considered, since that amendment is one of those which are restrictive of the powers of the federal government and not restraints upon the states. So far as the federal Constitution is concerned, it is only necessary that the state in depriving persons of their property for public use shall protect those persons in their right to due process of law and their right to the equal protection of the laws. As long as those rights are duly recognized and protected, the remaining duty of a state court is to determine the true meaning of those provisions of the state law which provide for the compensation to be awarded for the taking or damaging of private property. Assuming (without deciding) that the law of California might, without violating the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, refuse to make any allowance to a railroad company in a case like the present, for the expense which it will incur in making changes in its railroad which become necessary by reason of the construction of the street, and might refuse to allow for any consequent damages to the value of the railroad easement, surely there is no obligation created by the federal law which will prohibit the state from more adequately protecting the property owner from losses cause by public improvements. We are called upon to determine what the law of the state has actually provided, and are not to be guided by any rule to the effect that the state shall pay as little as it may possibly be made to pay without violating the Fourteenth Amendment. Even in the case referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the value to the railroad of that which was taken from it is "the difference between the value of the right to the exclusive use of the land in question for the purposes for which it was being used, and for which it was always likely to be used, and that value after the state acquired the privilege of participating in such use by the opening of a street across it, leaving the railroad tracks untouched. Upon that theory the case was considered by the jury, and the court did not err in placing it before them upon that basis as to compensation."

[6] The difficulty with the case at bar is that the court has refused to take into consideration evidence which would have enabled it to determine the difference between the value of the right to the exclusive use of the land in question for the purpose for which it was being used and for which it was always likely to be used, and that value after the city acquires the privilege of participating in such use by the opening of a street over it; and has refused to receive evidence bearing upon the question whether or not the city in taking the property for street purposes will leave the railroad tracks untouched.

There is an important difference between the extension of a street crossing over a railroad track and a taking for the purpose of constructing a street longitudinally covering a right of way. "The right to take longitudinally is very different from the mere right to cross, for in the one case the rights of the railway company are materially impaired, while in the other the taking is such that both uses can stand together." Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1098. See, also, Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) § 249; Pierce on Railroads, p. 193. It has been held that when a railroad corporation owns only an easement in the land which it occupies, the imposition of another easement on the same land wholly consistent with the complete and undisturbed enjoyment of the original use is not a taking of property, and that if there is an interference with the original use, there is a taking only to the extent of such interference. The corporation having the original right is not, when the land is occupied concurrently by another corporation, entitled to recover the value of the land as measured by the most advantageous use to which it could be put. The true measure of damages in each case is the decrease in the value of the use of the land for the first purpose by reason of its being concurrently used for the second purpose. 10 Ruling Case Law, title Eminent Domain, § 129, and cases there cited. We understand that the industry of counsel has not enabled them to discover any case where a taking of a street right of way, longitudinally covering a railroad right of way, was said to entitle the railroad company to only nominal damages. Those cases which apply such rule to street crossings, proceed upon the theory that the right of way exists ex necessitate, and that the process of condemnation in such cases is merely formal. It is assumed in such cases that in extending a railroad through a city, the railroad company accepts the establishment of street crossings as a common and necessary incident, on account of which it is not to have compensation so long as its railroad is not subjected to any other interference. "The [railroad] company must be deemed to have laid its tracks within the corporate limits of the city subject to the condition—not it is true, expressed, but necessarily implied—that new streets of the city might be opened and extended from time to time across its tracks as the public convenience required, and under such restrictions as might be prescribed by statute." C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 250, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 590, 41 L. Ed. 979. Though we might accept this principle as applied to ordinary street crossings of railroads, we do not consider it applicable to a lengthwise taking for street purposes of a railroad right of way.

We concede that a public service corporation is peculiarly subject to regulation under the police power, and that the action of the city authorities or of state authorities in compelling the defendant railroad company at its own expense, to alter its railroad structures at any time when the continued maintenance of such structures endangers the public safety will not be a taking of the property in the constitutional sense. But this furnishes no adequate reason why the city in condemning this right of way and applying it to street uses concurrently with the railroad use should not pay for any diminution in value of the railroad company's reserved rights of use in the property, to the extent that such diminution in value can now be shown to be actually involved as a consequence resulting from the process of subjecting the land to street uses. That it is the purpose and policy of the state of California to allow this just compensation is indicated by the language of section 1240, Code of Civil Procedure, to which we have referred, wherein it is provided that in subjecting property to such concurrent use the court may fix the terms and conditions upon which the property may be so taken. The fixing of those terms and conditions is evidently intended to include the allowance of compensation for the diminution in value to which we have referred.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Associated Oil Company against the Commary-Peterson Company, Incorporated, and the New England Casualty Company, and A. C. Thode, doing business under the name of the A. C. Thode Motor Draying Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and the two first named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Samuel Knight and F. E. Boland, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Edmund Tauszky, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The facts are undisputed, and we may adopt substantially respondent's statement of them. About June 9, 1914, the Commary-Peterson Company, hereinafter referred to as the "contractor," entered into a contract with the state of California for the construction of a portion of the state highway in Solano county. In compliance with law, the contractor, as principal, and the defendant New England Casualty Company, as surety, filed a bond with the department of engineering; the condition being that if the contractor shall pay or satisfactorily secure "the payment of all labor, materials and supplies furnished for constructing under the said contract the said portion of said highway, as in said contract stipulated, and as required by the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 27, 1897, entitled 'An act to secure the payment of claims of material men, mechanics or laborers employed by contractors on state, municipal or other public work,' and the acts amendatory thereof, then said bond shall have no effect, but that otherwise it shall remain in full force and virtue."

On June 25, 1914, the contractor entered into an agreement with defendant A. C. Thode, by which Thode agreed to haul all rock, sand, gravel, and cement required by the contractor from the places where the same are dumped to such places along the route of said highway as shall be designated by the contractor. Between June 25, 1914, and May 25, 1915, Thode performed the work specified in said contract.

During the months of October and November, 1914, plaintiff, at the request of Thode, furnished to him 2,668 gallons of gasoline at 12 cents per gallon, to be used and which were actually used in the performance of the work contracted to be performed by the contractor. The specific finding of the court as to this is:

> "That the gasoline furnished by plaintiff to defendant Thode was so furnished to be used and was actually used in operating and creating motive power with which to operate motor trucks used by said defendant Thode in hauling rock, sand, gravel, and cement used in the construction of said portion of said state highway, and that said hauling was done by said Thode pursuant to his said contract with said Commary-Peterson Company, Inc., and that said gasoline was so used in the performance of the work contracted to be performed by said Commary-Peterson Company, Inc., under said contract between said Commary-Peterson Company, Inc., and the state of California."

Judgment by default was taken against defendant Thode, and after trial, the court found for plaintiff against the contractor and the surety, and they have appealed from the judgment on the judgment roll.

The provision of said statute of 1897 involved herein requires:

> The contractor, before entering upon the performance of his contract, to file "a good and sufficient bond * * * in a sum not less than one-half of the total amount payable by the terms of the contract; such bond * * * must provide that if the contractor, person, company, or corporation, fails to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the sureties will pay the same, in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond." Stats. 1897, p. 202.

There is no dispute that the bond corresponded with said provision and that no legal objection could be made to it in any respect. There are, however, two grounds urged for a reversal: One, that the gasoline does not fall within the category of "supplies"; and, the other, that the law does not apply to material or labor furnished to a subcontractor.

[1] There seems to us to be no substantial merit in either contention. The use of the gasoline was inseparably connected with the performance of the contract to haul gravel, cement, etc. Without the motive power, the trucks, of course, could not have been propelled, and the delivery of the material could not have been effected. We can see nothing in the purpose or language of the law inconsistent with the conclusion of the learned trial judge that the gasoline was a material part of the supplies.

[2] As to the other objection, it is plain that the law is not confined to the engagements of the contractor. It was manifestly intended to cover all labor and all material contributing to the improvement, whether furnished directly to the contractor or indirectly through a subcontractor. The language of the act and bond will not permit the construction put upon it by appellant. Indeed, the contention, if sustained, would go far toward defeating the beneficent purpose of the statute.

While there is no controlling decision in this state, there is abundant authority for the position taken by respondent, and it may be well to call attention to some of the cases cited in the brief.

The Minnesota case, it is true, arose under the mechanics' lien law, but the provision construed therein was quite similar to the language found in the statute before us. In Johnson v. Starrett, 127 Minn. 138, 149 N. W. 6, L. R. A. 1915B, 708, the contract was for the excavation of a lot for the erection of a church. The work was done with a portable steam power machine known as a "whirly." The earth, as excavated and lifted by the machine, was loaded upon motor trucks and carried away. Johnson furnished Starrett coal used in generating the steam power for the whirly, and an oil company sold the gasoline used in the motor trucks; both of these fuels being sold to the contractors for the purpose stated and delivered on the premises. After the excavation was completed, the machine with its appurtenances was removed from the premises. As to the contention that the coal and gasoline did not furnish the basis for a lien, the court declared:

> "Both the coal and gasoline were materials, and both were components of the resultant achievement. Had the excavation and removal of the earth been done by manual labor, the right to a lien therefor would be undoubted, and we cannot differentiate such a case from one where the same result is reached by other and modern methods."

An interesting case is Zipp v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 73 App. Div. 20, 76 N. Y. Supp. 386. There one Kriess entered into contracts with the city of Buffalo whereby he agreed to construct a restraining wall across a certain slip in said city. On behalf of Kriess, said company executed its bond conditioned that if Kriess "shall well and truly perform all the labor and furnish all the material necessary to fully complete the work or improvement therein contemplated, and shall well and truly pay for all materials used and services rendered in the execution of such contract, then this obligation shall be void." Two boilers and engines were used for excavating the rocks, sand, and earth and for pumping the water from the slip. The plaintiff, at the request of the contractor, furnished coal, which was used as fuel in the boilers to create power, and it was claimed by the surety company that this was not within the terms of its undertaking. The court said:

> "In the interpretation of a bond or contract of this kind, it is to be construed in view of the work to be performed and the circumstances surrounding its execution, and by the same rules which govern in the construction of any other agreement. * * * The generation of power was essential in the performance of the contract, and, when the defendant became responsible for the payment of 'all materials used and services rendered in the execution of such contract,' it might have expected that fuel was to be consumed in the undertaking. The coal used entered into the execution of the agreement and formed a part of the value of the work done as much as the labor of the masons or of the men who aided in hoisting the stones into position to make up the wall. The materials used need not be a permanent constituent of the structure itself, but must be necessarily incident to the execution of the agreement to come within the purview of the defendant's contract; and the coal consumed in carrying on the work is of that character."

There is a federal statute, passed by Congress on August 13, 1894 (28 Stat. 278, c. 280 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 6923]), similar to our law of 1897, and in United States v. American Surety Co., 200 U. S. 197, 26 Sup. Ct. 168, 50 L. Ed. 437, the Supreme Court of the United States entered into quite an extended exposition of the purpose and interpretation of said statute. It was declared:

> "If literally construed, the obligation of the bond might be limited to secure only persons supplying labor or materials directly to the contractor, for which he would be personally liable. But we must not overlook, in construing this obligation, the manifest purpose of the statute to require that material and labor actually contributed to the construction of the public building shall be paid for and to provide a security to that end. Statutes are not to be so literally construed as to defeat the purpose of the Legislature. * * * There is no language in the statute nor in the bond which is therein authorized limiting the right of recovery to those who furnish material or labor directly to the contractor, but all persons supplying the contractor with labor or material in the prosecution of the work provided for in the contract are to be protected. The source of the labor or material is not indicated or circumscribed. It is only required to be 'supplied' to the contractor in the prosecution of the work provided for.

How supplied is not stated, and could only be known as the work advanced and the labor and material are furnished.

"If a construction is given to the bond so limiting the obligation incurred as to permit only those to recover who have contracted directly with the principal, it may happen that the material and labor which have contributed to the structure will not be paid for, owing to the default of subcontractors, and the manifest purpose of the statute to require compensation to those who have supplied such labor or material will be defeated."

In City Trust Safe Deposit & Surety Co. v. United States, 147 Fed. 155, 77 C. C. A. 397, one Bryant sold and delivered coal to the contractor which was used in the locomotives, hoisting engines, and pumping engines employed by the contractor in carrying on the work provided for in a contract for constructing a dry-dock. The surety company contended that coal is not a material supplied and used in the performance of the work within the meaning of the act of 1894; and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, after affirming the doctrine that the act of Congress and the bond given under it are susceptible of a more liberal construction than the lien statutes and should receive it, said:

"But no especially liberal construction is required to bring the materials supplied in this case within the protection of the act. The labor expended by men in wheeling barrows of material from the point of receipt to the place where it is to be used; in working hand pumps to clear an excavation of water; in turning the cranks of a hoisting derrick, so as to raise materials to a proper elevation—all such labor is so manifestly labor in the prosecution of the work that no one could have the hardihood to contend that it is not within the express terms of the statute. If the contractor, whether for purposes of economy or of expedition, elects to do this work by the power of steam, instead of the power of human muscles, it is difficult to understand how it can be logically contended that such power is not supplied in the prosecution of the work, or that the cost of the coal which produces it should not be equally within the protection of the same statute."

Under a statute similar to ours, a contract was entered into for the construction of a public street improvement in the city of Seattle, state of Washington. One of the claimants furnished to the contractor coal for fuel for a steam shovel used by him in excavating, which was a necessary part of the construction of the improvement, and the Supreme Court, in National Surety Co. v. Bratnober Lumber Co., 67 Wash. 601, 122 Pac. 337, held that a commodity like coal consumed in generating power is included in the word "supplies," saying:

"It seems to us that the words 'provisions' and 'supplies' include anything that is furnished for, and used directly in the carrying on of, the work, and is entirely consumed thereby.

In the case of Grants Pass Banking & Trust Co. v. Enterprise Mining Co., 58 Or. 174, 113 Pac. 859, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 395, the Supreme Court of Oregon held that electricity furnished for illumination and for the operation of a quartz mill on certain mining property constituted "supplies" for the working or development of the mine.

Another case from the same state is City of Portland v. New England Casualty Co., 78 Or. 195, 152 Pac. 253. The Oregon statute provides that contractors on public work shall give a bond conditioned that they shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying them "labor or materials for any prosecution of the work provided for in such contracts." A paving company obtained a contract for improving a street in the city of Portland, and the appellant here became its surety. The paving company subcontracted the work of laying cement sidewalks. The subcontractor engaged a company called the Auto Truck Company to haul the cement from a certain warehouse to the place of work. This company hired one Swan to do the hauling in auto trucks owned and operated by him. Neither the contractor nor subcontractor had any direct dealing with Swan. The subcontractor paid the Auto Truck Company, but the company failed to pay Swan, and he instituted suit on the bond. The Supreme Court held that the Oregon statute "does not limit the right of recovery to those who furnish labor or materials directly to the contractor, but all who supply him with labor or material for any prosecution of the work provided for in the contract are to be protected." It was further declared that:

"Truckmen transporting material for a short distance in order to prosecute the work under the contract accelerate the construction just as effectively as the man who mixes the concrete on the ground. * * * It is not important whether he conveys the cement in an auto truck or on his back. Such labor comes within the meaning of the words 'supplying labor or materials for any construction of the work.' It is directly connected with the work of construction and is essential thereto, and a person who performs it is entitled to bring an action on the bond for his benefit."

Appellants cite certain decisions from this state under the mechanic's lien law, claiming that:

"While this action is not to foreclose a lien and the special statute is the measure of the rights and liabilities of the parties, yet the end sought is the same and cases prosecuted under one statute are very persuasive in those under the other, particularly where similar language is employed."

These cases are reviewed by respondent, and it is shown that nothing contained therein is necessarily inconsistent with the conclusion of the lower court herein. Attention is also called to the fact that these cases were decided prior to the amendment of the mechanics' lien law in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1313) enlarging its scope and, in effect, giving a lien to "teamsters and draymen, and all persons and laborers of every class performing labor upon, or bestowing skill or other necessary services, or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in or furnishing appliances, teams and power contributing to the construction"; and it can hardly be disputed that if the work here had been of a private instead of a public character, and the action were to enforce a lien, the said amended statute is broad enough to cover the supplies furnished in this case.

However, it was held, in French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92, that the statute under consideration "is entirely distinct from and independent of the general mechanic's lien law." Therein, in answer to the contention that the services of Clapham as a blacksmith were not lienable, it was said:

> "We do not regard the claim of Clapham as similar to a claim of lien under the mechanic's lien law. The bond and the contract with the city are the source of the obligation, and the obligors agreed to pay for 'any work of any kind' done on the tunnel. Clapham furnished the labor, and it was labor such as the contract called for, and he filed the claim in his own name."

We may say in conclusion that as to the contingency of a default in payment on the part of a subcontractor or the possibility of a duplication of payments the contractor can, of course, protect himself by requiring a bond of the subcontractor or exacting the necessary receipts before making his settlement.

We perceive no reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

Action by the Tidewater Southern Railway Company against W. W. Frame. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant. H. C. Wuerth, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It is conceded by the appellant that this case is in all essential particulars as to its facts identical with the case of Tidewater Southern Railway Company v. Vance, 160 Pac. 1097. This being so, it follows, upon the authority of that case, the judgment herein will be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. VALENCIA. (Cr. 524.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⚿1153(3) — APPEAL — REVIEW — DISCRETION OF COURT — ORDER OF PROOF.

Under Pen. Code, § 1094, authorizing the court in the exercise of sound discretion to depart from the order of proof prescribed by section 1093, a ruling of the court permitting the prosecution in rebuttal to introduce evidence which contradicted no testimony offered by defendant does not require a reversal unless a clear abuse of the court's discretion is shown.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚿1036(1)—REVIEW—PRESENTING QUESTIONS BELOW — OPPORTUNITY TO MEET EVIDENCE.

Accused cannot object on appeal that the court's ruling permitting the prosecution to introduce on rebuttal evidence not proper rebuttal deprived him of an opportunity to contradict such evidence where he made no tender of contradicting evidence in the trial court.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⚿42 — EXEMPTION FROM PROSECUTION—STATUTE—TESTIMONY.

Pen. Code, § 1324, providing that one who has been compelled to give evidence against his objection that it would tend to incriminate himself cannot be prosecuted for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, does not exempt from prosecution one who while in jail made a voluntary statement to a justice of the peace which was not under oath and in which he denied committing the offense.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⚿1172(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY OF JURY.

In a prosecution for robbery, an instruction that emphatic expressions of opinion by jurors made when they entered the jury room should be avoided, and that jurors should hold their minds in such state that they might fully and freely interchange views with each other and receive the suggestions of fellow jurors, by observing which rule they may more likely reach a verdict, and that it is for the interest of the state and defendant both that a verdict should be returned, was not prejudicial to defendant, since it consisted of commonplace matters which would have occurred to the jury without instruction, and contained nothing from which any inference indicative of the court's opinion as to the defendant's guilt or innocence could have been drawn.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

William Valencia was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Roberto B. Camarillo, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. Complaint is made that C. J. Elliott, a witness called by the prosecution in rebuttal, was, over defendant's objection, permitted to give testimony, a part of which was in rebuttal of no evidence adduced on behalf of defendant, but which tended to corroborate evidence in chief offered by the people.

> "The fact that it was permitted to be given in rebuttal constituted in itself no ground of complaint. A court is warranted in departing from the order of proof prescribed by section 1093 of the Penal Code under proper circumstances. Whether it shall permit such departure is a matter committed to its sound discretion, and its action in that regard is not ground upon which error may be predicated, unless the discretion appears to have been grossly abused, and this abuse must affirmatively appear." People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 550, 89 Pac. 124.

The rule contained in section 1093, prescribing the order in which evidence shall be received, is not mandatory, but may be departed from in the sound discretion of the court. Section 1094, Pen. Code; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 56 Pac. 44.

[2] The contention that defendant was deprived of the right to introduce evidence in contradiction of new matter brought out by Elliott's testimony is wholly without merit, since, in the absence of such tender of evidence, no right was denied him. Had he made such tender, no doubt the court, as it was empowered to do (People v. Christensen, 85 Cal. 570, 24 Pac. 888), would have permitted him to reply to such alleged new matter.

[3] 2. It is next claimed that the prosecution was barred under the provisions of section 1324 of the Penal Code. This contention is based upon the fact that Elliott, who, it seems, was a justice of the peace, prior to issuing a warrant for defendant, and while the latter was in jail, called upon him, at which time defendant voluntarily made a statement to Elliott with reference to his movements and whereabouts at the time the offense was committed. Not only did the statement so made by defendant and testified to by Elliott, standing alone, tend to exonerate the defendant, since it contained a positive denial of any complicity in the crime, but it was not made in the course of any trial, hearing, or judicial proceeding, as defined by section 1324; nor was it made under oath, nor to Elliott other than in his individual character. The provisions of the section cannot be invoked by one accused of crime in voluntarily making extrajudicial statements. People v. Dye, 29 Cal. App. 181, 154 Pac. 875.

[4] 3. Objection is made to an instruction given which contained the following:

> "* * * It sometimes happens that when jurors enter the jury room they make emphatic expression of the opinions they have in the case of their firm determination of adhering to them. Such emphatic expressions of opinion are rarely productive of good. By their emphatic expression of opinion a sense of pride is enlisted and a juror subsequently, though advised of the position he announced is not tenable, hesitates from receding from that position for the reason that he has already expressed his determination to adhere to it. I would advise you gentlemen, to hold your minds in that state of abeyance so you may fully and freely interchange views with each other, and each individual juror hold his mind so open that he may receive the suggestions and remarks of his fellow jurors, and that his remarks may be entertained and received in the same spirit. I think that by observing that rule interchanging fully between yourselves your views upon the evidence that there is more likelihood you will reach a verdict than if you made an emphatic expression of the position you have assumed. You will remember, gentlemen, in the matters of this character it is advisable both for the interest of the state and benefit of the defendant that a verdict should be returned, that there should be a conclusion of the trial, and you are to remember, too, gentlemen, that you are not partisans in this matter, but you are judges, and that it is not with the opinion with which you retire, but with the judgment with which you return, that the correctness of your deliberation is to be estimated, and that in your deliberations in the jury room there can be no triumph excepting the ascertainment and declarations of the truth."

The substance of the part of the instruction to which objection is urged consists of commonplace matters which no doubt would have occurred to the jury without having it said to them by the court. At all events, there was nothing in the instruction, or any part of it, as in the case of People v. Carder, 160 Pac. 686, from which the jury could have drawn any inference indicative of the mind of the court as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. No intimation whatever was given as to how the court regarded the evidence; the sole purpose of the instruction being to require a reasonable effort on the part of the jury to come to some conclusion one way or another. Hence in no event could defendant have been prejudiced thereby. People v. Wilt (Sup.) 160 Pac. 561; People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 77 Pac. 666; Niles v. Sprague, 13 Iowa, 198.

The stereotyped contention that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct which prejudiced the rights of defendant merits no consideration.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DUMBARTON LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO. v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 1777.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⟾183½—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—PETITION—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Act June 10, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1049), providing for the organization of county water districts, notice of the time and place of the hearing of a petition for the creation of such a district, reciting that hearing would be held at the office of the board of supervisors in the county courthouse was sufficient, the objecting landowner participating in the hearing, to give the board jurisdiction, though the hearing actually occurred at the board's regular place of meeting in the hall of records across the street from the county courthouse; the hall of records being in the same group of buildings as the courthouse.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⟾183½ — WATER DISTRICTS—ORGANIZATION—REVIEW—MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

A determination by the board of supervisors of a county which organized a county water district, that petitioner's lands were benefited, based on conflicting evidence, cannot, where the board was acting within the scope of its jurisdiction, be reviewed on certiorari.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Petition by the Dumbarton Land & Improvement Company, a corporation, for a writ of certiorari against D. J. Murphy and others, Board of Supervisors, to review the determination of such board. From a judgment upholding the board's determination, and order denying new trial, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland, for appellant. W. H. L. Hynes, Dist. Atty., of Oakland (John T. Nourse, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial in a proceeding wherein the petitioner and appellant herein applied to the superior court of Alameda county for a writ of certiorari, in which it was sought to have reviewed proceedings of the board of supervisors of said county in relation to the formation of the Alameda water district and the inclusion of the lands of the petitioner within the boundaries of said district.

[1] The facts, in so far as they relate to the initial steps taken by the said board of supervisors looking to the organization of said district, are practically undisputed, and are briefly these: On November 3, 1913, there was presented to said board of supervisors a petition praying for the incorporation and organization of a county water district under the provisions of an act of the Legislature approved on June 10, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1049), providing for the organization of such districts. Said act provides that prior to the presentation of such petition notice of the time and place of the hearing thereon, signed by a certain number of those who are seeking to form such water district, was first to be given for the time and in the manner required by said act. The record herein shows that such notice purports to have been given, wherein the time and place of hearing upon said petition was fixed for November 3, 1913, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. at the office of said board of supervisors "in the county courthouse of the city of Oakland." The record further discloses that on the said 3d day of November, 1913, the said board of supervisors met at the hour appointed in said notice at the meeting rooms of said board in the hall of records of said county, and that at said meeting the hearing upon said petition was regularly continued to the 10th day of November, 1913, and was then again continued to the 12th day of November, 1913, and then to the 17th day of November, 1913, and thence to the 25th day of November, 1913, on which last-named day a hearing was had thereon, and that after such hearing, and after the board had excepted from the first-named boundaries of the proposed water district certain lands of the petitioner herein and of certain other persons, which were shown to be covered with water, but had included the portion of the lands described in the petition herein, the board ordered an election to be held within the proposed district to determine whether it was the will of the electors therein that it should be organized under the provisions of the said act; that such election was called and held on December 30, 1913, at which it was voted that said district should be organized. On the 29th day of December, 1913, the day before said election, the petitioners herein applied to the superior court of said county for said writ of review, and on said day obtained said writ, directing the board of supervisors and the members thereof to certify their proceedings in said matter to said court. This was done, and upon the hearing thereon the judgment and order were made from which this appeal has been taken.

The first contention of the appellant is that the board of supervisors never acquired jurisdiction over the matter of the formation of the said water district by reason of certain alleged irregularities and defects in the preliminary proceedings, and chiefly in the notice of the hearing upon the petition by those who were seeking to have the water district created. It appears from the record that subsequent to the inception of said proceedings for the formation of the district and to the election held pursuant thereto, and to the application for the present writ of review, but prior to the hearing thereon, the Legislature by an act approved April 7, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 26), undertook to validate the proceedings for the formation of said district, and it is conceded by the appellant that this validating act of the Legislature did in fact operate to cure all irregularities in the said proceedings with the exception of the two jurisdictional defects which are insisted upon on this appeal. The first of these consists in the alleged defect in the notice of the hearing upon the petition for the formation of said district.

It is contended by the appellant that said notice of hearing specified as the place where such hearing would be held "the office of said board in the county courthouse in the city of Oakland," whereas the board of supervisors has no office in the county courthouse in the city of Oakland, and did not in fact meet there at the time of the first or any hearing upon said petition. It appears, however, from the record herein, that the regular place of meeting of the board of supervisors of Alameda county is in the building known as the hall of records, which stands across the street from the structure commonly designated as the courthouse, but which building is occupied by a number of the county offices, such as clerk, recorder, auditor, treasurer, and the board of supervisors. It is a matter of common knowledge —in that county at least—that said building is so located, occupied, and used, and that it is in fact one of the group of buildings in the city of Oakland devoted to such official activities and uses as are commonly conducted in courthouses. Moreover, the record discloses that the petitioner herein appeared at the said meeting place of said board of supervisors at the time designated in said notice for the first hearing upon said petition, and also appeared and participated in the subsequent hearings thereon at said place without making any objection to the form or sufficiency of said notice, and was therefore in no way misled by its terms.

In view of the foregoing facts we find no merit in the present contention of the appellant as to the insufficiency of said notice to give the board of supervisors jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter thus brought before it.

The second contention of the appellant is that the lands of the petitioner which were finally included within the boundaries of the said water district as the same was organized and incorporated under the orders of said board, were of such nature and character that they could not derive any benefit from the construction and operation of the system of waterworks to be provided and operated through the creation of said water district. It is strenuously argued by the appellant that if its lands are of the character above indicated the board of supervisors would have no authority or jurisdiction to include said lands within said district, and hence that its proceedings and orders culminating in the inclusion of appellant's said lands therein were and each of them is void, and that this being so, the aforesaid act of the Legislature attempting to validate said proceedings was ineffectual for the reason that to give such effect to it would be to take away from the appellant property without due process of law. The authorities cited by the appellant in support of this contention fully sustain it, and we have no doubt that if the undisputed fact should be that the said lands of the petitioner herein were not, from their nature, character, or location, susceptible of receiving the benefit from the creation of such district and the exercise of its functions which are contemplated by the terms of the act of the Legislature providing for the creation of water districts of this character, the effort of the person or official seeking to so illegally include said lands within such district could be successfully thwarted through some appropriate judicial proceeding, and this notwithstanding the act of the Legislature purporting to validate the same. The respondents herein, however, contend that conceding this to be so, a writ of certiorari is not the appropriate or proper proceeding by which to determine said matter; that the board of supervisors having once acquired jurisdiction to determine the matter of the organization of said water district, and having proceeded to organize the same in accordance with the terms of the statute, and the said district having thereby acquired a de facto or de jure existence, its due incorporation can only be assailed by quo warranto, and in support of this contention the respondents present much and very respectable authority.

[2] We do not, however, deem it necessary to enter upon the discussion or decision of either of these questions in this case, for the reason that the record herein discloses that the issue as to whether the said lands of the petitioner were by location and nature such as to be susceptible of receiving the benefits resulting from the creation and operation of said water district in accordance with the purposes of said legislative act providing for its formation, was presented to the board of supervisors during the course of the hearing upon the petition for the formation of such water district, and that the board took evidence thereon, and that the evidence thus taken was in substantial conflict upon such issue, and that the board resolved such conflict in the evidence in favor of the exclusion of a certain portion of the lands of said petitioner herein from the boundaries of said water district, and also in favor of the inclusion of that other portion of the petitioner's said lands involved in this proceeding within the boundaries of said district. Whether in so doing the board was exercising legislative or judicial functions need not be put in question here. They were acting within the scope of their jurisdiction in the premises, and hence with the result of their determination we are not in this proceeding at liberty to interfere.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Ex parte WISNER. (Cr. 528.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑81—POLICE POWER — REGULATION OF OCCUPATIONS AND AMUSEMENTS.

With regard to employments, occupations, or amusements not of such a character as to be in themselves commonly objectionable, the arm of the police power may be extended only to regulate, and not prohibit.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑625, 626—POLICE REGULATIONS—ORDINANCE—VALIDITY—"UNINCLOSED"—"INCLOSED."

An ordinance of the city of Venice provided that it should be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation in any public or uninclosed place in the city to play any musical instrument, to sing, to make any loud or unusual noise, or to call out goods, wares or merchandise, or the attractive features of any amusement, device, or place of recreation or refreshment, without first securing from the board of trustees a permit so to do, which should be granted only on written application specifying the place for which the permit was to be granted and the kind of amusement or noise desired to be made. Held, that such ordinance was void as both discriminatory and unreasonable, though the board of trustees might limit the right of persons to play musical instruments or utter loud sounds even to the extent of absolute prohibition, the ordinance covering more than public streets, places, and ways, and applying to private premises and every such place as may be "uninclosed," which means a place not entirely inclosed, an "inclosed" place being a place inclosed on all sides by some sort of material.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Inclosed.]

In the matter of the application of C. Q. Wisner for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged from custody.

Hutton & Williams, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Charles W. Lyon, Fredericks & Hanna, and Byron C. Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The petitioner, being imprisoned by the marshal of the city of Venice upon commitment after conviction for an alleged crime, to wit, the violation of a certain ordinance of the city of Venice, sued out this writ to determine the validity of such imprisonment.

The ordinance under which petitioner was prosecuted, in that part descriptive of the offense which might be committed thereunder, is as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, in any public or uninclosed place, in the city of Venice, to play any musical instrument, or to sing, or to make any loud or unusual noise, or to call out goods, wares or merchandise, or the attractive features of any amusement, device or place of recreation or refreshment, without first securing from the board of trustees, a permit so to do. Said permit shall be granted only upon a written application, which application must specify the place for which the permit is to be granted, and the kind of amusement or noise desired to be made."

It is contended that the ordinance is void: First, because it invades the right of the citizen in unduly restricting liberty of action; second, that it is discriminatory. The right of a legislative body in the exercise of its police power to prescribe and enforce reasonable police measures cannot be questioned. However, such power is not without bounds or limits.

[1] With regard to employments, occupations, or amusements not of such a character as to be in themselves commonly objectionable, the arm of the police power may be extended only to regulate, and not prohibit. The regulation must be reasonable and must apply alike to all persons within a class. In County of Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Association, 124 Cal. 349, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, the court said:

> "If the business be lawful, and having no injurious tendency, they (the legislative authority) cannot say who shall and who shall not exercise the right itself. Under the guise of regulating a business the municipality cannot make prohibition possible by committing to the officers of the municipality the arbitrary power to deny permission to engage in that business."

In the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, of the Supreme Court, in the Matter of the Application of Dart, 172 Cal. 47, 155 Pac. 63, L. R. A. 1916D, 905, the leading cases pertinent to this subject are cited, and extensive quotations expressive of the rule of interpretation made. The learned justice writing that opinion observes further:

> "But a law or ordinance by or under which a lawful occupation, in itself, when properly conducted, in no wise injurious to persons, property, or the public interest, may be absolutely prohibited at the dictation of any official body without other cause than its own will or desire, is beyond the legislative power, and to that extent void."

[2] In this case the defendant was charged with having, in an "uninclosed" place in the city of Venice, played a musical instrument, to wit, a snare drum, without first having secured a permit so to do. By an "uninclosed place," as the language is in the ordinance, we take that to mean a place not entirely inclosed; or, in other words, an inclosed place would be a place inclosed on all sides by some sort of material. The ordinance, in the first place, is utterly without descriptive terms defining any character of inclosure; hence one person might upon his premises erect an inclosure of canvas, or even cheesecloth, and he might therein sing or play musical instruments at will without rendering himself amenable to the punishment prescribed by the ordinance. His neighbor, on the other hand, might have his ground inclosed on all sides, except the top, by heavy wooden walls, and yet, if he played a violin therein without a permit from the board of trustees, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor. Then, too, regardless of the kind of instrument played, or the noise or "music" which may be produced thereon, the board of trustees has the arbitrary power to grant to one person a permit and deny it to another person similarly situated and with the same nearness to neighbors or the public ways. There would be no question at all but that the board of trustees might limit the right of persons to play musical instruments or utter loud sounds in public places, even to the extent of absolutely prohibiting such acts, but the ordinance in terms covers more than the public streets, places, and ways; it applies to private premises of the individual and every such place as may be "uninclosed." As the matter is presented, there is nothing in the charge made by the complaint to indicate that any of the acts complained of were done upon the street or any public place within the city, and we cannot assume that it was intended so to charge. Our conclusion is that the ordinance in question is both discriminatory and unreasonable.

It is ordered that the petitioner be discharged from custody.

Hutton & Williams, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Charles W. Lyon and Fredericks & Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this matter petitioner was charged under the same ordinance and in like form as was the petitioner Wisner in the habeas corpus matter decided this day (Crim. No. 528, 163 Pac. 868); the only difference being that the petitioner here was charged with having played upon a different musical instrument from that used by said Wisner. What is said in the opinion in the matter of Wisner is applicable here. Upon the authority of that decision, it is ordered that petitioner be discharged from custody.

BANK OF HAYWARDS v. KENYON et al. (Civ. 1914.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Jan. 31, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1917.)

1. Pleading ⟹353—Late Filing of Answer—Striking Answer.

An answer filed late is an irregularity, and not an absolute nullity, and where a defendant filed his answer one day late, which had been served in time, plaintiff was not, as matter of strict right, entitled to have the answer stricken from the files; a judicial discretion in the premises being lodged in the trial court to be exercised in view of all the facts in the case and in the promotion of justice.

2. Judgment ⟹114 — Default in Answering.

Entry of defendant's default in answering is no more than a privilege which may or may not be exercised by plaintiff, and, when it has not been taken advantage of before defendant files his answer, the latter cannot be regarded strictly as in default.

3. JUDGMENT 🔑114 — JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where defendant's answer was filed but one day late, and set forth a meritorious defense, and plaintiff did not move to strike it from the files until a month after it was filed, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should have denied plaintiff's motion for judgment by default, and have allowed the cause to proceed to trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Haywards against Walter H. Kenyon and another. From an order striking out the named defendant's separate answer, and ordering default and judgment for plaintiff against him, from the judgment entered, and from an order denying his motion to vacate the order and set aside the judgment, the named defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

J. W. Dignan, of Oakland, and Clarence E. Todd, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. I. Lemos, of Hayward, and Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by Walter H. Kenyon, one of the defendants, from an order of court striking out his separate answer and ordering default and judgment in favor of plaintiff and against said defendant; from the judgment entered and from an order denying said defendant's motion to vacate the order and set aside the judgment.

The facts of the case may be stated in a few words. Upon motion of the plaintiff the trial court struck from the files the answer of the appellant Walter H. Kenyon, and ordered judgment by default to be entered, for the reason that said answer had not been filed within the time allowed by the court upon overruling the demurrer of said Kenyon to the complaint, although it had been served in time and was but one day late in being filed. Appellant moved the court to set aside its order and judgment, striking his answer from the files and ordering judgment by default to be entered against him, upon various grounds, in which, however, was no claim that the delay in the filing of the answer was the result of inadvertence, mistake, or excusable neglect. This motion was denied by the court.

[1] We cannot agree with the contention of plaintiff that the answer of said defendant having been filed late and without permission of the court, the court was bound, upon motion, to strike the same from the files. An answer filed late is an irregularity, and not an absolute nullity, and the plaintiff was not, as a matter of strict right, entitled to have it stricken from the files. Discretion to do this is lodged in the trial court (Bowers v. Dickerson, 18 Cal. 420; Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 Pac. 907); but, of course, it is a judicial discretion, to be exercised in view of all the facts in the case and in the promotion of justice. It has even been held, as in the case of Drake v. Duvenick, 45 Cal. 455, 463, that the purpose of entering a default is to limit the time during which a defendant may file his answer—which necessarily implies that the defendant's time to answer is extended until the plaintiff causes default to be entered. And that the defendant's time to answer is thus extended was expressly held in the case of Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 Pac. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737, where Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court, said:

> "When a party, after the time expressly granted for filing a pleading against him has expired, suffers further time to elapse without taking any action thereon, and in the meantime the pleading is served and filed, he, by such conduct, in effect grants the additional time and the party is not strictly in default."

[2] According to the doctrine of these cases, the entry of the defendant's default is no more than a privilege which may or may not be exercised by the plaintiff; and when it has not been taken advantage of before the defendant files his answer he cannot be regarded strictly as in default.

[3] In the present case the appellant's answer was filed but one day late, and it set forth a meritorious defense. The plaintiff did not move to strike it from the files until one month after its filing. Under these circumstances we think that the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, ought to have denied the plaintiff's motion and have allowed the cause to proceed to trial. In our opinion the trial court abused its discretion in striking the appellant's answer from the files and ordering judgment by default to be entered against him. Lybecker v. Murray, 58 Cal. 186.

It follows that the judgment and orders appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court for further proceedings; and it is so ordered.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑29(2)—APPLICATION OF STATUTE—"OPEN ACCOUNT."

An account for goods purchased in 1912, remaining on the books till 1915, without any payments thereon, is not an "open account" within Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, providing that an action to recover a balance due upon an open book account may be brought within four years, but is simple account barred in two years under section 339; no payments having been made thereon.

Action by the Merchants' Collection Agency against Ben Levi. From a judgment for defendant after his motion for nonsuit had been granted, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Wakeman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wal J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant after his motion for a nonsuit had been granted. The facts are therefore undisputed, and are these: On March 20, 1912, the defendant purchased from W. & J. Sloane two items of goods amounting to the sum of $325. They were not paid for, and the said sum was charged to the defendant on the books of W. & J. Sloane. Thereafter the account was assigned to the plaintiff, who commenced action thereon on September 24, 1915. The defendant answered, pleading the bar of the statute of limitations under section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon the trial and upon proof of the foregoing facts the court granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit upon the ground pleaded in his answer.

The sole question presented for determination upon this appeal is as to whether the account sued upon is such an open book account as to bring the action upon it within the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads as follows:

> "Sec. 335. The periods prescribed for the commencement of actions other than for the recovery of real property are as follows: * * *
> "Sec. 337. Within four years: * * * 2. An action to recover a balance due upon a mutual, open and current account or upon an open book account."

It seems to us quite clear that the only reasonable, as well as the only proper, grammatical construction to be placed upon the foregoing section of the Code is that the only book account upon which an action may be commenced within four years under subdivision 2 thereof is a book account upon which there is a balance due. This would necessarily imply that the account should be one upon which the debtor had made payments which, being credited to him, would leave a balance due, and also which, being made by him, would indicate his desire and intent that the account should remain open. It would seem that the intent of the Legislature in amending subdivision 2, § 337, Code of Civil Procedure, so as to include open book accounts was to take accounts upon which money payments had been made out of the category of simple accounts to which it had been long held the provisions of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, had application, and place such accounts in the same category with mutual, open, and current accounts whereon the balance remaining due from time to time was the result of mutual transactions other than mere money credits. Any other construction would render the amendment to this section of the Code applicable to all accounts other than stated accounts, and would wipe out by indirection the long and uniform line of authority holding actions upon simple accounts to be within the two-year limitation of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure. We are entirely satisfied that such was not the intent of the Legislature in thus amending the former section of the Code. This being so, and this action not being an action to recover a balance due upon the account in question, we are of the opinion that the court committed no error in granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by G. S. Kling and others against Joseph Bucher. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for appellant. Frederick Baker, of Los Angeles, and Curtis & McNabb, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal from the judgment entered against the defendant. The action was to recover the sum of $4,726.51, alleged as an unpaid balance due from the defendant to the plaintiffs upon a contract for the erection of a hotel building in the city of San Bernardino. Various installment payments were made to the contractors while the building was in course of construction, amounting to $52,350. The contract provided that no payment should be made except upon the production of the certificate of the architect, and the contention of the appellant is that, not only was there a failure on the part of the plaintiffs to show that the building had been constructed as required by the specifications, but that there was a failure also to produce an architect's certificate evidencing the fact of final completion and the right of the plaintiffs to receive complete payment. The court upon sufficient evidence, as is disclosed by the bill of exceptions, found that there had been a substantial completion under the contract and specifications, and the appellant, therefore, must rest his claim for reversal of the judgment upon the fact that the plaintiffs failed to present the architect's certificate, which it is contended was a necessary prerequisite to the right to demand the money sued for. While the contract did specifically provide that the architect's certificate should be produced before any payment should be made on the work, it appears that the appellant, the owner, of his own motion, disregarded this requirement as to all of the payments, except the last, and that he did make 17 payments without any objection to the lack of a certificate. The supervision architect testified:

> "I prepared the first certificate and handed it to Mr. Bucher. He said, 'I have already given the money.' I didn't think much about that, and the next time I brought the certificate he told me he had paid that money and something ahead. I said, 'This is peculiar if you are going to pay checks without the certificates,' and I thought if Mr. Bucher was going to keep making these payments, I wouldn't draw the certificates, and from that time on I drew no further certificates. I am not positive I spoke to Mr. Bucher about it. He made this remark: 'They need the money, and I have it in the bank, and they might as well have it; I am not using it.' That is the understanding he gave me. He had the money, and he wanted them to have it so they could be using it."

[1] We think these facts clearly show a waiver on the part of the owner of the requirement for the production of the architect's certificates, especially as the further fact was shown that he did not at the time he refused to make the final payment base his objections upon a failure of the contractors to furnish him with such certificate. The main controversy arose over the heating plant, which was shown by testimony to have been substantially completed according to specifications. However, it did not work satisfactorily, and the owner had changes made, a different burner installed; in fact, the final arrangement in regard to the heating plant was considerably different from that which was constructed according to the plans. In Knarston v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 63, 73 Pac. 740, speaking of the right of a party to waive a condition made for his benefit, the court said:

> "This waiver may be established by evidence of an express waiver, or by circumstances from which such waiver may be inferred."

[2] Laying aside the question of waiver for a moment, there is another reason why appellant is not in a position to complain: The court found that there was a completion of the work, and in that case there was no legal ground left upon which an architect's certificate might be refused. Where a certificate is refused without cause, the contractor may not be forever debarred from collecting his money. This court so declared in Machinery & Electrical Co. v. Y. M. C. A., 22 Cal. App. 416, 134 Pac. 724, when it was said:

> "It may be admitted that where an architect refuses to issue a certificate to a contractor showing that the latter is entitled to be paid, where no substantial reason exists for such refusal, the contractor may recover the amount agreed to be paid, notwithstanding that the contract specifically provides that payment shall be made only upon the production of the certificate of the architect."

Respondents suggest further that in order to avail the appellant of the objection based upon the failure of the architect to furnish the certificate, that objection should have been presented in the answer, and that the answer contains no averment of that kind. Under the view we have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to give any consideration to this point.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Certiorari proceedings by Harry F. Maidenberg against Justice's Court of Los Angeles

Township, State of California, and Edward Judson Brown, Justice of said court. From an order dismissing the proceeding, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Stick and Collamer A. Bridge, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. S. McKelvey, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Upon the application of plaintiff as petitioner, the superior court of Los Angeles county issued a writ of certiorari directed to Edward Judson Brown, justice of the peace of Los Angeles township, pursuant to which said justice of the peace certified and transmitted to said court for review a transcript of its proceedings, including papers and docket entries, in a certain case, wherein petitioner was plaintiff and Roscoe E. Knight was defendant. Upon an examination of such record had at the hearing, the court made an order in effect dismissing the proceeding. On appeal therefrom, petitioner presents a transcript, certified by the clerk of the superior court, containing copies of the papers, docket entries, and proceedings of the justice's court in said action. From this document it appears that upon the trial of the case in question being closed on February 5th, 1915, defendant was instructed to file an amended answer; that on March 12th defendant filed an answer, admitting the claim of plaintiff in the sum of $201.66, and by way of counterclaim alleged there was due from plaintiff to him the sum of $600, leaving a balance of some $398 due defendant from plaintiff; that he remitted therefrom the sum of $99, whereupon the court on said date rendered judgment in favor of defendant for $299.

[1-3] The contention of petitioner is that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in entertaining said counterclaim in the sum of $600 so set up by defendant, and likewise exceeded its jurisdiction in entering judgment thereon without allowing plaintiff an opportunity to plead thereto, and also for the further reason that no copy of said amended answer and counterclaim was ever served upon plaintiff. Section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "A writ of review may be granted * * * when an inferior tribunal * * * exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal * * * and there is no appeal. * * *"

Without discussing the merits of petitioner's contention as to want of jurisdiction in the justice to render the judgment, it is plain that the alleged erroneous action of the court could have been corrected by the superior court on an appeal from the judgment. Appellant concedes that an appeal would have afforded him an adequate remedy, but in his brief says that he did not have any notice of the entry of said judgment until April 14th, on which date the time for perfecting an appeal had expired, and for this reason invoked the aid of the writ of review. While so stated by counsel, the record brought up is silent upon the question. From aught that appears by the record to the contrary, plaintiff may have been in court when the answer was filed and present when the judgment was rendered, or had notice of the rendition of the judgment before the time for perfecting an appeal therefrom expired. At all events, we cannot accept the ex parte statements of counsel in lieu of facts shown by the transcript so sent up for review. "An appeal might have been taken, and it is no excuse that defendant did not know of the rendering of the judgment in time to avail himself of that remedy." Hall v. Justice's Court, 5 Cal. App. 139, 89 Pac. 870. In the case of Tucker v. Justice's Court, 120 Cal. 512, 52 Pac. 808, it is said:

> "It is well settled that when an appeal may be taken resort cannot be had to a writ of review. The cases so holding are numerous, and need not be cited."

To the same effect are Weldon v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 429, 71 Pac. 502, and McCue v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 545, 12 Pac. 615. In Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25, referring to the function of the writ of review, it is said:

> "The statute was intended to supply a remedy where none existed in the first instance, and not to supplement one lost through the laches of the party himself."

To like effect is Hood v. Melrose, 24 Cal. App. 355, 141 Pac. 396. No provision seems to be made in the Code requiring service of notice of the entry of judgments in justices' courts to start the time running within which the losing party may perfect an appeal from the judgment. In the present case, the action was tried on February 5th and defendant given permission to file an amended answer. Judgment followed on March 12th. The time within which he might have perfected his appeal did not expire until April 12th. Two days thereafter, according to counsel's statement, he learned that the judgment was entered.

In our opinion, conceding the rendition of the judgment to have been in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, the perfecting of an appeal therefrom would have afforded petitioner an adequate remedy for the erroneous action of the court; there is nothing in the record showing that petitioner was deprived of an opportunity of prosecuting such an appeal, and his alleged failure to learn of the entry of the judgment was due to his own laches; and, since the law provides a remedy by appeal, in no event can resort be had to the writ of review.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by M. L. Brittan against Charles H. Fisher. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Pemberton and A. G. Kazebeer, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. O. Minor and H. W. Brunk, both of Berkeley, for respondent.

HART, J The controversy here involves the question of the ownership of a restaurant, a delicatessen, and a bakery business and the equipments and a certain leasehold interest in the building and the basement thereof, situated at 2026–2030 Shattuck avenue, in the city of Berkeley, in which said business was carried on and conducted.

The complaint is in two counts, and the relief sought is: That the defendant, who is in possession of the property above mentioned, be declared to be the holder of said property as the plaintiff's trustee; that defendant be compelled to render an account of his acts and transactions as such trustee; that said trust be terminated, and that the defendant be required to turn over to the plaintiff the possession of said property; that a receiver pendente lite to take and hold possession of said property be appointed; that a certain chattel mortgage executed by the plaintiff and one J. D. Hendrix on the restaurant property to the defendant be canceled.

The defendant, by denials and an affirmative statement of the facts of the several transactions from which this litigation arose, answered the complaint.

Findings, conclusions of law, and a judgment in favor of the defendant were filed and entered.

The cause is brought to this court by the plaintiff by appeals from the judgment and the order denying her application for a new trial.

The general contentions urged by the appellant are that the findings are not supported and that the court erred to the prejudice of her substantial rights in allowing certain testimony to be received. As to the findings, the specific point made by the appellant is that the evidence shows beyond controversy that with respect to the property and the transactions appertaining thereto the defendant occupied toward the plaintiff a fiduciary or confidential relation, to wit, trustee of an express trust, and that the evidence discloses beyond peradventure, so it is claimed, that the defendant, in consummating the alleged purchase by him of the property, particularly that portion thereof which was not subject to a certain mortgage to which particular reference will hereafter be made, practiced and used "adverse pressure" and undue influence and "strong coercion," contrary to the mandates of sections 2228 and 2230 of the Civil Code. In other words, the contention is that the defendant took undue advantage of the confidential business relation existing between him and the plaintiff—that of trustee and beneficiary—and thus brought about the consummation of an unconscientious and fraudulent transfer of the title of the property to himself. It is further claimed that, as a matter of fact, no sale of the property and the business to the defendant ever took place.

[1] The facts found by the court directly negative the above contentions. It will be conceded, of course, that, if there is any evidence which affords substantial support to the findings, it is beyond the power of this court to disturb them, although there may be other evidence in direct opposition thereto. This observation merely involves the statement of a rule which has by the courts so often been declared and exemplified in the cases that its repetition is rather supererogatory than necessary.

The facts, as they are gathered principally from the testimony of the defendant and partly admitted and as they are substantially found by the court, are these: That on the 4th day of September, 1913, and for some time prior thereto, the defendant owned and conducted the restaurant business in the building above described on Shattuck avenue, in the city of Berkeley; that he owned and held a leasehold interest in said building and all the equipments used in carrying on said business; that on the day mentioned he sold the said property and business and the lease to the building to one J. D. Hendrix and the plaintiff, for the sum of $3,250; that, on the consummation of said sale Hendrix and the plaintiff paid the defendant $1,000 in cash and executed and delivered to the defendant a number of promissory notes, payable at different dates, for the balance, securing said notes by the execution in favor of the defendant of a chattel mortgage on the property and business of the restaurant. Said mortgage contained, among others, a provision that, in case there was default by the mortgagors in the payment of any of the said notes or the interest thereon accruing, then all said notes should thereupon become due and payable at the option of the mortgagee, and that the latter might in such event take possession of the mortgaged property and proceed at once to sell the same "in the manner provided by law," and apply the proceeds of such sale to the payment of said notes, the interest thereon, costs of sale, and counsel fees, and pay the surplus of any to the mortgagors.

Hendrix and the plaintiff immediately took possession of the property and charge of the restaurant business, and the defendant went to Lankershim, Cal., and launched upon the business of raising poultry.

Hendrix and the plaintiff jointly carried on the business of the restaurant from the time that they took possession thereof until the 27th day of January, 1914. In the meantime they had paid the defendant various sums on said notes and mortgage, thus reducing the mortgage debt to the sum of $1,500.

On the said 27th day of January, 1914, Hendrix and the plaintiff found themselves well-nigh, if not quite hopelessly in debt. In the conduct of the restaurant business they became indebted to various persons and firms in the sum approximately of $6,000. They were also in default in the payment of some of the notes executed by them to the defendant. Their creditors, other than the defendant, were pressing them for a settlement of their claims, and one or more attachments had been levied upon the restaurant and the property with which it was operated.

It appears that on or about said 27th day of January, 1914, Hendrix sold and transferred all his interest in the property and business of the restaurant to the plaintiff and so severed his connection therewith. It further appears that, after taking over the restaurant business and the property connected therewith, Hendrix and the plaintiff opened in the same building a delicatessen and bakery, and conducted the same in connection with the restaurant. This branch of their enterprise and the property or equipments essential to the carrying on thereof were not included in or subject to the mortgage given by them to the defendant.

The defendant testified that prior to the 27th day of January, 1914, he received a telegram at his home at Lankershim from a Mr. Coulter, one of the creditors of the plaintiff, stating that an attachment had been levied on the restaurant, and that the financial affairs of the concern were in a bad condition, and requesting him (defendant) to go to Berkeley at once; that, on the 26th day of January, 1914, he went to Berkeley, thence to the restaurant and found it under attachment; that, within a few days after he arrived at Berkeley, a meeting of the creditors of the plaintiff was held in the offices of the defendant's attorneys in Berkeley, said meeting having been called by the plaintiff's attorney; that it was at said meeting announced by an expert who had previously examined the plaintiff's books on behalf of the creditors that the debts of the concern amounted in the aggregate to a sum in excess of $6,000. The plaintiff, on the 27th day of January, 1914, executed and delivered to the defendant the following document:

> "To C. H. Fisher:

Hendrix and myself to you dated the 4th day of September, 1913, and recorded on the same day in the recorder's office of Alameda county. >
> "In consideration of the foregoing, and the further consideration of your taking possession under this license, it is understood that you will abide by any agreement or plan of operation that the creditors may arrive at for the future conduct of said business looking towards the running of the concern provided your interests are not prejudiced thereby nor your security impaired. M. L. Brittan.
> "I accept the terms and conditions set forth herein. C. H. Fisher."

At the time of the execution of the foregoing writing, one of the notes given by Hendrix and the plaintiff to the defendant was overdue by about 24 days.

The defendant, immediately upon the execution and delivery to him of said writing, took possession of the restaurant and the property thereof and the equipments of the delicatessen and bakery, and, so he testified, remained in possession thereof under said agreement and the chattel mortgage until about the 3d day of February, 1914.

When the monthly rent fell due, continued the defendant, he was unable to pay it, and so called on the plaintiff and asked her to raise the money necessary for that purpose, saying that the business could not be further prosecuted unless the rent was paid. She replied that she was wholly without means to pay it. "I then told her," proceeded the defendant, "that under my chattel mortgage, if she did not pay the rent or the creditors did not pay it, I would force them to foreclose, as my mortgage was prior, and that I wouldn't put up any more money to run the place. I told her that the place was not near paying expenses, wasn't near taking in enough money to pay expenses, and they would have to settle. * * * She told me then that if she could be relieved from all the debts—the $6,000 of debt—and I could sell the restaurant and what stuff they had in the other storeroom and settle with the creditors, it would relieve her from any other obligation of paying any further bills and debts; and so I called a meeting then of the creditors, and told them how things were, that if they wanted to run it any longer that they put up the money to do it; and they wouldn't do it. So they sold, tried to sell, the restaurant; but they could not get any more for it than the $1,500 coming to me, on my mortgage. * * * Miss Brittan did try to raise the money to conduct the business between the 27th of January and the 3d of February. * * * I went with her and with her uncle and another party to Oakland to try and get the money. Stayed there with them the best part of a forenoon. They did not show up then and could not raise the money. During the negotiations I told the creditors if they would put up the money, could settle with me, and pay up the money, they could run the restaurant; but no, they wouldn't do that, they would not put any more into it would not even put up money to pay the rent, and said they would close it out as it was. * * * So they turned the mortgage back to me. * * * Well, on the 3d day of February—before that, after we tried to raise the money and she could not raise any more money—then I told her what had to be done; that she would either have to put up the money or the creditors would sell the place. So, before me and Mr. Mikkelsen, the man that collects the rent, she said that, if we could sell the stuff in the delicatessen store and could relieve her from further responsibility of any one trying to collect these debts after, settle with a committee or get a written statement that would relieve her from any of her debts, why she would be willing to turn the restaurant back to me." The defendant at this time again asked the plaintiff to raise the rent, and called her attention to the fact that another of her notes which he owned and held was due and payable. She then said to him that "the best thing to do is to sell the property, leave the creditors to sell it, and if they would relieve her from any other liability from any one of the creditors coming back on her to collect the bills afterwards that had been created the last three months and a half." Adopting the suggestion so made by the plaintiff, the creditors, acting through a committee appointed from their number, proceeded to attempt to sell the property. "They couldn't get a bid for it," testified the defendant, "and they wanted to know if I would give more than $1,500, and I said I wouldn't." The creditors then sold the property of the delicatessen to the defendant upon his bid for the sum of $600, and, so the defendant testified, "agreed to release Hendrix and Miss Brittan, on the 3d day of February. * * * The restaurant was turned over to me and the $600 was to be given to the creditors, to be divided among them."

The notes given to the defendant by Hendrix and the plaintiff had not, down to the time of the trial, been surrendered to the plaintiff, nor had there been a release or satisfaction of the mortgage, but the defendant in effect testified that he treated the notes as canceled after he had taken back the restaurant. In this connection it is proper to say that the judgment herein has directed that the said notes be delivered to the clerk of the court for cancellation.

The defendant testified that, when he took charge of the restaurant under his mortgage and the agreement of the plaintiff, the business had fallen off to such an extent that it was hardly paying its running expenses, and that it did no better during the period intervening between the date he so took possession and control of it and the time the creditors settled their claims as above indicated.

The witness Mikkelsen a creditor of the plaintiff, testified that at a meeting of the creditors' committee held in the delicatessen part of the building in which the restaurant was conducted after the defendant re-entered into the possession of the restaurant it was generally agreed among the members thereof that the better plan would be to turn the restaurant and delicatessen over to the committee, to be by it disposed of to the greatest advantage of the creditors. The witness said that while the committee was then in session the plaintiff was in the adjoining room, and that he went into the said room and told her of the proposition, to which she replied that she was willing to assent to any plan or arrangement as to the disposition of the business and the property that would give her a complete acquittance of responsibility or liability for the debts of the concern.

Other witnesses gave like testimony, and said, as did the defendant, that the plaintiff repeatedly declared that she could not get the money necessary to pay off the debts of the concern.

[2] The above synoptical statement of the testimony as submitted by the defendant is sufficient for the purposes of this decision. While it is controverted in its vital particulars by the plaintiff, the court, having accepted it as a truthful statement of the facts of the controversy, was thereby warranted in concluding as it did conclude, that the defendant took possession of the property under the mortgage and the express written authority and direction of the plaintiff, not with an understanding and agreement that he would hold the said property and conduct the restaurant business as a trustee or receiver for and on behalf of the plaintiff and to redeliver to her said property or any part thereof, but solely for the purpose of protecting his own interests under his mortgage, and, if necessary for that purpose, to sell all said property; that the composition effected with her creditors whereby she was released from all further liability upon their claims and the satisfaction of the defendant's debt against her were the culmination of her own agreement with the defendant, and constituted a full, fair, and adequate consideration for any interest she might have had in the property; that the defendant did not during the period he was in possession of the property receive sufficient profits from the conduct of said business with which to repay himself for all advances made by him to the plaintiff's creditors and for all expenses incurred by him in carrying on said business; that the plaintiff was not ready or able to pay the defendant the amounts paid by him to her creditors and the expenses incurred by him in the conduct of said business during the period mentioned.

The court did not directly find, and indeed it was not essential that it should do so in view of the findings above adverted to, that there was no adverse pressure or coercion used by the defendant to secure the assent of the plaintiff to the arrangement finally crystallized. As above stated, the history of the transaction as detailed by the findings directly negatives the idea of coercion and undue advantage on the part of the defendant in said transaction. Indeed, no such element could enter into the case under the findings. Nor was there the slightest proof of coercion. Counsel, it is true, refer to the fact that the defendant called upon the plaintiff to furnish the money with which to pay the rent which fell due within a few days after he resumed possession of the property, and declare that "clearly this demand regarding the rent was used to force her [plaintiff] into assenting to whatever she did assent." But the trial court attached no such significance to that circumstance, and certainly we can conceive of no reason why this court should.

Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that the findings are sufficiently fortified by the proofs, and cannot, therefore, justly be disturbed, and that the conclusions of law and the judgment are supported by said findings.

The appellant complains of the rulings of the court in allowing the defendant to say, in reply to a question by his attorney, that he "held possession under that agreement and the chattel mortgage until about the 3d of February," and in refusing to strike out the statement of the witness Bracken that "the creditors sold to Mr. Fisher finally." The ground of the objection to said testimony was that it involved conclusions of the witness, the first as to the legal capacity in which the defendant held possession, and the second as to the legal effect of the transaction between the creditors and the defendant.

[3] Strictly speaking, the objections upon the ground stated were well taken. But the testimony so brought into the record was wholly without prejudice. The fact that the defendant was entitled to take possession under his mortgage was shown by unimpeached and unimpeachable documentary evidence. The fact that he was authorized in writing by the plaintiff to take possession under said chattel mortgage was likewise shown. This testimony conclusively established the fact to which the testimony complained of related, and therefore the latter testimony, involving as it did the conclusion of the witness, cannot be held to have added anything to the intrinsic probative force of the competent testimony by which the fact was proved.

The statement that "the creditors sold to Mr. Fisher finally" is in a sense true; they did sell their interests as creditors to Fisher; but, even if the witness thus intended to say that the restaurant was sold by the creditors to Fisher, the statement so made was of little material importance in view of the full explanation made by Fisher of the circumstances of the whole transaction. The fact is, as we have shown, the defendant was himself authorized by the mortgage to sell the property and by the written direction of the plaintiff to "abide by any agreement or plan of operation that the creditors may arrive at for the future conduct of said business looking towards the running of the concern, provided your interests are not prejudiced thereby nor your security impaired." The testimony of the defendant sufficiently shows to warrant the finding, which in effect was made, that the conditions developed in the affairs of the restaurant were such as to make it necessary to sell the restaurant and the property connected therewith to protect the rights of the defendant under his mortgage. The defendant, indeed, was directed and expressly authorized by the plaintiff to dispose of the property and the business in any manner he might choose, provided that in so doing he secured to the plaintiff release from any further liability for the debts of the concern. This arrangement he succeeded in accomplishing. Thus, even if not under his mortgage, he had the right to sell it, and no one will question his right to buy it so long as he acted in good faith toward the plaintiff. As stated, whether he bought from the creditors or from himself as the mortgagee in possession under his mortgage is, under the circumstances and in the last analysis, wholly unimportant.

SHERRIFF v. SHERRIFF. (Civ. 2200.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑252(5)—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

The complaint asking for general relief as to plaintiff's deed to defendant, and asserting facts sufficient to show that under defendant's contention plaintiff's title in his real estate might be clouded, it was proper to adjudge what interest, if any, defendant acquired by the deed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

In so far as findings rest on conflicting oral testimony as to facts, they are conclusive on appeal.

3. DEEDS 🔑93—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT.

Deeds are to be construed like any other contract, and intent of the parties arrived at, if possible, from its terms; all of it being examined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 231, 232.]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑47(4)—DEED—INTEREST CONVEYED—COMMUNITY INTEREST.

A deed from husband to wife, in form one of bargain and sale, except that the recited consideration was love and affection, of "an undivided or community interest" in described lands, does not purport to convey a fee interest to the extent of half of the property described, but conveys a community interest such as the wife would have had the land been acquired after the parties were married.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑47(4)—DEED—RECONVEYANCE.

That husband and wife join in a grant, bargain, and sale deed of land, to carry out negotiations for a loan, and the grantee executes to them a deed in like form, does not enlarge the wife's community interest in the land which she had under deed from the husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by William J. Sherriff against Laura E. Sherriff. From adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Rush and William Freeman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. N. Blackstock and H. Perk, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This case comes here on an appeal taken from a judgment in part adverse to the defendant, and from an order made denying her motion for a new trial. The record contains a history of marital difficulties and differences. The cause of action set forth in the complaint was one in equity, the prayer being for judgment setting aside a deed given by the plaintiff to the defendant, and for general relief. In its recitation of alleged facts the complaint set forth that in May, 1911, plaintiff being a widower about 69 years of age, and being possessed of an apartment house and other real property, engaged the defendant, a woman of about 40 years, as a housekeeper; that a few months thereafter plaintiff and defendant were married; that prior to the marriage the defendant expressed great love and affection for the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff upon entering into an engagement of marriage with her, agreed to make a will in which he would devise to the wife an undivided one-half "or community" interest in all of his property and estate; that this arrangement was satisfactory to the defendant, but that immediately after the marriage defendant ceased to show any affection for the plaintiff, and demanded of him that he execute a deed to her, in lieu of making provision for her in a will, and that she then agreed, "promised and bound herself to aid, assist and help the plaintiff carry on and conduct his business, and to look after and care for his household and superintend the same, and to prepare his meals," etc.; that believing in her promises and assurances, plaintiff executed a deed, which he caused to be placed of record in the recorder's office, transferring to her an interest in certain described property. The form of the deed used was that commonly termed "bargain and sale," except that the consideration recited was that of love and affection. It also contained the following recitation:

> "That the said party of the first part, * * * does by these presents grant, bargain and sell, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to her heirs and assigns forever, all the real property situated in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: An undivided or community interest in all of the following described parcels and tracts of land."

Then follows a description of the particular property and the usual closing clauses of a deed. In the complaint it was further alleged that it was understood between the parties that the deed conveyed only the interest which a wife would have in the community estate after marriage, but that after the deed was executed the defendant claimed a fee-simple title, and on various occasions asserted that she owned such an estate and demanded that the rents and profits of the estate in part be turned over to her for her own personal uses. It was then alleged:

> "That this claim on the part of the defendant has seriously interfered with plaintiff's control of his said property, and in meeting his expenses, and has heretofore and will hereafter, unless the said deed is canceled, prevent the plaintiff from conveying and alienating his said property without the consent of the defendant; that the said deed is a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and is calculated to and does interfere seriously with plaintiff's control of his said property and prevents his free management thereof and its alienation without interference on the part of the defendant."

The trial judge determined by his findings that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment canceling the deed. In his oral opinion, the judge summed up his conclusions epigrammatically as follows:

> "He knew that a man of his age could not marry a woman of her age, unless he had property, and he knew well enough that he had to convince her that he had some property before she would marry him, and it is very plain to the court that she would not have married him—she says she married him for a home—I am satisfied she married him because she thought he was wealthy; I don't think there was any other reason for it; I don't think it is natural for people so different in age to be married; and, as I stated this morning, it has been my observation that, whenever a woman marries a man 30 or 40 years older than she is—it may be an accident—but he always has money; it never occurs in any other way. * * * Of course, she got tired of him; she probably knew before she married him that she would get tired of him—a man as old as he was; and after a while he got tired of her. They both made a bad bargain; there is no question about it. She probably thought she could marry him and see this thing through, but she got tired of it. I think it was nothing more on her part than a speculation, and people, where they made speculations of that sort, they ought to see them through, and take what is coming. If a man lives 2 or 3 years, why they get the best of it; and if he lives a good while longer, why then they don't, but they take these chances, and as far as I can, whenever I can do so, I try, as one of the witnesses stated here to-day, to see that as long as they have made their bed they have to lie in it. As far as he is concerned—73 years old—he wasn't in his dotage; he is a shrewd man, in the habit of taking care of his property, but when he got a chance to marry a woman 30 years younger than himself, he went in and made promises about his property, and when it didn't pan out to his satisfaction, then he comes into court and wants the protection of the court. I don't believe the court is bound to protect men, especially business men, who understand themselves, when they won't protect themselves."

[1, 2] The court made very full findings of fact in which his conclusions were stated at greater length, but to the same intent as set forth in that portion of the oral opinion quoted. The judgment in consequence decreed the deed to be valid, but, particularly construing it, determined that it conveyed a community interest "such as the defendant would have if the property had been acquired during their marriage." We think that the findings and judgment are entirely within the issues made by the pleadings. The complaint asked for general relief and asserted facts sufficient to show that under the contention of the defendant the title of the plaintiff in his real estate might be clouded, and, that being true, it was proper to adjudge what interest, if any, the defendant acquired in the property of the plaintiff by reason of the conveyance. The complaint, it is true, is unusually long; it contains a recitation of much evidentiary matter, but there can be gleaned from it enough to make out a cause of action which is sufficient to support the judgment. In so far as the findings rest upon oral testimony of facts about which there was a conflict of evidence, necessarily we are concluded by the findings of the trial court.

[3, 4] The deed itself, we think further, does not purport to convey a fee interest to the extent of one-half of the property described. While it contains general terms, it also contains terms of limitation when it is recited that the estate conveyed is "an undivided or community interest." Under the modern rule of interpretation at least, deeds are to be construed like any other contract, and the intent of the grantor arrived at, if possible, from the terms set forth in the instrument. As this court said in the case of Firth v. Los Angeles Pacific Land Co., 28 Cal. App. 399, 152 Pac. 935, referring to authorities on this subject:

> "It has often been declared that a deed of conveyance is but a contract, subject to the usual and ordinary rules of construction applicable to such instruments. One of these rules, generally adopted and constantly applied, is that the whole of the instrument shall be examined in order to ascertain the intent of the parties."

In the case cited the instrument of conveyance first purported to make an unreserved transfer in fee simple, and there followed words of condition which were held to limit its operation and effect. We think the construction applied by the court to the deed here under consideration was reasonable and altogether in harmony with the terms of the instrument itself.

[5] It appeared by an amendment to the complaint that plaintiff and defendant at one time after their marriage had joined in making a grant, bargain, and sale deed to an abstract company in order to carry out negotiations for a loan, and that a deed was executed back to the plaintiff and defendant in the same form. It is not apparent how this transaction would have the effect in any wise of enlarging the interest of the defendant in the property as acquired under the first deed made by the plaintiff to her.

We have examined very carefully the extensive record which is submitted with this appeal, and are of the opinion that there is no merit in the questions which are presented in the argument of the appellant.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. HERRERA. (Cr. 523.)

1. Criminal Law ⚷1172(2) — Trial — Instructions—Error.

Though Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3, declares that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others, the modification of an instruction requested by accused, declaring that a witness false in a material part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others, and that, where the jury were satisfied that a witness had so sworn falsely, they must treat all his testimony with distrust and suspicion, whereby it was made optional with the jury to distrust other portions of the testimony of the witness or reject them, is not, as it relates to a commonplace matter, ground for reversal.

2. Criminal Law 🔑777 — Trial — Instructions.

In a homicide case, where accused did not flee from the place of the killing, it will be presumed that the jury considered that fact as one of the commonplace things of which an ordinary man will take cognizance, without special instruction, and so the refusal of a special charge that the failure of accused to flee is a circumstance in his favor is not error.

3. Criminal Law 🔑1174(6) — Trial — Exhibits.

In a homicide case, where the door through which bullets were fired was introduced in evidence, as well as blackboard illustrations, the fact that the jury were allowed to carry such exhibits with them in their deliberations, though they were not included among the things which the jury might, by Pen. Code, § 1137, carry into the jury room, does not warrant reversal; there being no showing that the jury used such articles in their deliberations, or received any improper impressions therefrom.

4. Criminal Law 🔑531(3)—Evidence—Confessions.

Evidence of accused's confession given by a police officer, was admissible, where such officer stated that no inducements were held out or improper influence exerted by himself or any other person to his knowledge, the mere fact that accused may have been in charge of other officers prior to making his statement to the witness not requiring the prosecution to produce all such officers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Hilario Herrera was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of murder, it being alleged in the information of the district attorney that he did, on the 10th day of June, 1916, in the county of Los Angeles, feloniously and with malice, kill one Soledad Juarez. By the verdict of the jury defendant was found guilty of the crime charged, in the second degree thereof, and judgment followed accordingly. The appeal is taken from the judgment of imprisonment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The deceased was the wife of Filomeno Juarez, and at the time she received the fatal wound she resided with her husband in a two-room house in the city of Los Angeles. Juarez, the husband, was a laborer, and was acquainted with the defendant, the two men having theretofore worked as section hands on a railroad near Los Angeles. On the 10th day of June, 1916, Juarez met defendant at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon on the street. Defendant informed Jaurez that he was going to San Pedro to work, and urged Juarez to accompany him. Juarez's reply to the invitation was that he could not decide the matter without consulting with his wife. Juarez returned to his home later in the evening, where he resided with his wife and some small children. According to testimony given by the husband, he and his wife retired to bed in the front room of the house at about 9 o'clock; the screen door at the front being closed and latched and the inner wooden door being closed. Shortly after they had retired there was a knock at the front door, and upon Juarez opening it he found the defendant Herrera there. Juarez testified that Herrera invited him to accompany him to a neighboring wine cellar for a drink, which invitation was declined, and Herrera was also informed that Juarez would not go to San Pedro to work. Thereupon the door was closed by Juarez, who, it may be gathered from his testimony, then returned to his bed. Almost immediately, so Juarez testifies, some shots were fired by Herrera, and the wife, who had gone to the door to hold it shut, received one of the bullets through her body. This wound caused her death, which occurred the following day. The testimony was that three shots were fired through the door. Upon the woman being shot, she cried out and called to a neighbor to send for the police, and a telephone message conveyed to a branch police station the alarm. Two policemen in an automobile hurried to the scene, and one of these officers testified that he found Herrera at the door; that when the officers approached, the defendant dropped a gun and placed his foot upon it; that they arrested the defendant, and upon examining the gun found it to be fully loaded. The wounded woman was taken to a hospital and defendant transported to the jail. Other witnesses who were aroused by the alarm testified that they observed the defendant at the door of the Juarez house immediately after the shots were fired, and that he was trying to get into the room where Juarez and his wife were. It was given in evidence that after his arrest the defendant made a statement to the police officers, admitting the firing of the shots, and giving as a reason that he shot because Juarez would not go with him to San Pedro. The substance of the defendant's testimony was that, while he was at the house of Juarez on the night in question, Juarez quarreled with his wife, and the gun, which had been handed to the defendant, was discharged when Juarez grappled with the defendant, and that the gun went off by accident. Contrary to the assertion made on behalf of appellant that the evidence upon which the conviction was had was meager, and that upon the facts a "close case" was presented, we think there was abundant evidence to warrant the jury in determining the guilt of the defendant. Several alleged errors are relied upon as constituting grounds for reversal.

[1] An instruction was offered on the part of the defendant, declaring that a witness false in a material part of his testimony "is to be" distrusted in others, and that where the jury was satisfied that a witness had so sworn falsely they "must" treat all of his or her testimony with distrust and suspicion. The court modified the instruction to make it read that a witness willfully false in a material part of his or her testimony "may be" distrusted in others, and that the jury "might" treat all of his or her testimony with distrust and suspicion under such circumstances. The particular complaint is that the instruction as offered contained a correct statement of the provisions of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares:

> "3. That a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others."

It was, indeed, held in the case of White v. Disher, 67 Cal. 402, 7 Pac. 826, that it was prejudicial error for a court to instruct the jury that a witness false in one part of his testimony "may be" distrusted in others; it being argued that the Code provision in effect declared that such a witness "must be" distrusted. The law on this question has been subjected to some modification since the writing of that decision. In People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 91 Pac. 507, it is declared that instructions of this class contain "only mere commonplace matters that the jurors would be apt to know about and act upon in the absence of instructions," and that "it is well settled that the giving of instructions of that class will not be held to be a proper ground for reversal." The same was held in People v. Russell, 19 Cal. App. 750, 127 Pac. 829, and in Poor v. W. P. Fuller & Co., 30 Cal. App. 650, 159 Pac. 233, decided June 3, 1916. So it has also been held as to instructions which advise the jury that oral admissions are to be viewed with caution, which point is also raised in another paragraph of appellant's brief. See People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Pac. 904. We conclude, therefore, that as to neither of the matters adverted to was the error such as to prejudice the right of the defendant to a fair and impartial trial.

[2] It is next complained that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the fact that defendant did not flee from the scene of the shooting was, of itself, a circumstance in his favor. In the case of People v. Montgomery, 53 Cal. 577, the court observes that while the flight of a person suspected of having committed a crime might be a circumstance which, if unexplained, would tend to establish his guilt:

> "It by no means follows that his failure to flee, having the opportunity to do so, tends to prove his innocence."

And even though it be conceded that the acts of the defendant after firing the shots were all pertinent to be considered by the jury, including his act in remaining at the door of the house, yet nevertheless those matters, in so far as they are entitled to weight, may be assumed to have been fully considered by the jury, as they belong again to the category of "commonplace things" which the mind of an ordinary man will take cognizance of without being cautioned or instructed so to do. We do not agree with appellant that there was error committed by the giving of the instruction as to the intent which would be presumed as to the result following a voluntary act. The instruction was, in substance, that which has heretofore been given in many cases, and in our view it was pertinent to the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case.

[3] The charge also is made that the jury received evidence out of court which improperly influenced their consideration of the case. It appears that at the trial the door which was identified as being the same door through which the three bullets were fired by the defendant was introduced in evidence and exhibited to the jury. It showed the three bullet holes, and the testimony was that they were the ones produced by the shots fired from the defendant's revolver. A blackboard had been used to illustrate the testimony of witnesses, and upon which was drawn a diagram of the scene of the crime. After the jury had been instructed and was about to retire, a juror requested that the jury be permitted to have the blackboard and door. These two articles were carried into the jury room without any direction on the part of the court, and were left there before the jury entered the room. The exhibits which the jury took with them into the jury room were not included among those things which by section 1137 of the Penal Code the jury is permitted to have during its deliberations. However, we do not think that prejudice can be implied from the fact that these particular exhibits were so left in the possession of the jury in the jury room. No showing was made that there was anything about the particular exhibits which would furnish to the jury any other information than that which they had already obtained from the same articles as exhibited to them during the trial. There is no showing of any examination made by the jurors of the articles during their deliberations or, in brief, any showing that either improper impressions might have been or were received by the jury. Prejudice will not be presumed from the fact that the exhibits were within reach, and that opportunity was afforded for their inspection and examination during the deliberations of the jury. The case, to our minds, in its facts falls within the ruling made in People v. Hower, supra, where complaint was made because a bloody shirt, alleged to contain rents and cuts made by the defendant's knife, with dried and matted blood thereon, was left on the floor of the room where the jury was deliberating. The court there said:

> "There is nothing but the bare 'information and belief' statement of the defendant's attorney to show that any examination of the coat or shirt was made by any juror after the submission of the case, and this, of course, was ineffectual for any purpose. People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 Pac. 1100. The mere fact that they were on the floor of the courtroom, and in sight of the jury, does not compel the conclusion that they were so examined. Moreover, the affidavits on motion for a new trial were such as to support a conclusion that these articles had been fully inspected and examined by the jury at the time they were received in evidence, and we are unable to see how, under the circumstances of this case, the defendant could be held to have been prejudiced, even had it appeared that the jurors, or some of them, had again inspected the garments."

[4] The contention that the alleged incriminating statements made by the defendant to the police officer were improperly received because of a lack of sufficient foundation authorizing the evidence to be introduced seems to be without merit. The officer giving the testimony stated that no inducements were held out or improper influence exerted by himself or any other person to his knowledge, and that the statements were free and voluntary. The mere fact that the defendant may have been in charge of other officers and in jail prior to the making of the statement which is viewed as a confession did not make it incumbent upon the prosecution to produce all of those officers and to prove that they in their respective turn had not, by improper influence, persuaded defendant to declare himself in the manner he did to the officer who gave evidence as to the statements.

An examination of the entire record in this case impresses us with the conviction that defendant was given a fair trial. No sufficient reason has been furnished why the judgment or order should be disturbed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Joseph Scarpa was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, Charles Davison and H. L. Partridge, both of San José, and William F. Herron, of San Francisco (Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon a charge of having violated the provisions of section 269b of the Penal Code, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The foregoing section of the Penal Code, as amended in 1911, reads as follows:

> "If two persons, each being married to another live together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, each is guilty of a felony, and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years."

The amendment of this section made in 1911 consisted in striking from the former section the words "open and notorious" before the phrase "cohabitation and adultery." The contention of the defendant herein is that the evidence adduced at the trial was wholly insufficient to establish the charge that the defendant and the woman in question "lived together in a state of cohabitation and adultery." This contention is based upon the fact proven at the trial that during the several months that the defendant and a woman, Mrs. Mae Beach, were asserted by the prosecution to have maintained illicit relations with each other, the defendant was living and cohabiting with his wife, and the woman, Mrs. Beach, was living and cohabiting with her husband; and it is argued on behalf of the appellant that under such circumstances it was impossible that the defendant and Mrs. Beach could also have been living in a state of cohabitation and adultery. The effect of the argument urged in support of this contention would be that if a husband and wife were living and cohabiting together in their legitimate relation as such, it would be practically impossible for either of them to commit a violation of section 269b of the Penal Code by engaging in or maintaining a course of illicit relationship and intercourse with another person of opposite sex who was also living and cohabiting with his or her legitimate spouse. We are not prepared to commit ourselves to such a narrow construction of the section of the Penal Code in question, nor to give our indorsement to the cases cited by counsel for the appellant which would give color to such a contention.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that section 269b of the Penal Code, as amended in 1911, was intended by the Legislature working its amendment through the elimination from the former section of the words "open and notorious," to have application to those persons who, while each was simulating continence in their marital relations, were at the same time maintaining such a course of illicit and adulterous conduct with another of the opposite sex as would constitute a counterfeit of the marriage relation. We think that such a state of cohabitation and adultery would not only be possible, but that the evidence in the case before us was amply sufficient to have justified the jury in finding that such a condition existed between the defendant and the woman in the case. A brief review of the evidence will make this sufficiently plain.

The defendant, Joseph Scarpa, had been married to his wife, Mrs. Scarpa, for a period of about 25 years. They had three children—two daughters and a son, all grown and living away from home, the girls being married, and living, one at Pleasanton, and the other in San Francisco. Early in the month of September, 1915, Mrs. Scarpa, who prior to that time had been residing with her husband part of the time at their home in Mountain View, and part of the time on their ranch in San Mateo county, went on a visit to her daughters, spending nearly all of the next three months with one or the other of them, and returning to her home in Mountain View on but two occasions, and then only for a day or two. The defendant, Joseph Scarpa, who was engaged in the business of buying and selling cattle, spent much of his time at his ranch in San Mateo county. In the month of August, 1915, he met his codefendant, Mrs. Mae Beach, upon a neighboring ranch where the husband was at that time employed, and presently took the latter into his employ at his ranch, whither Beach's wife went to live with him. The intimacy between the defendant and Mrs. Beach dates from about this time. They were often seen riding or driving together, and on several occasions were observed in attitudes and actions which were strongly suggestive of an undue and illicit intimacy. On a number of occasions during several months which intervened between the defendant's first acquaintance with the woman and the final exposure of their adulterous relation, the defendant brought the woman to his home in Mountain View during his wife's absence, and there remained with her overnight. On one of these occasions the woman in the morning came down into the butcher shop and bought the meat for breakfast, having it charged to Scarpa. During the course of these apparently continuous and increasingly intimate relations the defendant boasted to a friend that he "had a chicken up at his ranch," which he sufficiently described to identify the Beach woman, and whom he warned his friend not to interfere with. Finally on December 21, 1915, the defendant and Mrs. Beach came to San José, and after visiting several stores and eating places and walking arm in arm down the street, went to the Imperial Hotel in that city, where defendant registered himself and his companion as "J. Jones and wife, Mountain View," and secured a single room which the pair occupied together until the early morning hours of December 23, 1915, when their apartment was entered by detectives, who found them there in a state of undress and apparently occupying the same bed. The arrest of the pair upon the charge of adultery followed.

Upon the trial of the cause no evidence was presented on behalf of the defendant to offset in any way the inferences to be drawn from the foregoing line of testimony; and we think that from its occasional glimpses of the defendant in his relation and conduct towards his codefendant during the months intervening between August and December, taken in connection with the culminating act of his taking her into a hotel, registering there as man and wife, and occupying the same apartment for a portion of three days in an indisputably adulterous state and relation, the jury were amply justified in drawing the conclusion that the relation of the parties during these several months was not that of mere casual and disconnected acts of adultery, but that during the larger part of that time at least such a continuous course of illicit conduct had existed as would amount to their living together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, and as thus sufficing to satisfy the terms of the Penal Code rendering such conduct criminal.

This being so, it follows that the verdict of the jury finds sufficient support in the evidence; and this being the only point made upon appeal, the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. SCARPA. (Cr. 2068.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Joseph Scarpa was convicted of an offense, and appealed. The judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, and he sought hearing in the Supreme Court. Hearing denied.

PER CURIAM. Hearing in Supreme Court denied.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a hearing in this court after decision of the District Court of Appeal, for the reason that however discreditably the evidence, as stated in the opinion, reflects upon the defendant, from the standpoint of morals, I do not think it makes a case within the purview of section 269b of the Penal Code, under any fair construction of the provisions of that section. To constitute the felony there defined there must be, according to the express terms, a living together in a state of cohabitation, which means, as was well said in People v. Breeding, 19 Cal. App. 362, 126 Pac. 181, "the living or dwelling together as husband and wife; * * * in other words, a counterfeit of the marriage relation." I think we all agree that there is nothing in the evidence to show any such situation unless it is to be found in the evidence as to the conduct of the parties in the city of San José between the evening of December 21, 1915, and the "early morning hours" of December 23, 1915. To hold that this transitory visit of these parties to the San José hotel, obviously made solely for the consummation of their immoral purposes, constitutes the living together intended by the statute appears to me to be unwarranted by any fair reading of the law.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by E. D. Hedges against George K. Frink. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick and Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, all of San Francisco, for appellant. McClanahan & Derby and H. W. Glensor, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appellant was indebted to the American-Hawaiian Mahogany Lumber Company, a corporation, in which he was a stockholder. His indebtedness was evidenced by his promissory note. The corporation became financially involved to such an extent that it was insolvent. It owed one C. Bolte about $8,000, for money advanced by him. It owed other smaller indebtednesses. It had entered into contracts which it could not fulfill, and under one of these it apprehended a serious liability for damages. A special meeting of the stockholders was held under these circumstances, and the principal creditor, Mr. Bolte, offered to take over the assets of the company in satisfaction of its indebtedness to him, and to assume all the liabilities of the company and to guarantee protection to the individual stockholders against their stockholder's liability. A modification of this offer was tendered by the stockholders and accepted by Mr. Bolte. Under this modified agreement, all of the assets of the corporation were to be made over to Mr. Bolte and retained by him under his guaranty, saving two notes and their proceeds; one of these being the note of the defendant here in suit. Touching these notes and their proceeds, it was agreed that Bolte should transfer them to respondent, as trustee for all the shareholders of the company, excepting himself. The proceeds of the notes when collected were to be distributed ratably amongst all the stockholders saving himself. The appellant as a stockholder executed this agreement, and two-thirds of the stockholders joined therein. The note was indorsed by Bolte to the respondent after maturity, and respondent's title to the note and his right to proceed in this action, which is for the collection of it, is based wholly upon the agreement above set forth between Bolte and the stockholders of the corporation.

The defense to the action was that this agreement between Bolte and the stockholders was void, in consequence of which this respondent acquired no title to the note. The court found and concluded that the trust agreement was violative of section 309 of the Civil Code, but that appellant, maker of the note, who as a stockholder had entered into the agreement, was estopped to deny its validity. It therefore gave judgment accordingly, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

[1] The language of our law and of our decisions permits of no doubt but that this attempted method of distributing a portion of the capital stock of the corporation was illegal and void. Section 309 of the Civil Code forbids it. Section 560 of the Penal Code condemns it as criminal. Such an act of distribution is not permitted, whether attempted by the directors, the stockholders, or both. Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 385, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520; Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 Pac. 735; Tapscott v. Mexican, Colorado, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 667, 96 Pac. 271; Burne v. Lee, 156 Cal. 228, 104 Pac. 438.

[2, 3] The conclusion is therefore not to be avoided that, in so far as this trust agreement contemplated the division by the respondent of the proceeds of these notes, the agreement itself was illegal and void, as the court found. But does this conclusion vitiate the whole contract and thus destroy plaintiff's right of action? We think not, and our conclusion is based upon the fact that the agreement between Bolte and the stockholders contains two severable and distinct objects. It is both familiar and declared law (Civ. Code, § 1599) that where a contract has several distinct objects, of which one at least is lawful and one at least is unlawful, the contract is void as to the latter and valid as to the rest. Here the essence of the agreement between the parties was that Bolte would take not all, but only a part, of the assets of the corporation for the considerations which in turn he would give. The assets which were to remain in the corporation were these promissory notes. But instead of permitting the legal title to remain in the corporation, the devious method of collection through a trustee was agreed upon, and only after collection was the duty imposed upon this trustee of a ratable distribution of the assets. It would seem to be quite plain herefrom that this respondent was vested with title authorizing him to reduce this chose in action to judgment and to collect that judgment. Up to that point the agreement violated no law. The forbidden step was the next separable one which he was called upon to take—the ratable distribution of the fruits of his judgment. An effort upon the part of this trustee to execute this void and illegal trust could, at the instance of any party in interest, be stopped. But there is nothing, as we construe this contract, which prevents the trustee from collecting the amount due upon the promissory note, which amount becomes an asset of the corporation for disposition under the law. Wherefore it would become the trustee's duty upon collection to pay the moneys over to the corporation, or, if this were impracticable, to seek the aid of a court of equity for its final disposition.

[4] Appellant's position is sound that he is not estopped, by virtue of his written assent to this illegal contract, from urging its invalidity here. No ratification or attempted ratification can validate such a contract as this, denounced by both our civil and our criminal law, nor silence an objector to its enforcement, even though he may originally have assented thereto. Visalia, etc., Co. v. Sims, 104 Cal. 326, 37 Pac. 1042, 43 Am. St. Rep. 105; Colby v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 160 Cal. 632, 117 Pac. 913, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 515; Pomeroy Eq. Jur., sec. 805.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

HUGHES v. WARMAN STEEL CASTING CO. (L. A. 3853.)

1. NEGLIGENCE ⟹108(1)—PLEADING—MATTERS OF FACT.

It is well settled that negligence may be charged in general terms, and an allegation that what was done by defendant was done negligently, and that such negligence caused or contributed to plaintiff's injury, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 180.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹258(18)—SERVANT'S INJURY — COMPLAINT — DANGEROUS METHOD OF WORK.

A complaint charging that method of trimming nails from castings with a chisel and sledge "was dangerous," and that employer was negligent in adopting such method, as a result of which plaintiff was injured, describing the manner of the injury was sufficient, and was not bad for alleging conclusions of law.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹1061(3)—QUESTION PRESENTED—MOTION FOR NONSUIT.

Where there is evidence to sustain a verdict, it is immaterial as to the court's ruling on a motion for nonsuit.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟹278(4)—SERVANT'S INJURY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DANGEROUS METHOD OF WORK.

Evidence that employer directed employé to trim nails from castings with a chisel and sledge, which caused nails to fly in every direction, causing employé's injury, held to justify jury's finding of employer's negligence, although this method of work was used in other foundries, but another simple and safe method existed.

5. Master and Servant ⇨105(1)—Duty to Furnish Safe Appliances.

While employer need not furnish employé with latest, safest, and best appliances, he must furnish such as are reasonably safe, and it is not sufficient to merely use the same method used elsewhere, when to a reasonable man it is evident that such method is dangerous, and that by exercise of ordinary care a safer method may be adopted.

6. Master and Servant ⇨270(11)—Duty to Furnish Safe Appliances—Question for Jury.

In determining whether an employer has exercised reasonable and ordinary care in adopting a method of work, the jury may consider methods adopted elsewhere, although this is not controlling, and the particular circumstances of the case.

7. Master and Servant ⇨262(4) — Servant's Injury—Necessity of Pleading Contributory Negligence.

Contributory negligence of an employé alleged to have caused his injury is an affirmative defense, and must be specially pleaded.

8. Master and Servant ⇨262(4)—Servant's Injury—Contributory Negligence.

Where employer denied all negligence, and pleaded that employé's injury was caused by latter's negligence, although called a special defense, was an affirmative charge available under the general issue without special plea, and was not a plea of contributory negligence, and evidence regarding it could be considered with all other evidence.

9. Master and Servant ⇨289(28)—Servant's Injury—Question for Jury—Cause of Injury.

Where evidence was conflicting as to whether employé stood directly in front of his work while trimming nails from castings, and as to direction in which nails flew when cut, question of employer's liability for employé's injury was for the jury, and did not sustain employer's contention that injury was caused solely by employé's negligence.

10. Evidence ⇨194—Servant's Injury—Demonstrative Evidence—Safe Appliances.

Where an employé claimed employer's negligence in not furnishing safe appliances for trimming nails from castings, clippers, and shears which might have been safely used for the work were properly admitted in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 679.]

11. Evidence ⇨508—Expert Testimony—"Science, Art or Trade."

The question of whether it was "possible" for an employé to be struck by a cut nail while standing at side of casting which he was trimming, was not a question of "science, art or trade" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9, allowing expert opinion in such cases, and exclusion of such evidence was proper where witnesses were allowed to state the effect of trimming nails and the direction they would fly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2311.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Science.]

12. Master and Servant ⇨293(7)—Servant's Injury—Instructions—Duty to Furnish Safe Appliances.

Instruction regarding employer's duty to furnish reasonably safe appliances for employé's work, held proper in view of the evidence.

13. Master and Servant ⇨356—Employers' Liability Act—Assumption of Risk.

Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 796) § 1, eliminating defense of assumption of risk, provides a rule of substantive law governing all employers and employés, whether both have elected to come under the act or not, and instruction to this effect was proper.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by J. Walter Hughes against the Warman Steel Casting Company. Defendant appeals from judgment for plaintiff, and from order denying new trial. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff, who had a verdict and judgment for $3,000. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Several grounds are urged by defendant for a reversal:

1. It is insisted first that the court erred in overruling its demurrer to the complaint which was made both general and special.

The complaint alleged that defendant conducted a foundry at Redondo Beach, Cal., and manufactured, among other things, steel castings, and the plaintiff was employed therein as a laborer; that a part of his duties consisted for a couple of hours a day in swinging a sledge or hammer to trim nails from steel castings in which, when moulded, the heads of nails were embedded, leaving the points and remaining parts of the nails projecting outward from the castings; that to trim such nails it was customary at the plant of defendant for one man to hold the point of a cold-chisel against the nails to be cut while another struck the chisel with a sledge or hammer, cutting the nail and causing it to fly from the casting; that said method of trimming nails from castings was a dangerous method, well known to be such by defendant, but which method defendant ordered plaintiff to use without taking any means or steps to protect said plaintiff from harm and injury; that the use of a heavy sledge, instead of a lighter hammer, in such trimming, is dangerous and causes the nails to fly from said casting with greater velocity than when a lighter hammer is used; that defendant, with full knowledge of these facts, directed and caused plaintiff to use a sledge in performing such labor; that defendant knew that the occupation of defendant was unsafe and dangerous to him, but with full knowledge of this fact permitted and caused plaintiff to continue said work without using any means or protection to lessen said danger; that plaintiff was an ordinary, and not a skilled, laborer, and did not appreciate the real danger connected with his employment; that on April 9, 1913, when plaintiff was regularly engaged in the performance of his duties in trimming nails from said castings and in swinging a sledge hammer for that purpose in accordance with the order of defendant, and was using due care, one of the nails cut from said casting flew with great velocity therefrom, embedding itself in the left eye of plaintiff, whereby the sight thereof was destroyed, necessitating the removal of said eye; that said injury was caused solely by the failure of defendant to provide a safe, sufficient, and suitable place for plaintiff to work in, and a failure of defendant to furnish plaintiff with safe and suitable tools with which to labor.

Error of the court in overruling the demurrer of defendant is based on its contention that while the complaint charges that defendant was negligent in providing a safe, sufficient, and suitable place for plaintiff to work, and was further negligent in providing plaintiff with safe and suitable tools with which to labor, there are no averments of facts showing in what particular the defendant was negligent in either respect; that the allegation that the method adopted by defendant for trimming nails from castings which plaintiff was ordered to follow was dangerous, is a conclusion of law and not an averment of any fact from which the court can determine whether the method of defendant was dangerous or not.

[1] It is well settled in this state that negligence may be charged in general terms. It is sufficient to allege that what plaintiff claims was done by defendant was done negligently by him, and that it appears from the allegations of the complaint that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury of plaintiff. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 96, 27 Pac. 29; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308; Champagne v. A. Hamberger & Sons, 169 Cal. 683, 147 Pac. 954.

[2] While the complaint in this case charged negligence on the part of defendant in furnishing plaintiff with a safe and suitable place to work, it is likewise charged that the injury he received was due to the negligence of the defendant in failing to furnish him with safe and suitable tools and appliances with which to perform the labor assigned him, and it is apparent that the particular negligence to which the allegations of the complaint were directed was of the latter character; that the negligence of the defendant consisted in requiring and directing plaintiff to use a dangerous and unsuitable method in trimming nails from castings. As to this, it will be observed from an examination of the matters in the complaint as we have epitomized them above that the method of trimming nails is described; it is alleged that this method is dangerous and describes in what respect it is dangerous; alleges that defendant in adopting the method was negligent, and that as a result of such negligence plaintiff was injured and describes the manner in which the injury occurred. None of these were conclusions of law, but were allegations of facts upon which negligence on the part of defendant is charged. The demurrer was properly overruled.

Its demurrer having been overruled, defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and as special defenses set up: First, that any injury sustained by plaintiff was the proximate result of his own negligence and carelessness, particularly, in standing in front of the casting which he was trimming instead of standing at the side, where, defendant alleged, he was ordered to stand; and, second, that the plaintiff entered upon the work of cutting said nails with knowledge of the dangers, and hence assumed the risk incident to such work.

[3] 2. As to the alleged errors committed during the trial of the cause: The court denied a motion of defendant for a nonsuit made at the close of the evidence of plaintiff. We do not think it necessary to give this point any particular consideration. If there was evidence presented on the trial of the whole case to sustain the verdict rendered, it is immaterial as to the ruling of the court on the motion for nonsuit, and whether there was such evidence is one of the points made on this appeal next to be considered.

[4] 3. Now, as to the claim that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict: As has been stated, the negligence complained of was in putting plaintiff to work cutting these nails from the castings without taking any measures or steps to protect him from harm and injury while doing so, and further in not providing plaintiff with safe and suitable tools with which to work. The evidence shows that plaintiff and his companion were placed at such work by the manager of defendant, and directed to use a sledge eight or ten pounds in weight to strike the cold-chisel against the nails, principally 6 and 8 penny nails, in some instances 20-penny spikes, with instructions to hit hard, but to avoid shooting the nails in the direction of a window (broken), as they might hit the moulders working there. When placed at work plaintiff was told to stand at the side of the casting, and he would not be injured. In working under this method the severed nails would fly in all directions—sometimes 20 feet—"just go wild," as one witness described it, striking the windows and doors and walls of the working room. It was in evidence that if instead of being required to use a heavy sledge the plaintiff had been furnished with a lighter hammer, the method would not have been so dangerous as the nails would not fly with such force; that a net or shield or sacking placed against the direction the nail would fly would have removed the danger by retarding its flight, and that aside from this, certain cutting appliances—cutters and shears which were exhibited to the jury and introduced in evidence—could be readily obtained at small expense with which all these nails could be readily pinched or cut off flush with the casting, in effect, producing as clean and finished a job as that accomplished by the use of the sledge and cold-chisel and without any danger from the work. It was at the commencing of his work on a particular casting on April 9, 1912, that plaintiff was hurt. The casting was on the ground, leaning up against an anvil, and it was immediately after the first nail was struck off from the casting by plaintiff in pursuing the method directed with a sledge and cold-chisel that he felt the sting in his eye and pulled the nail out of it. The result was the permanent loss of the left eye and the impairment of the vision of the other to an extent, as testified by plaintiff, that he is just able to get about. It does not appear exactly how the nail came to hit the plaintiff. It may have flown directly from the casting or rebounded from the anvil which was near it, or from some other object in the room. There was testimony introduced by defendant contradictory of the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses as to essential issues in the case, it being testified to by the witnesses for defendant that the method used by it—the sledge and cold-chisel—in cutting the nails from the castings was that adopted for similar work in foundries on this coast and in some of the Eastern States where the witnesses had worked.

[5] The contention of the defendant that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence is really based on the theory that when it is shown that a method adopted in doing a certain kind of work is that usually employed elsewhere in doing it that the employer is excused from adopting any other or different method. This is not the rule. It is, of course, true that the employer is not bound to supply his employé with the latest, safest, and best tools or appliances that can be secured. What he is required to do is to furnish such tools and appliances as are reasonably safe in pursuing the method of work he assigns his employés to perform. But it is not a sufficient answer in an action for negligence for the employer to say that he uses the same method or ways used by employers elsewhere when as a reasonable man it is evident not only that the method so used is dangerous, but that by the exercise of ordinary care safer tools may be used in doing the work and a safer method adopted.

[6] The question always is, Did the employer exercise ordinary and reasonable care in adopting the method he set his employé to pursue in doing his work? In determining this the jury may take into consideration methods adopted elsewhere, but they are not controlling in the matter of reasonable care; that is to be determined from all the circumstances of the employment—the tools or appliances used, the method pursued, the attendant risks; whether there are other tools and appliances in general use which are adapted to perform the work with a lesser or entire removal of danger. Having all these matters before it, it is for the jury to say whether the employer exercised ordinary care or not in pursuing the method whereby the employé was injured. In this case the jury has held that such reasonable care was not exercised, and, adopting as true, as it undoubtedly did, the testimony presented on behalf of the plaintiff, it cannot be said that their conclusion was not justified.

[7-9] 4. It is contended by defendant under its special defense interposed in that regard that the evidence shows that the injury to plaintiff was entirely caused by his own negligence. This, of course, is not a plea of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. Such a defense is an affirmative one and must be pleaded. No attempt to plead it appears in this case. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714. Defendant having in its answer denied all negligence on its part, this plea, though denominated a special defense, is simply an affirmative charge of negligence on the part of plaintiff which was available under the general issue without special plea, and the evidence respecting it would have to be considered with all the other evidence in the case in determining whether it justified a verdict for the plaintiff, which the jury, of course, did. This might dispose of this point made by defendant, but as its position under it will not involve much time to consider, we will take it up. In support of the special defense defendant insists that the evidence clearly showed that plaintiff's injury was proximately caused by his own negligence, and that he must have been standing and working, not on the side of the casting where he had been instructed by defendant to stand, but in front of the casting where it is always dangerous; that the evidence shows that the nails always fly straight out from the position in which the cold-chisel is held, and therefore plaintiff must have been standing directly in front of the casting and in a position of danger from the flying nails. But the evidence shows no such clear or unquestioned condition as defendant claims. There was testimony, it is true, introduced on the part of defendant that plaintiff was working standing in front of the casting at the time of his injury, but there was also testimony that plaintiff was not doing so, but was standing at the side of the casting and working there as he had been directed to do, and that instead of its being true that the nails flew straight out from the casting they flew in all directions. The jury, doubtless, as they had a right to do, accepted this testimony on the part of plaintiff.

[10] 5. As to certain alleged errors of law committed by the court in the admission or rejection of testimony: It was not error for the court to admit in evidence certain appliances offered by plaintiff. These consisted of a pair of shears and a pair of clippers. The claim of negligence by plaintiff against defendant was that defendant failed to supply him with proper appliances and suitable tools to do the work assigned him. The offer of the shears and clippers was in connection with testimony showing that these tools could be readily obtained which would be suitable and less dangerous in doing the work.

[11] Exception was taken to the ruling of the court sustaining objections to inquiries made of expert witnesses called by defendant as to whether it is "possible" or whether it is a "physical impossibility" for a nail flying from a casting to hit a man standing at the side of it. It is insisted by defendant that such testimony was admissible as on a question of "science, art or trade" and provided for by subdivision 9 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We perceive no error in the ruling. All these witnesses were permitted to testify as to what was the effect of cutting nails as plaintiff was engaged in doing, in what direction they would fly, and whether from the observation of the witnesses or their experience they would fly in any other than a particular direction. It was not matter of expert evidence, however, whether it was "possible" or not for plaintiff to be struck by a cut nail while working at the side of a casting. That was not a question of "science, art or trade." It was one of the essential facts to be determined by the jury and to be determined not from the opinion of experts as to whether it was "possible" or not, but whether, in the judgment of the jury from all the evidence given in connection with the work, including the direction which the testimony showed the nails would or would not fly, the plaintiff could have received the injury, as he claimed he did, while standing on the side of the casting.

[12] 6. It is next insisted that the court erred in certain instructions to the jury. It is claimed that the effect of one of the instructions was to tell the jury that if defendant failed to furnish plaintiff reasonably suitable and safe appliances to do the work he was ordered to do, or with instruments in themselves unsafe either because other appliances to render them safe were not furnished with the tools, plaintiff was entitled to recover. But this does not fully state the instructions. They were more explicit. The court told the jury that it was the duty of the employer to furnish the employé suitable and reasonable tools to do the particular work he is engaged in, and that the servant has a right to rely on this duty being discharged by the employer; that the use of like tools in other establishments is a circumstance to be taken into consideration by them in determining the care which the employer used in that regard, but that it was not, however, the sole test; that the real test was whether they were such as a reasonable prudent and careful man under like circumstances and having a proper regard for the safety of his employé would have furnished. Further, that if the jury found that defendant had exercised such care as men of ordinary prudence and intelligence ordinarily exercised under like circumstances and conditions in view of the character of the work to be done, that defendant had done all that was required of him, and plaintiff could not recover. If, however, they found that defendant failed to furnish suitable reasonably safe tools for the work plaintiff was put at, or ordered plaintiff to do it with instruments unsafe for the work either in themselves or because some other appliances or contrivances to render them safe were not furnished with them, and if, in so doing, defendant failed to use reasonable care for the protection of plaintiff and on account of such failure plaintiff was injured, plaintiff was entitled to recover. We perceive nothing wrong with these instructions. In fact, the complaint of defendant is not so much directed to an attack on the legal principles involved in the instructions as to a claim that there was no evidence in the case of negligence on the part of defendant to which they were applicable. But as we have heretofore discussed the sufficiency of the evidence and found it sufficient, nothing more need be said as to this point on the instructions.

[13] As to a further instruction complained of respecting assumption of risk—a defense interposed by defendant: When the injury to plaintiff occurred on April 9, 1913, the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796) was in force. Section 1 of that act provided (stating only its terms pertinent here) that in any action for personal injury sustained by an employé in the course of his employment in which recovery is sought on the ground of want of ordinary or reasonable care on the part of the employer, it shall be no defense that the employé either expressly or impliedly assumed the risk of the hazard complained of. The court in harmony with these provisions of the act instructed the jury that under said Employers' Liability Act, the defense of assumption of risk or hazards of the work did not apply; that it was no bar to recovery on account of injury caused by the use of unsafe tools or appliances that plaintiff merely with knowledge of their lack of safety accepted or continued the employment. The provisions of the Employers' Liability Act warranted this instruction by the court. This section 1 as to all defenses which are mentioned therein, including the defense of assumption of risk, declared rules of substantive law which applied in all actions brought by employés against employers. It is claimed by defendant that the act has no application between employers and employés, unless where both parties had elected to come under its provisions. There is nothing in this point. The act, as far as the defense of assumption of risk (the only one we are now considering) is concerned, applies to all employers and employés and in all actions where the negligence of the employer is the basis of the suit by the employé. As we have said section 1 lays down rules of substantive law governing all actions by employés against employers for injuries resulting from the negligence of the employer. It is only as to other matters that the election of the parties to come within its terms have relation.

While other points are made by the defendant, we think it is unnecessary particularly to refer to them. We have examined them, but do not perceive that any of them have merit sufficient to require discussion.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SMITH v. JONES et al. (L. A. 3816.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑135—VACATION OF DEFAULT—RIGHT TO RELIEF.

Although record shows that defendant was personally served with process and defaulted, the judgment may be set aside by motion either under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, or independently of statute for lack of due process of law, if timely made; but if not made within reasonable time the party is remitted to his equitable action to declare judgment void.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑143(3)—VACATION OF DEFAULT—"MISTAKE, INADVERTENCE, SURPRISE OR EXCUSABLE NEGLECT."

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, allowing vacation of default judgment when taken against a party through "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect," does not include defendant's failure to appear when not served with process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 272.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mistake.]

3. JUDGMENT 🔑153(2)—VACATION OF DEFAULT—REASONABLE TIME.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, allowing one year to vacate default judgment for nonservice of process in certain cases, any motion to vacate judgment, whether under that section or not, must be made within that time; the statutory requirement being used to define the maximum "reasonable time."

4. JUDGMENT 🔑177—ORDER VACATING DEFAULT—OBJECTIONS.

Where judgment roll showed by affidavit that defendant was personally served, which was denied by defendant's affidavit filed with motion to vacate, and where plaintiff appeared at hearing of motion and prepared bill of exceptions to Court's order vacating judgment, it cannot be said that the fact of nonservice was uncontradicted, or that plaintiff did not object to the motion, and hence that order vacating judgment was proper, although motion was not made within a reasonable time, as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Suit by J. H. Smith against Frank F. Fisher and others. Default judgment for plaintiff, and upon motion of defendant named, judgment set aside, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. S. McKelvey, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Conner, Heath & Maxwell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet his alleged title to a tract of land in Los Angeles county, and, among a large number of other defendants, was the respondent Frank F. Fisher. Summons was issued in the action running to said Fisher among the rest, and one George S. King subsequently filed an affidavit that he had personally served said Frank F. Fisher with a copy of the summons and complaint in the action in Los Angeles county on April 9, 1912. The default of said Fisher was thereafter taken, and on May 11, 1912, a judgment was entered against him in favor of the plaintiff quieting the title of the latter to the land described in the complaint. On September 5, 1913, said Fisher, through his attorneys and upon notice given to plaintiff, moved the trial court in which said judgment had been entered to set aside the default and vacate the judgment on the ground that said Fisher had never been served in said action. In support of the motion an affidavit of Fisher made in the state of Illinois was filed. In this he swore, among other things, that he had not been served with summons in said action at any time, or at all, in Los Angeles, or elsewhere; that he was not in the county of Los Angeles, or in the state of California during the year 1912, and that he had no knowledge of the pendency of the action until about a year after the rendition of the judgment against him. The motion was heard on this affidavit and the judgment roll in the case, nothing further being presented, and the court thereafter made an order setting aside the default and the judgment. Plaintiff appeals.

The only question on this appeal is as to the power of the trial court to make the order involved here. Appellant insists that it had no such power on account of the lapse of time intervening between the entry of the judgment and the motion to set it aside. It will be observed that the motion was made more than a year after the entry of the judgment. It is not contended, as of course it could not be, that the judgment entered in this action against defendant was valid upon its face. What is claimed is that though so appearing on its face it was in fact void because the affidavit of service by King was false; that no summons had ever been served upon respondent, and hence the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce judgment against him.

[1] Undoubtedly, though it appear from the record of a judgment entered upon a default that service was made upon a defendant, and hence a judgment against him is valid upon its face, it is well settled that such a judgment may be set aside on motion either under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure on any of the grounds therein specified, or independent of that section where, as here, the motion is made upon the ground that its entry was based solely on a false return of personal service upon the defendant. But in order to invoke the power of the court to set a judgment aside on the ground that it was entered against a party defendant without service of process on him at all, the motion must be made within a reasonable time, or the right to make it is lost, and the party is remitted to an action in equity to have the judgment declared void.

[2] While in this discussion we have referred to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we have, however, only done so as bearing on the further consideration of the question whether the motion of defendant was made within a reasonable time, because this application to set aside the judgment is not made under said section 473. That section provides for relief upon motion when the judgment is taken against a party through "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect." Not having been served with process, and hence having no knowledge that he was required to appear, the failure of respondent to do so cannot be said to arise from any mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or neglect on his part. If respondent, as defendant in the action, had not been served with summons, he had an absolute right on motion, if timely made, to have the judgment set aside independent of section 473, or any other statute, as violative of the fundamental principle that one may not be deprived of his property without due process of law. The only condition to his right to invoke this aid of the court by a motion in the action itself is that his motion be made within a reasonable time.

[3] Was the motion here made within that time? Under the plain rule of the authorities in this state, it was not. As we have stated, the motion was not made until more than a year after the entry of the judgment. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, heretofore referred to, provides that motions made under its provisions to set aside a judgment shall be made within six months after it is taken, save when the motion is on the ground that from any cause the defendant has not been personally served with summons, when one year is allowed within which to make it. Whether the latter provision would apply in a case like this (Baker v. Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 Pac. 232; Young v. Fink, 119 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 1060) is not material here because this motion was not made within a year after the rendition of the judgment. Now while, as we have said, this motion is not made under said section 473, it has, nevertheless, been the long-settled rule in this state that in determining whether a motion to set aside a judgment, decree, or order made independent of said section is presented within a reasonable time, the period fixed in said section within which motions under it may be made is the standard or criterion in all cases. And so as to motions such as the one here made, based on the ground that no service of process was made on the defendant, it is expressly held that in no case can the time of making them be extended beyond the time limit specified in section 473 for making similar motions under that section. Estate of Eikerenkotter, 126 Cal. 54, 58 Pac. 370; Norton v. A. T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; People v. Dodge, 104 Cal. 487, 38 Pac. 203; Young v. Fink, supra; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301. Hence as this motion was made more than a year after the entry of judgment it was under these authorities made too late

[4] It is contended, however, by respondent that if by analogy the limitation of time specified in said section 473 be applied, yet the order made here may be sustained on another principle of law which he invokes. This is that when on a motion of this character an affidavit is filed showing that no service at all was made on a moving defendant, and no evidence is produced countervailing this showing, and no objection or exception is taken to the introduction of such testimony, the fact is then established without controversy and a simple question of law is thus presented, and such condition of undisputed facts establishes a judgment just as void as if its invalidity appears on the face of the judgment, and like such a judgment may be set aside at any time when the uncontroverted fact of the failure to serve process shows that the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment, citing Hill v. City Cab, etc., Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 Pac.

Under the views expressed, the motion of respondent to set aside the judgment was made too late, and for that reason the court had no power to make the order. Under such circumstances the respondent is required to seek whatever relief he is entitled to through an independent action in equity to set aside the judgment for want of jurisdiction in the court to pronounce it. Brackett v. Banegas, 116 Cal. 278, 48 Pac. 90, 58 Am. St. Rep. 164; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 Pac. 1007.

The order appealed from is reversed.

SMITH v. BRATMAN et al. (L. A. 3818.)

1. Judgment ⟹153(2)—Vacation of Default—"Reasonable Time."

A default judgment not void upon its face may be set aside on motion for lack of personal service if timely made, and a "reasonable time" is that allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for such motions in other cases, regardless of whether the motion is made under that statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 300.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Time.]

2. Judgment ⟹173—Vacation of Default—Terms.

The fact that in vacating a default judgment no terms were imposed as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, did not invalidate the order, since the motion was not made under statute, but on the ground that defendant was being deprived of property without due process of law.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Suit by J. H. Smith against Frank F. Fisher and others. Default judgment for plaintiff, and upon motion of defendant named judgment set aside, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. S. McKelvey, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Conner, Heath & Maxwell, Dennison & Towner, and Carter, Kirby & Henderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The actual parties in this appeal are the same as in the case of Smith v. Jones (No. 3816) 163 Pac. 890, this day decided, and a similar question is presented for consideration, though under different circumstances.

Plaintiff brought suit against a large number of defendants to quiet his alleged title to several tracts of land in Los Angeles county, had summons issued therein, and thereafter an affidavit of one V. Mayer was filed in the action in which she swore that she had personally served Frank F. Fisher, one of the defendants in the action, with a summons and copy of the complaint therein in Los Angeles county on March 21, 1913. Subsequently, an affidavit of service by him of said process on another of the defendants in the action—Mrs. Robert Bowen—in the county of Los Angeles on March 25, 1913, was made by one George B. King, and filed. Thereafter, the defaults of these two defendants were entered, and on May 9, 1913, a decree quieting the title of plaintiff to the property against both said defendants was entered. On September 15, 1913, on notice to the plaintiff, said defendants, Fisher and Mrs. Bowen, made a motion in the action in which the decree was entered to have it vacated and set aside on the ground that the affidavits of service upon them of summons and complaint in the action were false; that no service whatever had been made upon them; that hence the court had not acquired jurisdiction to pronounce a decree against them; and that the decree attempted to be pronounced was therefore void. In support of their motion said defendants each filed a separate affidavit. Mrs. Robert Bowen swore in her affidavit, made July 15, 1913, that she was the owner in fee of land described in the complaint, and that she was a resident of Mesa, Maricopa county, Ariz., and that she had not been in Los Angeles county for 4½ years last past; that she had never been served with summons in said action in Los Angeles county, or anywhere else, and had no knowledge of the pendency of any such action until after the entry of the decree therein. Frank F. Fisher, in his affidavit, swore that for a number of years past he had been the owner of other property described in the complaint; that he had not been served on March 21, 1913, or at any other time, personally, or at all, in Los Angeles county, or elsewhere, with summons in said action; that he was not in the county of Los Angeles during the year 1913, but that during all of said year was without the state of California; that he knew nothing of the pendency of said action until after the rendition of the decree therein. The court granted the motion, and set aside the decree as to both defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

As far as this appeal affected the respondent Mrs. Bowen, we shall have no occasion to consider it, because pursuant to stipulation between her and the plaintiff the appeal as to her was dismissed by order of this court. We shall therefore consider the order appealed from only as it affected the decree entered against the respondent Fisher.

[1] It is not claimed by appellant but that the showing upon which the court made the order setting aside the decree was sufficient to warrant it in doing so. This being true, we perceive no legal ground which can be urged against the validity of that order. While it is well settled that a judgment which is not void upon its face (and the decree here was of that character) may not be set aside on motion unless made within a reasonable time, it is equally well settled that when the application to vacate and set aside a judgment is made within a reasonable time after its rendition, and is based upon a sufficient showing, it is within the power of the court, and it is its duty, to set it aside. What is a reasonable time within which to make such a motion has been clearly laid down in this state as being the same time that is allowed for motions which are permitted to be made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. While the motion here was not made under that section, but independent of it, as is pointed out in Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 57 Pac. 892, which involved a similar motion, nevertheless, it is held that motions to set aside orders, decrees, or judgments which are not void upon their face, whether made under said section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, or not, must be made within six months, as provided in that section, after the entry of such order, judgment or decree. Estate of Eikerenkotter, 126 Cal. 54, 58 Pac. 370. See, also, Norton v. A. T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301. It will be observed that the motion in this case was made within six months after the entry of the decree. It was, hence, made within time, and a sufficient showing in the judgment of the trial court having been made to warrant it, the order setting aside the decree must be sustained. Waller v. Weston, supra.

[2] It is insisted by appellant that the order is erroneous because the court should in granting the motion have imposed terms upon the respondent—the payment of the accrued costs in the action—citing Heermanr v. Sawyer, 48 Cal. 562. This authority has no relevancy. It relates to motions made solely under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent was not proceeding in this motion under that section. He was not asking to be relieved on terms from some oversight or neglect on his part to appear to the action after service. He was asserting a right independent of statute; that he could not be deprived of his property by judgment or by decree entered against him without due process of law; and that as no service of process had been made upon him the court never acquired any jurisdiction to pronounce a decree against him. His application being made timely, and his showing of nonservice of process on him sufficient, he had an absolute right to have the judgment annulled without the imposition of any terms or conditions whatever. Waller v. Weston, supra.

1. TRUSTS ⚷331—ACCOUNTING—ESTOPPEL—WAIVER OF ADJUDICATIONS.

In a beneficiary's action against testamentary trustees, where defendants joined with plaintiff in asking that every item involved in their management of the trust estate be investigated, that their annual accounts be set aside, and a new account stated, by their answer defendants waived any right to stand upon the settlement of their annual accounts as a conclusive adjudication of the matters embraced in the decrees of settlement.

2. TRUSTS ⚷305—TRUSTEE'S DUTY TO ACCOUNT.

6. Trusts 🔑231(1)—Use of Trust Property by Trustee—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 2229, prohibiting a trustee from using trust property for his own profit, or for any purpose unconnected with the trust, testamentary trustees could not use the trust property to secure repayment of advances made by them personally, and in doing so they assumed a position antagonistic to their beneficiaries, and any advantage or profit received by them belonged to the beneficiaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 330, 335.]

7. Trusts 🔑183 — Trustee's Failure to Collect Rent—Duty to Account.

Where testamentary trustees rented land of the trust, but their accounts in the beneficiary's action against them showed that only part of the rent was collected, the trustees were bound to account for the balance, unless they could show some good reason for failure to collect.

8. Evidence 🔑355(1) — Documentary Evidence—Vouchers.

Memorandum checks or tags found among the papers of a bank, and unsigned by the beneficiary of a trust, did not constitute vouchers showing payments to her by the trustees.

9. Trusts 🔑225 — Trustees' Charge Against Estate—Interest.

If it was necessary for testamentary trustees to overdraw a trust bank account, thus in effect borrowing money from the bank, and being charged interest compounded monthly, trustees' charge for interest was a proper one against the trust estate.

10. Trusts 🔑219(1) — Duty of Trustees Borrowing Money—Interest—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 2261, requiring the investment of trust money by a trustee, though trustees are not ordinarily liable for interest on moneys coming into their hands unless they have improperly failed to invest them, they are not justified in borrowing more money than they need, and charging the trust with interest on the sums borrowed, and, where they have idle money on hand, it is their duty to apply it so as to stop unnecessary interest charges.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by Anita Christal Purdy against Robert F. Johnson and another, as trustees under the will of Alberto Trescony, deceased. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying her motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco, for appellant. Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff is a granddaughter of Alberto Trescony, who died testate in the year 1892. The defendants, Robert F. Johnson and Julius A. Trescony, were the executors of the will of said Alberto Trescony, and are trustees thereunder. At the close of the administration of the estate, a decree of distribution was made, whereby one-third of the residue of said estate was distributed to the defendants as trustees, in trust to manage and control the same for the use and benefit of Anita Christal (now Anita Christal Purdy), the plaintiff herein, and Leo Christal, her brother, until they should respectively reach the age of 30 years, at which time or times the trustees were to pay over to said Anita Christal or Leo Christal, or both, their respective shares of the trust property, if in the judgment of the trustees said beneficiaries should "possess such habits of industry, prudence, and economy as to render it suitable and proper and expedient that she or he shall have the control and management of her or of his property." Thereafter, there was a proceeding in partition which resulted in the setting apart to the defendant trustees of certain parcels of land in severalty in lieu of the one-third interest theretofore distributed to them.

The complaint herein, filed in November, 1911, is in two counts. The first alleges that the plaintiff has arrived at the age of 30 years, and that the defendants have informed her that, in their judgment, she possesses the necessary habits and qualifications to entitle her to her share of the trust property, but that the defendants, notwithstanding her demand of a conveyance to her of an undivided one-half interest in said trust estate, refuse to convey the same. The second count is based upon charges of misconduct and impropriety on the part of the defendants in the management of the trust estate. It is alleged that, while the defendants were acting as trustees, they filed in the office of the clerk of the county of Monterey, in which the estate of Alberto Trescony had been administered, six accounts of their transactions as trustees. Five of the said accounts were settled by the court, and no appeal had, in any case, been taken from the order settling the account, and the time to appeal therefrom had expired. The sixth account had been set for hearing at the time of the filing of the complaint. It is alleged that the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth accounts were filed and presented to the court for hearing at times when the plaintiff was out of the jurisdiction, and had no notice or knowledge of the presentation of said accounts; and that the trustees had intentionally concealed from her the fact of the filing of said accounts, and of the hearing and settlement thereof. It is charged that in each of said accounts the trustees failed to account for all of the property and moneys received by them for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. They have, it is averred, wrongfully and fraudulently mingled the trust property with their own, and have carelessly and negligently managed said trust, and so carelessly kept the accounts thereof as to deprive plaintiff of a large amount of rents, income, and assets thereof. The complaint specifies a number of instances of alleged misconduct by said trustees, consisting mainly of the renting by them to J. A. Trescony, one of the trustees, of land belonging to the estate at a rental less than that at which similar lands were rented by them to others. It is charged that the other trustee, R. F. Johnson, and his wife, have occupied and used part of the trust property without accounting to the estate therefor; that the trustees failed to credit the trust property with the full amount received from tenants upon leases of portions of the trust property; that they failed to deposit in bank funds of the trust estate, using said funds for their own benefit, and thereby overdrawing their account in bank, and becoming liable for interest for the amount of said overdraft; that they have negligently permitted fences, buildings, and other improvements on the property to become out of repair. As a result of the failure of the trustees to keep proper accounts, the plaintiff has been wrongly charged in the sixth account with a sum of money as due from her to the trustees, whereas, in fact, the trustees are indebted to her in a sum of money exceeding $7,000.

The prayer of the complaint is that the defendants be required to convey to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in the trust property; that the orders of the superior court settling the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth accounts of the trustees be set aside; and that the defendants be compelled to account to the plaintiff for all other dealings and transactions with said trust estate.

The answer of the trustees denies all of the alleged misconduct and negligence with the exception of two items inadvertently omitted from the accounts settled by the court; alleges that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendants as trustees in a considerable sum; declares the willingness of the trustees to transfer an undivided one-half interest in the trust estate to the plaintiff upon the settlement of their accounts and payment by plaintiff to them of the sum of, approximately, $14,000, alleged to be due them for advances to her from the trust estate. The answer further denies all of the charges affecting the propriety or conclusiveness of the orders settling the first five accounts filed by the trustees, but declares that, "inasmuch as the plaintiff seems to be dissatisfied with the accounts referred to, in her complaint," the defendants join in plaintiff's prayer, and ask that the orders settling said five accounts be vacated, and that a new account be taken covering the entire period of the duration of the trust, and that, upon payment of the amount found to be due by or to the plaintiff, the plaintiff receive from the defendants a conveyance of her interest in the trust property.

The findings of the court were, in the main, in accord with the denials and averments of the answer. It is found that a true accounting between the plaintiff and said trustees shows that the plaintiff is indebted to the trustees in the sum of $8,996.17 for moneys advanced to her by said trustees, which plaintiff refused to pay, and that the protection of the defendants requires that they retain control of the trust estate until the settlement of their accounts and the payment of said balance. All of the charges of concealment, or misrepresentation, of misconduct, and of negligence, are negatived. It is found that there are some errors in the accounts filed by the trustees, but these are found to have been inadvertent, merely. There is a further finding:

> "That in all matters connected with said trust estate and the management thereof said trustees have acted with the utmost fidelity towards the beneficiaries thereof and have conducted the same with prudence and economy."

The court finds that the sum of $500 per annum is a reasonable amount to be allowed to said trustees as their compensation, this amount having been charged and allowed in the several accounts heretofore presented by the trustees.

The judgment declares that a correct accounting of the trust estate up to January 1, 1909, shows a balance of $8,996.17 due from plaintiff to defendant trustees, and that the defendants recover this sum from plaintiff; that, upon payment of said amount to the defendants, the defendants, as such trustees, execute and deliver to plaintiff a conveyance of an undivided one-half interest in the trust estate, but until such payment "said defendants as such trustees may hold and possess all of said trust estate." The plaintiff appeals from this judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The appellant attacks these findings and conclusions in almost every conceivable particular. The record is very voluminous, and the appellant's briefs little less so. As it will not be practicable for us to follow counsel minutely into every branch of their exhaustive discussion of the facts and the law, we shall have to content ourselves with a more general survey and review of the situation.

[1] The course of the trial was somewhat peculiar. By their answer the defendants waived any right they might have had to stand upon the settlement of their five accounts as a conclusive adjudication of the matters embraced in the decrees of settlement. They joined with the plaintiff in asking that every item involved in their management of the trust estate be investigated. The answer also admitted certain inaccuracies in the accounts as rendered. At the outset of the trial, the plaintiff called the trustees and examined them and other witnesses regarding a number of items in the various accounts which had been presented to the probate court. The trial ran on in this way for a number of days, when counsel for the defendants suggested that the case be continued to enable the trustees to submit the accounts to the examination of an expert accountant, with a view to having any irregularities and inaccuracies reconciled and explained. It was admitted that there were errors other than those specified in the answer, counsel saying that "it seems impossible for the court to any more than guess at what the result should be." After some discussion, the court granted the continuance, with a direction that the trustees employ experts and restate their account. After a lapse of several months, the hearing was again resumed, and there was presented to the court a restatement of the account, prepared by Mr. Lutgen, an expert accountant. At this point the plaintiff insisted that the trustees must file their account and prove its correctness. The course actually followed, however, was to have the trustees take the stand without any direct examination on their own behalf, and to subject them to cross-examination by the plaintiff. The ensuing inquiry, involving an examination of a number of witnesses in addition to the trustees, and the production of much documentary evidence, consumed a great length of time.

[2] We think the course pursued was irregular, and that its adoption was the result of a fundamental misapprehension of the nature and extent of the obligation of trustees to account to their beneficiaries—a misapprehension shared by the trial judge with counsel for defendants. As shown by its findings, the court below believed that the trustees had acted throughout in good faith and without any intent to deceive or overreach the plaintiff in any way. We are not disposed to dissent from this view, which we think finds adequate support in the testimony. But, conceding the good faith of the trustees, the fact remains that they had, by their own admission, failed to comply with the obligation which rests upon all trustees to keep full and accurate accounts of the trust funds coming into their hands, and to render an account thereof to their beneficiaries.

"Trustees are under an obligation to render to their beneficiaries a full account of all their dealings with the trust fund (3 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1063; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 1076), and where there has been a negligent failure to keep true accounts, or a refusal to account, all presumptions will be against the trustee upon a settlement (Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. [Eng.] 432, 440; Blauvelt v. Ackerman, 23 N. J. Eq. 495; Landis v. Scott, 32 Pa. 495)." Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 766, 99 Pac. 172.

[3] The entire trial was conducted upon the erroneous theory that the burden of proof was upon the beneficiary to point out the particulars in which the account was erroneous, and that she was bound to go forward and establish affirmatively the impropriety of the charges and credits which she assailed. Such is not the law.

That the defendants had failed to comply with their duty to keep accurate and detailed accounts is manifest from the facts already recited. In their answer the trustees, after admitting errors amounting to several thousand dollars, allege that the plaintiff is indebted to them in the sum of $14,000. The report of the expert shows an indebtedness of the plaintiff to the trustees of $9,904.95. The court finds that such indebtedness amounted to $8.996.17. These discrepancies, in and of themselves, demonstrate that many errors must have found their way into the accounts as presented.

[4] If we take the statement prepared by the expert as a final account of the executors, the record furnishes no means of ascertaining how the court arrived at its conclusion that the balance due was $8,996.17. There is a mere general finding that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendants in this amount. Upon the new trial, which we shall have to order, the findings should be drawn in such manner as to disclose the particular items allowed and rejected. Even if we accept the ultimate finding as technically sufficient, it must be held the trustees failed to prove an account that would justify the judgment under review. The appellant's attacks upon the various items of the accounts are well founded in at least enough particulars to bring the balance well below the figure found by the court.

[5] A few of the matters dwelt on by the appellant may be mentioned. A one-third interest in certain promissory notes belonging to the estate of Alberto Trescony was distributed to the trustees, and it is claimed that the trustees should have been charged with one-third of the face value of the notes not collected. It was the duty of the trustees to collect these notes, and they were liable for the amount of them with interest, unless they made it appear that the failure to collect the notes was not due to their fault. In re Sanderson, 74 Cal. 203, 204, 15 Pac. 753. With respect to two of these notes, that of M. Orradre, and that of D. Amestoy, there was no satisfactory showing that the notes could not, with due diligence, have been collected.

[6] The trustees leased a part of the trust lands to J. Parsons, the lease containing a provision for the payment of $458.86 in addition to a proportion of the crop grown. A lease to Charles Parsons called for a payment of $116 in like manner. By the leases the trustees were given a crop mortgage to secure these payments. The cash rentals were not accounted for. The testimony of one of the trustees was that these payments, although described as cash rental, in reality represented a cash advance that had been made to the tenant by the trustees personally. The explanation conflicted with the written lease which the defendants had executed as trustees. Furthermore, the arrangement testified to was in violation of their duty. They could not use the trust property to secure repayment of advances made by them personally. Civ. Code, § 2229. In so doing they were assuming a position antagonistic to that of their beneficiaries, and any advantage or profit received by them through the transaction is deemed in law to belong to the beneficiaries. Western S. L. I. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 135 Pac. 496.

[7] Certain land was leased to Ingram and Sargent at an annual rental of $1,425. The accounts show that only $1,225 was collected for 1894. The appellant claims, and rightly, that the trustees were bound to account for the balance of $200, unless they could show some good reason for the failure to collect it. Johnson knew nothing about the subject, and Trescony gave a vague and uncertain explanation which can hardly be termed satisfactory.

[8] From time to time the trustees advanced money to the beneficiaries for living expenses. In the account prepared by Lutgen the plaintiff was charged with $1,228 claimed to have been advanced to her in the Salinas City Bank, and not charged to her in the original accounts. These charges are attacked as not being supported by vouchers or by the testimony. The objection is supported by the record. The charges were based by the expert solely on memorandum checks or tags found among the papers of the bank. They were not signed by the plaintiff. Such tags do not constitute vouchers showing payment to her. Estate of Rose, 63 Cal. 349. Furthermore, many of the tags do not purport to be for remittances to the plaintiff, but contain merely the words: "For Remittance. Debit Christal Heirs." "For Check to S. F., Debit Christal Heirs Estate." "For Ck. D. K. B. Co. Debit Christal Heirs Estate"—and the like. The appellants claim that the tags of this class aggregate $700.35. The defendants do not dispute this computation, and we do not feel called upon to make a minute examination of the record to verify the figures. Regarding this charge of $1,228, the respondents say in their brief that the plaintiff was present during the trial and did not take the stand to deny receipt of the amounts specified in the tags. The fault in this argument is that which we have already mentioned as permeating the entire proceeding, viz. that it is assumed that the burden is upon the beneficiary to disprove the correctness of items in the account, whereas, in fact, the burden is upon the trustees to prove that charges made by them are proper.

[9, 10] The accounts filed in the probate court, as well as the restated account of Lutgen, contain charges against plaintiff for interest, aggregating thousands of dollars. Early in the history of the trust, the trustees opened an account with the Salinas City Bank. This account was almost continually overdrawn, and the bank charged interest on the overdraft at varying rates, compounded monthly. If it was necessary to borrow this money and the terms of the borrowing were reasonable, the charge was a proper one against the trust estate. But it appears that during all this time one of the trustees was collecting money for the trust estate. This money, or a large part of it, he would hold without depositing it in bank, and would pay it out from time to time on behalf of the trust estate. Obviously, if this money had been deposited promptly when received, it would have reduced the overdraft, and consequently the interest charges of the bank. While trustees are not ordinarily liable for interest on moneys coming into their hands unless they have improperly failed to invest them (Civ. Code, § 2261), they are certainly not justified in borrowing more money than they need, and charging the trust with interest on the sums so borrowed. Where they have idle money on hand, it is their duty to so apply it as to stop unnecessary interest charges. It is totally impossible to determine from the record what the proper computation of interest should be. As is said by respondents themselves:

> "It is undisputed that these books were kept without any reference to the correctness of the dates of the entry of receipts and expenditures."

Upon the new trial, it will be the duty of the trustees to establish these dates, and, where they are unable to do so, the computation must be made upon the basis most unfavorable to them.

Numerous other items in the account are attacked by appellant, but we think we have discussed enough of them to show that the judgment appealed from cannot be sustained. The case must be remanded for the taking of a new account in accordance with the established principles of equity. The court may either take the account itself or make a reference for that purpose. But whichever mode is followed, the account should be stated in accordance with the rules to which we have adverted, i. e., that it is the duty of the trustees to support every item of their account, and that, wherever they fail to support the correctness of a charge or a credit by satisfactory evidence, the item must be disallowed. It is probable that, upon any such settlement of the account, these trustees will be compelled to forego repayment of sums which they have properly and in good faith expended for the trust, and that they will be charged as having received money in cases where they have not, in fact, received it, and could not with reasonable diligence have received it. But, if this be the result, it will follow from the failure and neglect of the trustees to perform their duty of keeping full and accurate accounts of their transactions. Their good faith cannot save them from the consequences of this neglect. Whatever doubts arise from their failure to keep proper records or their inability to establish the items of their accounts must be resolved against them.

We shall not make any disposition at this time of the questions of compensation of trustees and costs, both of which are discussed in the briefs. These matters can be disposed of by the court below upon the new trial, in view of the facts as then developed, and in accordance with equitable principles.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

AINSA v. MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 7019.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1917. Rehearing Denied April 4, 1917.)

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑479 — INDEBTEDNESS — TRUST DEED—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEE.

In a deed whereby a corporation accepted a trust on behalf of the holders of bonds of another corporation it was provided that the trustee corporation should not be liable or accountable for the acts, defaults, or neglect of any agent to be appointed in good faith for any of the purposes expressed in the mortgage, and the instrument, referring to the trustee, also provided that no liability or responsibility should attach to the corporation other than for the exercise of reasonable diligence in the performance of the trust, when action on its part should become necessary, and that it should not be required to take any affirmative action on behalf of the holders of bonds unless indemnified, nor be compelled to pay any taxes assessed or imposed on any of the property unless the moneys necessary should be furnished by the company issuing the bonds or their holders, and that no liability or accountability should attach to the corporation trustee if it should fail to proceed to foreclose the mortgage, but that a new trustee should be appointed in such case. Held, that by becoming trustee under such deed, and by issuing its certificate of genuineness to the bonds, the corporation trustee did not assume any obligation to pay the losses of bondholders arising from abandonment of work on its property by the corporation issuing bonds, did not become liable for representations made by the mortgagor company, and did not become liable to bondholders for defects in the mortgagor's title after issuance of the bonds, having expressly protected itself from liability for the representations of the mortgagor company.

2. TRUSTS 🔑179—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEES—ERRORS IN JUDGMENT.

Ordinarily trustees are bound to a fair exercise of their judgment, and to the unselfish exercise of good faith, and, while supine negligence or willful default will render them liable, mere errors of judgment will not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 233.]

3. TRUSTS 🔑179—POWER AND OBLIGATION OF TRUSTEE—INSTRUMENT CREATING TRUST.

A trustee of an express trust derives his power from the instrument creating it, and such instrument furnishes the measure of his obligation.

4. MORTGAGES 🔑209—TRUST DEED—OBLIGATION OF TRUSTEE.

A trustee under deed of trust does not assume the important obligations in some instances cast upon a trustee by operation of law; an ordinary trust deed being little more than a mortgage with power to convey.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 466–468.]

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑479—TRUST DEED—TRUSTEE AS COMMON AGENT.

A trustee under an ordinary deed of trust is the common agent of both parties, and required to act impartially.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1869, 1872–1874.]

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑479—TRUST DEED—DUTY OF TRUSTEE TO PROTECT SECURITY.

A trustee in a corporation's deed of trust to secure bonds owes a duty to the bondholders of preservation and protection of the security, if the means of the defense are known to the trustee or may with diligence be discovered.

7. CORPORATIONS 🔑479—TRUST DEED—CERTIFICATION OF CORPORATE BONDS BY TRUSTEE—"CERTIFY"—"GENUINE."

A corporation trustee's certificate to the bonds of another corporation which merely certified that each bond to which it was attached was one of a series of 1,900 bonds, and that the coupons were "genuine," merely guaranteed the bonds and coupons as the issue of the corporation purporting to execute them, since "certify" means to testify in writing, to give a certificate, or to make a declaration about a writing, and the word "genuine" means "not spurious, counterfeit, or false," and its use did not involve the legal sufficiency of the security; the purpose of the certification not being to insure the sufficiency of the security, but to prevent an overissue.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by James Ainsa, in his own right and as trustee, against the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James Ainsa, J. C. B. Hebbard, Marcel E. Cerf, and C. H. Sooy, all of San Francisco (Monte A. Dernham, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco (R. L. McWilliams, of Burlingame, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

James Ainsa sued in his own right and as trustee for other persons owning bonds issued by the Mexican Anthracite Coal Mining Company. The basis of plaintiff's claim is an alleged breach of trust on the part of the defendant, a trustee under a deed of trust executed by the Mexican Anthracite Coal Mining Company in support of its bonds. The face value of the bonds held by appellant according to the allegations in the complaint was $700,000, and judgment for that amount, with interest compounded yearly at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1901, was demanded. It was the theory of the plaintiff that the conduct of the defendant as trustee and as a corporation which had placed its certificate on the bonds of the said mining company had made the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco responsible for and liable for the payment of the losses of the bondholders due to the causes which will be more fully discussed in this opinion.

The superior court found that the Mexican Anthracite Coal Mining Company (which we shall call the "Mexican Company") was at all times after July 25, 1901, a corporation organized under the laws of Arizona and doing business in the state of Sonora, Mexico; that the defendant was at all times mentioned in the complaint a Californian corporation doing business in San Francisco; that the "Compania Explotadora de Carboniferos en Sonora" (which we shall for brevity term the "Sonora Corporation") was at all times indicated in the amended complaint a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Sonora, republic of Mexico; that Ainsa and his associates were the owners and holders of $603,200 of the bonds of the Mexican Company; that on July 2, 1901, the Sonora Corporation owned and possessed certain coal mains, mines, or zones named in the amended complaint; that said title depended upon and was held by virtue of a concession and contract with the state of Sonora (which agreement is set out in the findings); and that on or about July 2, 1901, Gen. C. P. Eagan, with the consent of the state of Sonora, entered into a contract for the purchase of the said coal lands from the Sonora Corporation. With reference to the last-mentioned transaction the court found:

> "That neither the contents of said contract and deed nor the facts set forth therein were known to the defendant except in so far as its terms and conditions were set forth in the deed of trust hereinafter mentioned until long after the execution of said contract."

The finding contains a quotation of the contractual portion of this agreement for the purchase of the said coal lands. In substance it provided for the payment by Gen. Eagan of $25,000 American gold; that the Mexican Company, for which it was specified he was making the purchase, should pay $700,000 in bonds on January 1, 1902; that the bonds should be guaranteed by a first mortgage on the real and personal property of Gen. Eagan and the Mexican Company; that the bonds should be issued "with all the requirements and formalities required for their validity by the laws of the state of Sonora and the federal government of the United States of Mexico"; that the Mexican Company, or on its default Gen. Eagan himself, would perform all the obligations contained in the concession to the Sonora Corporation; and that upon default of any of the stipulated payments Eagan or the Mexican Company would forfeit all sums previously paid. On its part the Sonora Corporation guaranteed the validity of its contract with the government of Sonora.

There were also findings that under the laws of Sonora the contract between Gen. C. P. Eagan and the Sonora Corporation was a good, valid, and absolute conveyance of that corporation's right, title, and interest in and to the coal lands; that the $700,000 of the bonds to be paid and delivered by Gen. Eagan to the Sonora Corporation in consideration for said conveyance was the amount agreed upon by the parties to the contract as being equivalent to the indebtedness of the Sonora Corporation to its creditors and those having claims upon the said coal lands, including plaintiff, James Ainsa, and those represented by him; that on September 13, 1901, Gen. Eagan deeded said coal lands to the Mexican Company, but that his wife did not join in the conveyance; that the deed was not stamped nor recorded as required by Mexican law; but that these defects in the execution and authentication of the deed were not known to defendant when a certain deed of trust was executed and a certificate was attached by defendant to the bonds issued by the Mexican Company. Then follow findings regarding the making, execution and delivery to the defendant by the Mexican Company on November 12, 1901, of a trust deed in and to the coal lands described in the conveyance by the Sonora Corporation to General Eagan and in the deed by him to the Mexican Company; and it is specifically found that the only representations ever made by the defendant with reference to said coal lands were contained in this trust deed, in the bonds issued by the Mexican Company and secured by said trust deed, and in the coupons attached to said bonds. The deed of trust is set out at length in the findings, as are a copy of one of the bonds and a copy of the trustee's certificate. This certificate is in the following words and figures:

> "This is to certify that the within bond is one of a series of nineteen hundred (1,900) bonds issued by the Mexican Anthracite Coal Mining Company, and described in the mortgage therein referred to, and that said bond and the coupons attached thereto are genuine. Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, Trustee, by Fred'k W. Zeile, President."

The findings recite the delivery to the Sonora Corporation and to the plaintiff and other creditors of $700,000 in bonds in accordance with the agreement among the various parties to the transaction, and that defendant's representations were made with the purpose of inducing the creditors to accept the bonds.

In the thirteenth paragraph of the amended complaint it had been alleged that after the sale of the bonds, the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, desiring to cheat the purchasers of said bonds, united with the Mexican Company and abandoned all work on the coal mains, mines, and zones and destroyed all mortgaged estate of every kind; that defendant refused to demand of said mortgagor other estate in lieu of that destroyed by the abandonment of all work; that defendant declined to provide money to protect the mortgaged estate; that it also refused as trustee to have cured the defect in title arising from the infirmities in the deed from Eagan; and that defendant assented to the abandonment by the Mexican Company of work on the coal mains and zones. The court found against all of these allegations, and found also that no demand was ever made upon defendant to do any of the things which plaintiff alleged in the said thirteenth paragraph of the amended complaint that defendant refused to do. There was also a finding negativing an allegation that defendant had acted in collusion with its legal advisers in purposely having the bonds so drawn as to be of no value. It was also found by the court that the Mexican Company abandoned entirely all control and possession of the coal lands in February, 1903, and that said lands, according to the contract between the republic of Mexico and the other parties thereto, reverted to said republic. There were specific findings in which certain of the statutes of Mexico were fully set forth.

Appellant's principal contentions are that respondent, as trustee under the ordinary form of trust deed, is liable for the representations made by the mortgagor, and that, having attached its certificate to the bonds, the said trustee became liable to the bondholders for the defects in the mortgagor's title discovered after the issuance of the bonds.

The deed of trust contained a representation by the Mexican Company that it was the owner of the property to be mortgaged; that the payment of the bonds was secured by a mortgage on the coal lands described; that the lands were mortgaged to respondent as trustee; and that said trustee should hold the property to secure the payment of the bonds. These representations were made by the Mexican Company, and not by the respondent. The trustee's certificate heretofore quoted, merely guaranteed that the attached bond was one of a series of 1,900 "described in the mortgage therein referred to," and that the bond and coupons were genuine. In that part of the deed whereby the respondent accepted the trust on behalf of the holders of the bonds it was expressly provided that the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco should not be liable or accountable for the acts, defaults, or neglect of any agent to be appointed in good faith for any of the purposes expressed in the mortgage, and the instrument also contained the following language referring to the trustee:

> "That no other liability or responsibility shall under any circumstances be borne by or attach to it than for the exercise of reasonable diligence only in the performance of the trust when action on its part for that purpose shall become necessary, and that it shall not be required to take any affirmative action on behalf of the holders of said bonds unless indemnified, nor be compelled to pay any taxes which may be assessed or imposed upon any of the property herein described, unless the moneys necessary to pay such taxes shall be furnished by the Mexican Anthracite Coal Mining Company or the holders of said bonds, and further that no liability or accountability shall attach to it, if it shall fail to proceed to foreclose this mortgage, but in that case a new trustee shall be appointed as hereinabove provided."

[1] It is very evident that by becoming a trustee under such a deed and by issuing such a certificate the respondent did not assume any of the obligations which appellant seeks to place upon it.

[2] Ordinarily trustees are bound to a fair exercise of their judgments and to the unselfish exercise of good faith. "Very supine negligence or willful default will render them liable," but not mere errors of judgment. Ellig v. Naglee, 9 Cal. 683–695; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441–449, 44 Pac. 182; Estate of Schandoney, 133 Cal. 387–393, 65 Pac. 877.

[3] The trustee of an express trust derives his power from the instrument creating that trust, and the same document furnishes the measure of his obligations. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 1062; 39 Cyc. 290–294. Applying the measure of these rules, we find that the trustee was under no extraordinary duty. It was not an insurer of the title of the Mexican Company to the coal lands, nor was it bound to know the law of Mexico and to investigate the title in the light of the statutes of that republic.

[4] A trustee under a deed of trust does not assume the important obligations which are in some instances cast upon a trustee by operation of law. An ordinary trust deed is little more than a mortgage with power to convey. Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379–383, 53 Pac. 813; Curtin v. Krohn, 4

Cal. App. 131–135, 87 Pac. 243; Hollywood Lumber Co. v. Love, 155 Cal. 270–273, 100 Pac. 698; MacLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 97–99, 94 Pac. 604; Tyler v. Currier, 147 Cal. 31–36, 81 Pac. 319; Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316–321, 86 Pac. 706.

[5] A trustee under an ordinary deed of trust is the common agent of both parties and is required to act impartially. Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) p. 3050; Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 1771. Some authorities hold that he is not a trustee at all in a technical sense. 28 Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 765.

[6] Appellant cites authorities to the effect that a trustee owes a duty to the bondholder of preservation and protection of the security. This is undoubtedly true if the means of defense are known to the trustee or may with diligence be discovered. Cuthbert v. Chauvet, 136 N. Y. 326–332, 32 N. E. 1088, 18 L. R. A. 745. But in the present case the court found that the trustee was not cognizant of the infirmities in the conveyance from Gen. Eagan, and there is nothing in the terms of the trust itself which imposes upon the trustee the duty of correcting defects of this sort. Obviously the defendant could not compel the Mexican Company to perform the stipulated work on the coal lands, and it is equally clear that, if the title of the latter corporation to the land was void by reason of the defects in the conveyance from Gen. Eagan, the doing of such work would not have operated as a protection to the security. We may therefore dismiss from consideration the asserted neglect of the trustee in failing to compel performance of mining operations on the property in Mexico and determine whether or not respondent was bound to know the law of Mexico and to protect the bondholders by having the title of the Mexican Company made perfect. Even if we assume that in the ultimate execution of its duties the trustee might have been compelled to have resort to the laws of Mexico, this assumption does not charge it with knowledge of the Mexican law relating to conveyances. In the mortgage or deed of trust the Mexican Company, and not the trustee, stated that the former was owner of the "eleven carboniferous zones"; that the Mexican Company was about to issue bonds; and that said bonds should be secured by a first mortgage on the Mexican Company's property. After these representations were made by the Mexican Company, then the trustee consented to act, but protected itself by certain conditions expressed in the instrument, among which was a provision that no liability should attach to the said Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco except "for the exercise of reasonable diligence only in performance of the trust when action on its part for that purpose" should become necessary. It is evident that respondent thus expressly protected itself from liability for the representations of the mortgagor.

[7] Examining the certificate to the bonds, we find that it merely certifies that each bond to which it is attached is one of a series of 1,900 bonds, and that the coupons are "genuine." The word "certify" is well understood. It means "to testify in writing; to give a certificate; or to make a declaration about a writing." New Standard Dictionary. The word "genuine" means "not spurious, counterfeit, or false." Webster's Dictionary. As was said in Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 432, 51 Pac. 630:

> "By genuineness is meant nothing more than that it is not spurious, counterfeit, or of different import on its face from the one executed, but is the identical instrument executed by the party."

The certificate merely guaranteed the bonds and coupons as the issue of the corporation purporting to execute them. To hold that the word "genuine" involved the legal sufficiency of the security would be to stretch the definition of the word beyond the limits of any interpretation of its meaning heretofore given. The purpose of the certification was not to insure the sufficiency of the security. It was to prevent an overissue. Patterson v. Guardian Trust Company, 67 Misc. Rep. 614, 122 N. Y. Supp. 773. The rule on this subject is well stated by Mr. Jones as follows:

> "The limited and guarded terms of a trustee's certificate cannot be lawfully held to embrace a representation or guaranty of the truthfulness of the description of the obligation as made by the obligor. Trustees act for a comparatively trifling consideration, limiting their liability to their own acts of negligence and misconduct, and it would be unfair to put so serious a burden as a guaranty upon them. So far as appears, there is not a single adjudication extending their liability to even an implied guaranty of the securities whose mere identity they have authenticated." Jones on Corporate Bonds and Mortgages (3d Ed.) § 287a.

This declaration of the law is supported by Tschetinian v. City Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 432, 79 N. E. 401; Bauernschmidt v. Maryland Trust Co., 89 Md. 507, 43 Atl. 790; and Davidge v. Guardian Trust Co., 203 N. Y. 331, 96 N. E. 751.

Appellant contends that the provision in the deed of trust purporting to limit respondent's liability is ineffectual and void. In support of this contention Mullen v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co., 108 Me. 498, 81 Atl. 948, is cited but the citation does not sustain the position which appellant takes. That was a case in which a false certificate was made to support an overissue of bonds. The trustee sought to avoid liability under the language of the trust deed exempting it from responsibility for the acts or omissions of its agents. The Supreme Court of Maine held that this provision was not intended to refer to the act of the trustee in authenticating the bonds, but to its duties, powers, and immunities after it should have taken possession of the trust property. That case is in harmony with the other authorities cited above because in the opinion the purpose of a certificate on a bond is declared to be "to guarantee, not the value or sufficiency of the property behind the bond, but the validity of the bond itself as a legal instrument and the fact that it is secured by a trust mortgage."

No other alleged errors merit analysis.

It follows from the foregoing discussion that no material error was committed by the superior court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Taxation 🔑864—Inheritance Tax—Property Liable — Homestead — "Transfer of Title or of Interest."

Civ. Code, § 1265, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, provide that where a homestead is declared upon community property, upon the death of the husband his title to the land impressed with this homestead vests absolutely in the widow. Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1913, p. 1067) § 2, imposes an inheritance tax upon the transfer of property by will or by the intestate or homestead laws from any person dying seised or possessed of the property while a resident of the state or by any probate homestead set apart from said property. Held, section 2 indicates that a "transfer of title or of interest," as used in the inheritance tax law, means a transfer accomplished by operation of law as well as by the act of the parties, and that homestead property, title to which was transferred to the widow by and on the death of her husband, was liable to an inheritance tax.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James Stewart, deceased. From a decree of the probate court adjusting the inheritance tax, John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, appeals. Decree reversed in part.

Albert H. Elliott, Asst. Inheritance Tax Atty., of San Francisco (Robert A. Waring, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. James C. Sims, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. In 1913 Emma Georgina Stewart, then wife, now the widow, of James Stewart, deceased, declared a homestead upon community property. Upon his death title to the land impressed with this homestead vested absolutely in the widow. Civ. Code, § 1265; Code Civ. Proc. § 1474.

In the adjustment of the inheritance tax due to the state from the estate of James Stewart, deceased, the judge in probate relieved from liability for such inheritance tax the sum of $5,000, as a homestead exemption. The question here presented is whether or not under the law an inheritance tax is imposed upon the value of property, title to which is thus vested by virtue of the homestead laws. The inheritance tax act of 1913, in section 2, declares that:

> "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property * * * in the following cases: 1. When the transfer is by will or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state, from any person dying seised or possessed of the property while a resident of the state or by any probate homestead set apart from said property." Stats. 1913, c. 595.

By the sections of the Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure above cited title to the property impressed with the homestead vested in the widow upon the death of the husband. Hart v. Taber, 161 Cal. 20, 118 Pac. 252; Humboldt Sav. Bank v. McCleverty, 161 Cal. 285, 119 Pac. 82; Wall v. Brown, 162 Cal. 307, 122 Pac. 478. Subdivision 1 of section 2 of the Inheritance Tax Act above quoted unmistakably indicates that a transfer of title or of interest, as used in the inheritance tax law, means a transfer accomplished by operation of law as well as by the act of the parties. It appears too plain to permit of discussion that under these circumstances the homestead property, title to which was transferred to the widow by and on the death of her husband, was liable to the inheritance tax under the law that has been quoted. Respondent has filed no brief upon this appeal, and we are without light as to the views she may entertain in support of the court's decree. Wherefore that decree, so far as it exempts from the inheritance tax the homestead property, is reversed.

ANDERSON v. MATHEWS, County Clerk. (S. F. 8035.)

1. Indians 🔑29—Electors—Citizens.

Const. U. S. Amend. 14 declares that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside. Petitioner was a descendant of uncivilized Indians who were living in California at the time of its cession from Mexico. The United States at no time entered into any treaty with the ancestors of petitioner who was born after California was admitted to statehood, and it did not appear that the group of Indians of which petitioner was a part had any tribal form of government, although they lived together and as a rule associated only among themselves. Petitioner was married under the state laws, and was living with his family in a house on the land of a farmer for whom he worked, although he had secured an allotment and established a residence on land purchased by the government for the benefit of the Indians of which he was one. Held, that as petitioner and his fellows recognized themselves bound by the state laws and conducted themselves similarly to white persons, petitioner was a citizen of the state of California and entitled to registration as a voter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indians, Cent. Dig. § 24.]

2. CITIZENS 🔑3—PERSONS BORN WITHIN JURISDICTION.

Ordinarily, every person residing in the United States is subject to its jurisdiction, and if born there is by that fact a citizen, the only exception being persons who, though residing in the United States or born therein, are for some adventitious reason, as for example resident ministers of a foreign country, citizens of such foreign country.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Citizens, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 13.]

3. INDIANS 🔑2 — INDIAN TRIBES — WHAT LAWS GOVERN.

Indian tribes recognized by the federal government are not subject to laws of the state in which they are situated, but they retain their right to local self-government, and to regulate and control their own affairs and rights of persons and property except as Congress has otherwise specially provided.

4. INDIANS 🔑31—CITIZENSHIP—ABANDONMENT OF TRIBAL CONDITION.

Under Dawes Act Feb. 8, 1887, c. 119, § 6, 24 Stat. 390 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 3951), declaring that every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up within said limits his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is declared to be a citizen of the United States, whether he has been by birth or otherwise a member of any tribe of Indians, an Indian who abandoned all forms of tribal government, marrying under the state laws and laboring as did white men in that vicinity, is a citizen of the United States.

5. INDIANS 🔑2—DISTINCT TRIBES—RECOGNITION.

The establishment of a school by the federal government for the use of a group of Indians and the purchase of land for allotment to them does not constitute a recognition of them as a distinct tribe with independent self-government so as to take them from without the scope of the state laws.

In Bank. Application by Ethen Anderson for a writ of mandate against Shafter Mathews, County Clerk of Lake County, Cal. Writ issued.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, and J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, for plaintiff. Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, and H. B. Churchill, of Lakeport, for defendant.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff prays for a writ of mandate against the defendant, as county clerk of Lake county, to compel the said defendant, as such clerk, to register plaintiff as an elector of Scotts Valley precinct in Lake county. A demurrer and answer were filed to the petition, but the case has been submitted upon a stipulation between the parties in which all of the facts are stated bearing upon the case, and it is unnecessary to refer to the pleadings further.

Section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution declares that "every native citizen of the United States, every person who shall have acquired the rights of citizenship under or by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro," and who possesses certain other qualifications, all of which it is admitted are possessed by the plaintiff, shall be entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law. Under this provision the plaintiff is entitled to registration, provided he is a native citizen of the United States, or is a person who has acquired citizenship by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro. The defendant refused registration to the plaintiff on the ground that he is of the Indian race, and that because of that fact, although born in this state, he is neither a native citizen of the United States, nor a person who acquired the rights of citizenship under the treaty of Queretaro.

The treaty of Queretaro, or Guadalupe Hidalgo, as it is often called, by which the territory embracing the present state of California was obtained from Mexico by the United States, was made at Guadalupe Hidalgo on February 28, 1848, was ratified on March 16, 1848, and was formally exchanged between the two governments at Queretaro on May 30, 1848. Article 8 thereof (9 Stat. 929) declares that "Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty," shall become citizens of the United States if they remain in such territory for one year without declaring their intention to retain Mexican citizenship. This provision establishes the status of persons then living within the territory referred to, but it does not relate to persons born in the ceded territory after it became a part of the United States. It applies only to persons then living, "Mexicans now (then) established" in that territory. To ascertain the citizenship of after-born children or descendants of the persons then living in the territory acquired from Mexico we must look to the laws of the United States, not to the treaty of Queretaro. The plaintiff was born long after the making of that treaty, but he is a lineal descendant of Indians who were then living in that territory. The treaty can have no bearing upon the question of his citizenship, unless the fact that his ancestors were made citizens by that treaty, if it is a fact, is material thereto. The first question for consideration, therefore, is whether or not he is a citizen of the United States by reason of his birth therein after California became a part of the United States.

[1] The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States declares that:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside."

It was said by Field, J., while sitting in the circuit court, that:

> "Independently of the constitutional provision. it has always been the doctrine of this country, except as applied to Africans brought here and sold as slaves, * * * that birth within the dominions and jurisdiction of the United States of itself creates citizenship." In re Look Tin Sing (C. C.) 21 Fed. 909.

See, also, McKay v. Campbell, 2 Sawy. 122, Fed. Cas. No. 8,840; Inglis v. Sailors Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 120, 7 L. Ed. 617; United States v. Ark, 169 U. S. 658, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 42 L. Ed. 890; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 639.

In McKay v. Campbell, the court said:

> "To be a citizen of the United States by reason of his birth, a person must not only be born within its territorial limits, but he must also be born subject to its jurisdiction—that is, in its power and obedience."

The plaintiff's place and time of birth, under this doctrine, makes him a citizen of the United States, unless the fact that he is of the Indian race, together with such tribal relations as he may have, place him in the class of persons who are not born within the "jurisdiction of the United States" or who are not "born * * * subject to the jurisdiction thereof," as it is expressed in the Fourteenth Amendment.

Indians inhabiting the territories embraced within the United States, prior to the acquisition of territory from Mexico in 1848, were divided into separate tribes, sometimes called nations. The political relation of these tribes or nations to the United States first came up for consideration in the Supreme Court of the United States in 1831, in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 1, 8 L. Ed. 25. It was held that an Indian tribe, though not a foreign nation, and though under the protection of the United States, is yet "a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and of governing itself." And in Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 515, 8 L. Ed. 483, it was said:

> "The Indian nations had always been considered as distinct, independent, political communities, retaining their original natural rights, as the undisputed possessors of the soil, from time immemorial." 6 Pet. 559, 8 L. Ed. 483.

This doctrine has been uniformly followed and enforced ever since with regard to all Indian tribes within the territories mentioned, including those within the country situated in the district formerly known as the territory of Oregon. United States v. Ark, supra, 169 U. S. 681, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 42 L. Ed. 890; McKay v. Campbell, supra, 2 Sawy. 132, Fed. Cas. No. 8,840; United States v. Osborne, 6 Sawy. 408, Fed. Cas. No. 10,599; Ex parte Reynolds, 5 Dill. 398, Fed. Cas. No. 11,719; Jackson v. Goodall, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 193; The Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. 737, 18 L. Ed. 667; Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 403, 15 L. Ed. 691. In Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 28 L. Ed. 643, the right of a member of one of these Indian tribes to register as a voter in the state of Nebraska was considered. He had fully and completely surrendered himself to the jurisdiction of the United States, but it did not appear that this was done under any federal law or treaty or that the United States had accepted his surrender, or in any way treated or recognized him as a citizen. Speaking of these Indian tribes the court there said (112 U. S. 102, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 28 L. Ed. 643):

> "Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States, members of, and owing immediate allegiance to, one of the Indian tribes (an alien, though dependent, power), although in a geographical sense born in the United States, are no more 'born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof,' within the meaning of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, than the children of subjects of any foreign government born within the domain of that government, or the children born within the United States, of ambassadors or other public ministers of foreign nations."

The Indian tribes which were the subject of these decisions were all well known and recognized as distinct communities having laws and regulations binding upon each member and which were in some manner enforced by the tribal authorities. There were other Indians, in various places in the different states of the Union, of tribes which, to use the words of Justice Johnson in his dissenting opinion in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch. (10 U. S.) at page 146, 3 L. Ed. 162, had "totally extinguished their national fire, and submitted themselves to the laws of the states," or, as stated in Worcester v. Georgia, supra, 6 Pet. 580, 8 L. Ed. 483, were "small remnants of tribes, * * * surrounded by white population, and who, by their reduced numbers, had lost the power of self-government," and had become subject to state laws. In Danzell v. Webquish, 108 Mass. 133, it is said that these Indians in Massachusetts, though forming well-known tribes, "having never been recognized by any treaties or executive or legislative acts of the government of the United States as independent political communities, were under the control of the Legislature of the state." The decision in Elk v. Wilkins, supra, is avowedly based entirely on the premise that Elk "was born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States, which still exists and is recognized as a tribe by the government of the United States," and that the United States had never provided for or recognized his separation from his tribe, accepted him as a citizen, or assumed jurisdiction over him except in connection with its political relations with his tribe.

Under the facts stipulated, the status of the plaintiff, with respect to these two classes of Indians, is not clear. He was born in California, after its admission into the Union, and has always resided there. At the time of the treaty of Queretaro his ancestors were wild and uncivilized Indians settled in and permanently inhabiting Indian villages in the region now forming Lake county. Then and for several years thereafter they lived in tribes and maintained tribal relations, the nature of which is not stated. The name of the tribe is not given. It does not appear that it was known by any name. The United States has never made any treaty with the tribe, or with any tribe of which it ever formed a part, or with the particular group or village of Indians with whom the plaintiff associates and resides. It does not appear that the original tribe had any form of government, laws or regulations of any kind. He is one of a group of Indians residing in Lake county, and who, although surrounded by white neighbors, practically associate exclusively with each other and with other Indians in that and adjacent counties. The group has no tribal laws or regulations, and no organization or means of enforcing any such laws or regulations. The only sort of communal organization or semblance of political autonomy it has consists of the fact that one of them has the title of "captain," and is treated as their leader or spokesman, and receives some deference and respect on that account. But he has no authority. Disputes are sometimes submitted to him for settlement, but his decisions are considered wholly advisory. Each party accepts or rejects them as he chooses, and there is neither enforcement nor means of enforcement thereof.

Some years ago a white man named Bucknall donated a tract of land to another group of Indians in the vicinity, on which said Indians reside as in a village. In this village the United States has established a school for the benefit of all the Indians of the vicinity, and it provides transportation thereto for the children of the plaintiff's group or village. This land is held in trust for the benefit of all these Indian villages, and they all contribute to pay the taxes thereon. They have never been taxed on other property, and the plaintiff has not otherwise paid taxes.

A few years ago the federal government purchased a tract of land in Lake county for a home for these Indians, including the group of which plaintiff is a member, upon which any family of the group can live and make its home. It has been subdivided into lots for allotment, in severalty, to the beneficiaries. The plaintiff has selected a lot and has established a residence thereon where he lives when not employed elsewhere. He has not received any certificate or patent for the allotment. The Indian agent at Round Valley Reservation furnishes some food and clothing to these Indians in cases of extreme necessity "and attends to their ordinary wants." No explanation is given of the meaning of the phrase just quoted. In no other manner has the United States dealt with these Indians or recognized their distinct or communal existence separate from other inhabitants of the state.

The plaintiff and the other Indians of his group maintain themselves and their families chiefly by doing farm work for wages on the farms of their white neighbors. They also catch fish and gather acorns which they dry and store for winter food. When at work for farmers they live in houses furnished by their employers or in camps in the fields near their work, returning to their village when the employment ends. White employés also camp in the fields at such times in similar manner. They all acknowledge themselves bound by state laws, and do not dispute the jurisdiction of the state over them. The plaintiff was married under state law, and when the petition was filed he was living with his family in a house on the land of a farmer for whom he was working. He expects to return to the village when his employment ceases. It is not the custom of those Indians to marry by state law. They usually take a woman and live with her according to the Indian custom, by her parents' consent, but without a ceremonial marriage after our forms. They wear clothes similar to those worn by their white neighbors.

[2, 3] From these circumstances we think it is clear that the plaintiff is a citizen of the United States, and entitled to registration as a voter. Ordinarily every person residing in the United States is subject to its jurisdiction, and if born here is, by that fact, a citizen. The only exceptions to this rule are persons who, although residing here, or born here, are, for some adventitious reason, subject to the jurisdiction of some other country or political community, as for example, resident ministers of some other country and their children born here, or members of Indian tribes recognized as such by the federal government. The Indian tribes recognized by the federal government are not subject to the laws of the state in which they are situated. They are under the control and protection of the United States, but they retain the right of local self-government, and they regulate and control their own local affairs and rights of persons and property, except as Congress has otherwise specially provided by law. Kansas Indians, 72 U. S. 756, 18 L. Ed. 667; United States v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 381–384, 6 Sup. Ct. 1109, 30 L. Ed. 228; Wall v. Williamson, 8 Ala. 52; Turner v. Fish, 28 Miss. 311; Boyer v. Dively, 58 Mo. 529. For this reason Indians of that description are not deemed to be "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States, within the meaning of that phrase in the Fourteenth Amendment and in the decisions first above cited, and, though born here, they do not thereby become citizens.

The plaintiff and the group of Indians with whom he associates do not belong to any tribe that was ever known or recognized as such by the United States as a distinct political community. The tribe, so far as we know, never had a tribal government of any sort. Admitting that the original tribe may have had such government, yet the plaintiff's group never had any form of self-government of any kind. Neither the members of the group nor, so far as known, the members of the tribe, were subject to, or owed allegiance to, any government, except that of the United States and the state of California, and, prior to 1848, that of Mexico. The reason for the rule laid down in Elk v. Wilkins, supra, declaring that a tribal Indian is not a citizen of the United States, is wholly wanting here, and therefore this case is governed by the general rule that the place of birth confers citizenship. The plaintiff and his group rather belong to that class of Indians described in Danzell v. Webquish, supra, and Fletcher v. Peck, supra, as Indians who have lost their power of self-government and become subject to state laws, and who accordingly must be citizens by birth, since they have never been subject to any jurisdiction other than that of the United States.

[4] Another consideration leads to the same conclusion, with respect to the plaintiff particularly. Section 6 of the act of Congress of February 8, 1887, known as the Dawes Act (24 U. S. Stats. 390), provides that "every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up, within said limits, his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, * * * whether said Indian has been or not, by birth or otherwise, a member of any tribe of Indians" within the United States. The tribes of Indians here referred to must be taken to include only the tribes recognized as such by the United States and constituting independent communities under the decisions above cited. The provision contemplates that Indians not of such tribes may become citizens in the manner specified. This would include the plaintiff, if it be conceded that he would not be a citizen but for this statute. He voluntarily lives separate and apart from any recognized tribe, he works, dresses, eats, and lives with and maintains his lawful wife and his family, after the manner of civilized peoples. He comes within the terms of the statute, and is therefore a citizen.

The plaintiff earnestly contends that all Indians residing in California at the time of the cession of the territory to the United States in 1848 were citizens of Mexico under the "Plan of Iguala," declaring that "all the inhabitants of New Spain, without distinction, whether Europeans, Africans, or Indians, are citizens of this monarchy, with a right to be employed in any post according to their merit and virtues" (U. S. v. Ritchie, 58 U. S. 538, 15 L. Ed. 236); that the ancestors of the plaintiff were "Mexicans now established" in the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of Queretaro; that accordingly they became citizens of the United States by article 8 thereof; and that plaintiff became a citizen by reason of his ancestry and birthplace. It has been said that the translation of the word "habitantes," in the original statement of the Plan of Iguala, as "inhabitants," in the version above given, is not accurate, that the term "habitantes" in Mexican usage, "is limited to persons having a place of abode, and does not embrace vagrants or nomads." U. S. v. Santistevan, 1 New M. 591. There may be doubt, therefore, whether Indians of the northern part of California, such as plaintiff's ancestors, were intended to be included in the phrase "Mexicans now established" in the treaty of Queretaro. Inasmuch as the proposition is not necessary to the plaintiff's case, we express no opinion concerning it.

[5] It is proper to add that the establishment of a school by the federal government for the use of these Indians and the purchase of land for allotment to them does not constitute a recognition of them as a distinct tribe with independent self-government, so as to bring them within the doctrine of Elk v. Wilkins, supra.

1. TAXATION 🔑810(1)—TAX DEEDS—QUIETING TITLE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In action to quiet title, where defendant claimed under grant from state after tax sale, plaintiff was entitled to decree in the absence of showing by defendant of the proceedings by which the state acquired title, and proof of its deed to him was not alone sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1606.]

2. STIPULATIONS 🔑14(4) — CONSTRUCTION — STIPULATIONS AS TO EVIDENCE.

A stipulation that plaintiff is the owner of the property unless the title vested in defendant by virtue of a tax deed cannot be construed in an action to quiet title as a waiver of proof of the proceedings by which the state acquired title by tax deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. § 27.]

3. TAXATION 🔑810(3) — TAX TITLES — EVIDENCE.

In action to quiet title, where defendant claimed under deed from state after tax sale, plaintiff claiming that such tax deed related to totally different lands, her proof of the tax deed upon such theory was not sufficient proof to support the defendant's claim.

4. TAXATION 🔑800(1)—TAX TITLES—QUIETING TITLE—REIMBURSEMENT OF DEFENDANT.

In action to quiet title, wherein defendant claimed under tax deed, but it was proved that the tax deed covered different land from that described in the complaint, defendant was not as a prerequisite to decree for plaintiff entitled to reimbursement for taxes and improvements.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Anna K. Jones against Louis Luckel and others. Decree for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, and Luckel alone appeals. Affirmed.

James McLachlan and Louis Luckel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, Collier & Clark, and John Schlegel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet her title to a tract of land in Los Angeles county. On the trial, and preliminarily to the introduction of any evidence, it was stipulated between the parties:

> "That said plaintiff is the owner of the property described in the complaint, * * * unless the title to said property has become vested in said defendant (Luckel) by virtue of the tax deed to be introduced in evidence by him and the deed to him by William P. Young which is to be introduced in evidence by him."

Plaintiff rested her case upon this stipulation, and defendant then offered in evidence a tax deed from the state of California to himself and his codefendant Young, made June 30, 1903, which recited a delinquency in the payment of state and county taxes on land in Los Angeles county (describing it) for the year 1895, a sale to the state thereof, and subsequently a deed to the state made July 3, 1901, and a purchase by the defendants from the state of the same for the sum of $40.64, being the amount of accrued taxes, penalties, and costs up to the date of sale. Further proof was made by defendant Luckel of a deed to him from his codefendant Young of his interest in the property described in the deed from the state to them, and in addition proved, as alleged in his answer, the payment by him of $26.14 as an aggregate amount of taxes imposed on the property described in the tax deed for the different years from the date of said tax deed to the commencement of the action. No further evidence at all was offered on the part of defendant. Plaintiff in rebuttal introduced in evidence certain official tax records and proceedings for the purpose of showing that the property described in the tax deed from the state to the defendant was not the same property described in the complaint; nor was it the same property on which a delinquency in the payment of taxes accrued and upon which the deed from the state relied on by defendant Luckel was based. Other evidence was also introduced by plaintiff under which it was claimed that the tax deed to defendant was invalid.

The court made general findings in favor of plaintiff—that she was the owner of the property described in the complaint, and that the defendant Luckel had no title or interest therein. It made no finding on the issue tendered of the purchase price paid by Luckel to the state at the sale, or of the taxes subsequently paid by him. A decree quieting her title was entered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant Luckel appeals therefrom, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Several grounds are urged by the plaintiff in support of the judgment. Some of these consist of particulars in which it is claimed the tax deed from the state to the defendant is invalid. Independent of these claims, however, it is further insisted by plaintiff that the judgment must be affirmed for the reason that the evidence on the part of defendant failed to show that he ever acquired any title to the land described in the complaint. It will be perceived that the only evidence introduced by defendant in support of his claim of title to the land described in the complaint was the deed from the state to himself and his codefendant Young. He introduced no deed whatever in evidence to show that the state had ever acquired any title to the land from the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, or from herself, or at all. This could only be shown by the production of a deed to the state made on a sale to it after delinquency by the owner in the payment of his taxes assessed against it. As there was no such deed to the state produced in evidence, there was no sufficient showing that the defendant had ever acquired title to the property against plaintiff. This being true, then under the stipulation between the parties as to title the court was warranted in its finding against defendant and in favor of plaintiff, and in awarding judgment to the latter. Further discussion of this point is made unnecessary, as just this precise question was involved in County Bank v. Jack, 148 Cal. 437, 83 Pac. 705, 113 Am. St. Rep. 285, where it was decided that the production in evidence of a deed to the state vesting the title of the delinquent taxpayer in the state, together with the introduction of a deed from the state to the purchaser, was essential in order to establish that the purchaser had acquired the title of the delinquent taxpayer to the land, and that the production of the deed from the state to the purchaser was not alone sufficient.

[2] That case must control here. Counsel for defendant questions the applicability of that decision here because he claims that under the preliminary stipulation above quoted, proof of a deed to the state was waived. Besides, he asserts that on the trial it was proven by plaintiff that such a deed had been made, which proof was sufficient. But the stipulation is not susceptible of any such construction. It was a stipulation really in the interest of plaintiff obviating the necessity of proof by her of her chain of title to the property, while it was also a limitation on the right of defendant to assert any title to the property except under some tax deed from the state. Nothing was conceded on the part of plaintiff respecting this deed. She was not precluded from attacking it or questioning the validity of all the essential proceedings upon which it was based, a right which in several particulars was availed of on the trial. Nor was it a limitation upon her right to question the sufficiency of the evidence in the case offered by defendant in support of his alleged title to the property described in the complaint. It was in no respect a waiver of any proof which was essential on the part of defendant that he should introduce in order to make out a title on his part to the lands. Counsel does not present any argument or suggest any language used in the stipulation which supports the assertion of a waiver of this essential evidence. He contents himself simply by saying that it was waived. But we cannot agree with him.

[3] Nor is there any merit in his claim that evidence of a deed to the state was sufficiently proven by the plaintiff to supply the failure to do so on his part. It is, of course, not claimed by defendant that any deed to the state was produced on the trial by either side. Plaintiff, for the purpose of showing that the description in the delinquent assessment roll, and in the state controller's authorization for a sale of the property, embraced in the deed from the state to defendants, were of different property, and that none of the descriptions were of the property mentioned in the complaint, introduced the record entries in the delinquent assessment roll and in the authorization of the controller to prove those facts. Aside from the description and other recitals appearing in the delinquent assessment roll, was an entry, "Sold to the state, July 2, 1896," and in the authorization is a recital that the property described, various pieces of which were authorized to be sold, including that subsequently conveyed to defendant by the state deed, had been theretofore sold to the state. It is these recitals which defendant claims obviated the necessity of the production of a deed to the state. But this evidence cannot be given the effect of showing the execution of a deed sufficient to transfer title to the state, and hence a waiver of the necessity of producing the deed to the state as an otherwise essential chain, with the deed from the state, to establish title in the defendant. The effect of a simple recital that a deed was made to the state appearing in some of the proceedings under which the property of the delinquent taxpayer was ultimately sold by the state is no greater than would be given to a recital of such a fact which appears in all deeds from the state, and as it was recited in the one to defendant here, and as it also appeared in the deed from the state under consideration in County Bank v. Jack, supra. It was held in the case cited that such a recital did not obviate the necessity of the production by the purchaser from the state of a deed to the state, and if such a recital would be of no avail there, it cannot be perceived how a similar recital in the delinquent assessment roll or the controller's authorization would obviate the necessity of producing in evidence a deed to the state as an essential element in proof of his title to property described in the complaint as purchased of it from the state.

[4] It is further contended by defendant that the court erred in failing to find on the issue of the amount paid by him as the purchase price of the property to the state and the other amounts subsequently paid as taxes on it, and in failing by its decree to require repayment to him of the money so expended. It is held in Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492, that a court of equity in an action brought by the owner of property to remove or cancel a tax deed or tax sale as a cloud upon his title, or to obtain a judgment which in effect will declare invalid such a sale or deed, should refuse such owner relief except on condition that he first repay to the tax purchaser the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs of sale chargeable upon the land and which the purchaser has paid at the sale by the state, as also the taxes he had subsequently paid. But this is only required where it appears that such taxes are justly chargeable upon the lands affected by the sale or tax deed. There is nothing in this case to show that the state ever acquired any lien for taxes chargeable against the property described in the complaint, or that the state ever acquired any claim against it, legal or equitable, by lien or sale or deed, or that defendant had acquired any interest or title in the property described in the complaint under any tax proceedings or deed. It is a case where it simply does not appear that the state ever had any lien against or title to the property of plaintiff described in the complaint or that the defendant ever acquired any. Under such circumstances there is no ground or reason for imposing as a condition upon the right of plaintiff to have a judgment quieting her title entered that she reimburse the defendant for anything. As under the evidence a finding by the court in the matter of payment of taxes would be of no benefit to defendant if the court had made it, no prejudice was worked against him by a failure to make such finding.

VARCOE v. ALAMEDA LODGE, NO. 1015, BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS OF UNITED STATES. (S. F. 7113.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑50—CLUBS—CITY CHARTER.

The Alameda city charter, declaring it unlawful for any one without a license to maintain a place where liquors are sold or given away, or to sell or give away liquors, providing that no license shall entitle the licensee to carry on the business at more than one place, and that it shall be kept posted in his saloon or place of making sales, is designed to limit and regulate the "business" of selling, and not to apply to dispensing by a fraternal order in its bona fide clubhouse of liquors to its members and their guests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 51.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphy, Judge.

Action by William E. Varcoe against Alameda Lodge, No. 1015, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of United States of America. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Hollister, of San Francisco, for appellant. Samuel Poorman, Jr., City Atty., of Alameda, amicus curiæ. L. R. Weinmann, of Alameda (Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The purpose of this action was to enjoin the selling or serving of liquors by defendant to its members and their guests, upon the ground that such sales are violative of the provisions of the charter of the city of Alameda (article 10, § 1). A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and upon plaintiff's failure to amend, judgment passed for defendant. Upon plaintiff's appeal the city attorney of the city of Alameda has presented a brief on behalf of the city, which brief is both admirable in its learning and commendable in its fairness.

The facts are unquestioned and may be thus stated, in the language of appellant's brief:

> "The defendant maintains a bona fide clubhouse, not as its business, but 'solely as an incident possessing and having a tendency to foster and further the spirit of charity and kindly good fellowship between its members.' The maintenance of such clubhouse is not one of the purposes for which defendant was organized, nor is the operation of said buffet. The clubhouse is not owned by defendant, but by Elks' Hall Association, a corporation, 'the directors of which corporation are members of said Alameda Lodge, and have been selected by said lodge.' The dispensing of liquor at said buffet is not for profit, and can in no commercial sense be termed defendant's business, but is rather an incidental accommodation to its members desiring such refreshment, just as the supplying of newspapers and meals is an incident to the real business purposes of any social or fraternal club. A license is held by defendant under the internal revenue laws of the United States."

The charter of Alameda, in article 10, section 1, above noted, declares as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to establish, open, keep, maintain or carry on within the city of Alameda any saloon, bar, store, dramshop, tippling place, stand or any place where spirituous, malt or fermented liquors or wines or any admixture thereof, are sold or given away, or for any person, firm or corporation (except as hereinafter provided) to sell or barter or give away within the limits of the city any spirituous, malt or fermented liquors or wines or any admixture thereof, without having permission pursuant to an ordinance of the council or people, as provided in this article."

By section 2 of the same article the council is empowered to impose all license taxes for the selling and giving away of such liquors and the number of licenses is limited. By section 7 it is provided that:

> "No license shall be issued entitling the licensee to carry on the business licensed at more than one place," and that the licensee shall keep his license posted "in his saloon or place of making sales thereunder."

Section 8 provides that:

> "No license shall be required for the purpose of selling liquors at wholesale to any retail dealer in this city who holds a license under the provisions of this article."

The contention of appellant is that this case is to be distinguished from that of Cuzner v. California Club, 155 Cal. 303, 100 Pac. 868, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, in that the language of the charter of the city of Alameda is broader and more comprehensive than the language of the Los Angeles ordinance considered in the Cuzner Case; that the Los Angeles ordinance was directed against sales as a business, while the charter of Alameda, while also directed against the same thing, still further prohibits any and all selling or giving away excepting such selling or giving away under license. It is quite manifest and is recognized that this construction would make criminal the giving away of wine or liquor by a host to his guests in his own house; but to this the complete answer is that it is within the power of the law to do this thing, and if it has done so, unquestioned obedience is the law's due.

It would not here be profitable to attempt an analysis of the cases, nor even to set forth at length the divergent views of the courts, because it very rarely happens that the language of an ordinance or charter which a particular court may be engaged in construing is sufficiently identical with that of other ordinances or charters which have been interpreted, so as to give the decisions so doing any considerable, much less controlling, weight. Suffice it, then, to refer to such cases as State v. Minnesota Club, 106 Minn. 515, 119 N. W. 494, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1101; County of Ada v. Boise Commercial Club, 20 Idaho, 421, 118 Pac. 1086, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 101; Manning v. Canon City, 45 Colo. 571, 101 Pac. 978, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 192; South Shore Country Club v. People, 228 Ill. 75, 81 N. E.

805, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519, 119 Am. St. Rep. 417, 10 Ann. Cas. 383; United States v. Alexis Club (D. C.) 98 Fed. 725—as dealing elaborately with one view of the matter; while the opposing view will be found in such cases as Graff v. Evans, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 373; People v. Adelphi Club, 149 N. Y. 5, 43 N. E. 410, 31 L. R. A. 510, 52 Am. St. Rep. 700; Klein v. Livingston Club, 177 Pa. 224, 35 Atl. 606, 34 L. R. A. 94, 55 Am. St. Rep. 717; State ex rel. Bell v. St. Louis Club, 125 Mo. 308, 28 S. W. 604, 26 L. R. A. 573; State, etc., v. Colonial Club, 154 N. C. 177, 69 S. E. 771, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 387, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1079; State ex rel. Columbia Club v. McMaster, 35 S. C. 1, 14 S. E. 290, 28 Am. St. Rep. 826; Cuzner v. California Club, 155 Cal. 303, 100 Pac. 868, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095; State v. Austin Club, 89 Tex. 20, 33 S. W. 113, 30 L. R. A. 500; Tennessee Club v. Dwyer, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 452, 47 Am. Rep. 298; Piedmont Club v. Com., 87 Va. 540, 12 S. E. 963; Com. v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144; Barden v. Montana Club, 10 Mont. 330, 25 Pac. 1042, 11 L. R. A. 593, 24 Am. St. Rep. 27.

In every case the fundamental question is the scope of the ordinance, and in this case that question may thus be stated. Fully conceding the power of the city of Alameda, under a proper law designed to that end, absolutely to prohibit in every instance any sort of sale or any sort of giving away of intoxicants, did its charter provisions in this instance design to do that thing, or did they design to limit and restrict the business of selling? We think that it is clear that the charter was directed to the regulation of the business, and in this view the case is not distinguishable from that of Cuzner v. California Club, supra. And, finally, of this and of every like case, it may be said that if the construction of the existing law does not meet the views of the municipal authorities or the people, the remedy is ready to their hand, to enact such a law as will put all such questions beyond peradventure.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

The second officer of a vessel ordered by his superior to seek a lifeboat when vessel was about to strike the rocks is not, as a matter of law, guilty of "willful misconduct" because after getting into a lifeboat he goes back to the vessel and is unable, because of lifeboat being cast off, to return; "willful misconduct" meaning something more than negligence or gross negligence.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(8)—AWARD OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION — HARMLESS ERROR.
An award by the Industrial Accident Commission making attorney's fees allowable under Workmen's Compensation Act payable to the attorney is without prejudice to the employer.

In Bank. Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act by the widow of James Bolger.

On certiorari by the North Pacific Steamship Company against the Industrial Accident Commission of California and others to review an award. Award affirmed.

C. H. Sooy and H. W. Glensor, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents. F. R. Wall, of San Francisco, for applicant.

SLOSS, J. This is a writ of certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation to the widow of James Bolger for injuries causing his death. The petitioner for the writ was the owner of the steamer Eureka, engaged in coastwise trade between San Francisco and other ports. Bolger was the second officer of the Eureka. On January 8, 1915, while the vessel was off Point Bonita, outside the harbor of San Francisco, her engines stopped. The vessel was drifting toward the rocks, and the captain ordered the crew to take to the boats. All hands, with the exception of Bolger, made their way safely to shore in two boats. Bolger was on the vessel when she began to break up and was lost.

[1, 2] Most of the points made against the award have been removed from the field of discussion by decisions rendered since the present proceeding was instituted. It must now be taken as settled law in this court that the general scheme of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 796) is constitutional, that the provisions allowing awards for death benefits are valid, and that the act authorizes awards for injuries received by mariners on navigable waters. Western Indemnity Company v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398; Western Metal Supply Company v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491; North Pacific Steamship Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, 163 Pac. 199, decided February 3, 1917.

[3, 4] The petitioner contends that the commission was without jurisdiction to make the award, for the reason that the uncontradicted evidence shows that Bolger's death was the result of his own willful misconduct. Under section 12, (a), (3), of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283), liability exists only where the injury is not "caused by the intoxication or the willful misconduct of the injured employé." The commission found that Bolger's injury was not so caused. But its finding is subject to review here if totally unsupported by the evidence. Great Western Power Company v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. The commission is, however, the body charged with the determination of issues of fact, and its findings of fact are not reviewable where they find support under any rational view of the evidence.

[5] The words "willful misconduct," or phrases of similar import, are found in many workmen's compensation statutes. We need not undertake the difficult, perhaps impossible, task of giving an accurate and comprehensive definition of the term. As is true, generally, of inquiries turning upon standards of human conduct, each case must turn upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. Great Western Power Company v. Pillsbury, supra. Certain it is, however, that "willful misconduct" means something more than negligence—more, even, than gross negligence. In the Great Western Power Company Case we held that a workman was guilty of willful misconduct where he had deliberately and intentionally violated a reasonable rule established for the very purpose of protecting men in his occupation from the danger of serious injury.

In the present case it is claimed that Bolger deliberately violated a proper command of his superior officer, the captain, and that his death was the direct result of this disobedience. The testimony shows that, when the engines stopped and the vessel had struck or was about to strike, the captain ordered the crew to take to the boats. Two boats were available, and were launched, one, a "working boat," near the bow, and the other, a lifeboat, near the stern. Bolger's station was at the lifeboat. Most of the evidence indicates that the captain and some of the men took their places in the working boat, while Bolger and others went into the lifeboat. There is, however, some testimony that Bolger was with the captain in the working boat. At any rate, Bolger, for some reason which is not disclosed by the evidence, left the boat in which he was, and went back to the steamer. While he was still absent from his comrades, the lifeboat was cast off, and when Bolger was next seen he was on the Eureka, appealing to the men in the boats to save him. A high sea was running, and it was not possible to approach near enough to get Bolger off.

[6] The willful misconduct asserted is the failure of Bolger to obey the captain's order to take to the boats. Of course, he did, in the first instance, heed the command by going into the boat. But the order of the captain may fairly be interpreted as an order to abandon the vessel once for all. This does not, however, answer the whole question. Did the evidence compel an inference that Bolger's act in returning to the ship was a deliberate and intentional defiance of his superior's command, in reckless disregard of his own safety? The situation was obviously one of great peril, and any competent mariner must have realized the necessity for a prompt leaving of the vessel. But when Bolger returned to the Eureka the lifeboat was still attached to the main vessel. We do not know the purpose of his return. It may conceivably have been a legitimate purpose, and one that might have been accomplished in a few moments. The entire episode, from the order to lower the boats to the final abandonment of the ship, occupied but a brief time. Bolger may well have thought that he could do what he set out to do on the vessel, and get back before the occupants of the boat should cast off. Some allowance may be made for errors of judgment in times of sudden emergency and stress. There can be no presumption that a man recklessly imperils his own life. In view of all the facts, we think the commission took no unreasonable view of the evidence when it found that Bolger was not guilty of willful misconduct. His actions were not those of one intending to refuse compliance with the captain's order to get into the boat. On the contrary, he showed his purpose of doing as he was bid. He was remiss, perhaps, in not following out the directed course as speedily as he might have done, but it cannot be said as a matter of law that his brief delay amounted to willful misconduct. This view of the commission's conclusion derives some additional support from the testimony of one witness, who stated that, when Bolger left the boat to return to the ship, the captain was in the same boat and made no objection to Bolger's return. This is some evidence to indicate, either that the captain did not regard Bolger's return as a violation of his orders, or that Bolger was justified in thinking that the captain assented to his conduct.

[7] A further point is made. Section 29, (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act authorizes the commission to—

> "fix and determine and allow as a lien against any amount to be paid as compensation:
> "(1) A reasonable attorney's fee for legal services pertaining to any claim for compensation. * * *"

The findings declare that Joseph A. Brown, attorney at law, has rendered legal services on behalf of applicant in this proceeding, of the reasonable value of $25. The award directs the steamship company to pay to the widow the sum of $3,750.30, to be paid as follows: (1) To Joseph A. Brown, attorney for applicant, the sum of $25 as a reasonable attorney's fee; (2) the balance to the widow in specified installments.

It is claimed that the act does not authorize the allowance of a sum of money to be paid directly to the attorney. It is difficult to see how the petitioner is injured by the form of the order, since the amount of the attorney's fee is deducted from the compensation allowed to the petitioner. But beyond this we think the order complies with the intention of the act. It is provided that the commission may allow the attorney's fee as a lien against the amount to be determined as compensation. The petitioner does not suggest any method by which such a "lien" can be made effective otherwise than by intercepting the amount before it passes from the employer to the applicant. The method adopted by the commission seems to be the only available way of enforcing the lien.

The award is affirmed.

GONZALEZ v. GONZALEZ. (S. F. 6862.)

1. Arbitration and Award 🔑3 — What Constitutes Arbitration — Prior Dispute.

An arbitration, strictly speaking, has to do with settlement of existing controversy, and if there is no matter in dispute, there is no question for arbitration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 11–21.]

2. Partition 🔑6—Arbitration — Compliance with Statute.

Where there had been no dispute as to shares of heirs in property, but they agreed to a partition by disinterested persons, the partition was not a statutory arbitration, where the award was not filed with the clerk of court in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, and no hearing for the purpose of taking evidence was had in accordance with section 1287, although the agreement provided that the award should be binding and might be enforced in judicial proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 4.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Arbitration.]

3. Partition 🔑6—Reference.

Where heirs of one deceased agreed to have a partition of the property made by disinterested persons, the proceeding was not an arbitration and award, but a mere reference, although the arbitrators were sworn in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1285.

4. Partition 🔑6—Relief—Owelty.

Where parties have voluntarily agreed to a partition of the estate to which they are the heirs, the partitioners to whom the matter is referred have the power to award owelty as a necessary incident to the partition.

5. Partition 🔑6 — Equitable Division — Water Rights.

Where heirs of an estate which owned water rights agreed to a partition, it was not necessary that the shares in the water company be divided share for share, but, their value depending upon their relative position on the ditch, it was proper to estimate the value of each right and award an unequal number of shares having approximately equal value.

6. Partition 🔑6 — Partition by Agreement—Right of Way.

Where heirs of an estate agreed to refer partition to certain persons, and the land was so divided as to necessitate giving one heir a right of way over the land given to another heir, the power of the referees to award such right of way would be implied in the agreement in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1655, 1656, implying all things in law which are considered incidental to a contract and necessary to effectuate it.

7. Partition 🔑6—Rights of Parties—Necessity of Hearing.

In a voluntary partition of land belonging to an estate which was referred to disinterested partitioners, it was not essential that the parties be given an opportunity to introduce evidence and be heard.

8. Partition 🔑6—Voluntary Partition—Powers of Partitioners.

Where heirs of an estate agreed to a partition by disinterested partitioners, it was not an abuse of power or misconduct for one partitioner to hire an expert upon land values to verify conclusions already reached by such partitioner.

9. Partition 🔑6—Voluntary Partition—Powers of Partitioners.

Where heirs of an estate agreed to partition by disinterested partitioners, the mere fact that one of the partitioners was a guest of one of the heirs, while requiring strict scrutiny, did not necessarily vitiate the partition made.

10. Partition 🔑6 — Agreement — Enforcement.

Where a partition agreement recited that the award made should be binding upon all parties, a decree of specific performance of such agreement could not be disturbed in the absence of showing that the partition was unfairly made or that the partitioners were guilty of fraud.

Sloss and Shaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Suit by Edie W. Gonzalez against Anita C. Gonzalez. From a judgment for complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack, of San Francisco, for appellant. Charles S. Wheeler and John F. Bowie, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Appeal from a judgment decreeing specific performance of an award given under two agreements providing for the partitionment of certain realty holdings and personalty in Monterey county.

By virtue of a contest instituted against the will of Mariano E. Gonzalez, deceased, the plaintiff and defendant, who are respectively the widow of the deceased and daughter by his former wife, had become possessed in equal undivided shares of the estate of the deceased, except a certain tract, 9.23 acres in extent, a part of the homestead and constituting the "dwellings and out buildings and yards about the same," which was distributed absolutely to the plaintiff. The original homestead awarded to the plaintiff in the probate proceedings included about 300 acres. But subsequent to the commencement of the said contest, and prior to the revocation of the probate of the will, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the first of the agreements between themselves, dated March 13, 1909, whereby it was agreed, among other things, that the parties thereto should petition "for the final distribution of all of the estate of the said deceased [including the said homestead except for the nine-acre tract referred to] to the parties hereto, share and share alike." The will was revoked, and the decree distributing the property to the plaintiff and defendant in accordance with the agreement was duly entered on April 5, 1909. One of the objects of the agreement was to give to the parties equal rights to the homestead. It was thus provided in the agreement that, in the event the will was adjudged invalid, the remaining portion of the homestead should be either "partitioned into two parts of equal value," or a portion of the estate adjacent thereto and of equal value should be set apart to the defendant; or the homestead tract should be "appraised at its fair market value," and that the plaintiff should pay the defendant one-half of this amount. The plaintiff, who was given the right to elect the method to be ultimately employed, decided to retain the land embraced in the homestead, thereby having the property partitioned in accordance with the provisions of the second alternative. That provision, stated in full, is as follows:

> "(2) Property adjacent to the property included in the said homestead, of equal value and like quantity thereto, exclusive of the property above excepted shall be set apart absolutely to the party of the second part [referring to the defendant], and the property included in the said homestead shall be set apart absolutely to the party of the first part [referring to the plaintiff]."

For the purposes of setting apart the property, it was provided in the agreement that three "arbitrators" should be chosen. The plaintiff selected Warren R. Porter, the defendant Robert F. Johnson, while these two chose Wellington Gregg, Jr. It was further provided that:

> "The arbitrators shall forthwith proceed to make such partition, such setting apart, or such appraisement and the determination of any two of the arbitrators upon any matter submitted to them shall be binding."

But thereafter on July 19, 1909, and before the "arbitrators" had completed their work, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the second agreement referred to, whereby the "arbitrators" were directed also to "partition and divide between the parties hereto and * * * set off to each of the parties in severalty" one-half of the remaining real estate, "quality, quantity, and improvements considered," consisting of about 6,000 acres of farming and grazing land, various lots in a town known as Gonzales, and certain personal property consisting of 70 shares of the capital stock of the Gonzalez Water Company, farming implements, vehicles, household furniture, and the like. A plan of partition embracing all the property covered in the two agreements was submitted on February 25, 1910, which was concurred in by Porter and Gregg. Although the parties had agreed that they "shall execute such instruments of conveyance, one to the other, and shall do such other things as shall be necessary to carry into force and effect said award," the defendant refused to abide thereby; whereupon the plaintiff brought her action for specific performance. Evidence was introduced at the trial on behalf of both parties, and the court, having viewed the real property at the request of the defendant, rendered judgment for the plaintiff decreeing specific performance as prayed. The defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying her motion for a new trial.

It is contended by the defendant that the judgment and order must be reversed for the following reasons:

> "(1) An award must conform strictly to the submission. The arbitrators were without authority to divide the land unequally, allowing compensation to the one receiving the smaller portion, or to divide the shares of stock unequally, or to burden one portion with an easement in favor of the other.
> "(2) The court erred in enforcing an award reached by arbitrators who refused the defendant the right to a hearing and to adduce evidence.
> "(3) The award is void because of the gross misbehavior and neglect of the arbitrators.
> "(4) A court of equity will not enforce specifically an award unless the plaintiff proves that it is just and reasonable. This the plaintiff failed to do."

These objections explain themselves. They will be considered in the order stated.

[1] 1. But first it is necessary to determine in what capacity the three persons selected to set apart and partition the property were expected to serve, whether as arbitrators in the strict sense, or merely as agents of the parties appointed to divide the property on their behalf. It is the theory of the defendant that they were arbitrators who were bound to exercise such authority as is common to arbitrators strictly in accordance with the rules prescribed by law for the arbitration of controversies. But the proceeding in this case was not based upon a prior controversy. At the time the first agreement for the division of the property with reference to the homestead was made the parties were laboring under no dispute; indeed, they had no certain knowledge that they would prevail in the contest for the revocation of the will, and that there would be any property to be divided between them. And there is nothing to suggest that any dispute had arisen prior to the entering into of the second agreement. A reasonable inference may be drawn from the facts that the object of the parties was rather to prevent future disputes than of settling existing ones. The court found:

> "That at the time the parties to this action entered into the contracts * * * no difference or dispute existed between them, nor had they themselves made any attempt to divide the properties therein mentioned between themselves."

Yet, "the decided weight of authority is to the effect that an arbitration, strictly speaking, has to do with the settlement of existing controversies between parties. If there is no matter in dispute, there is no question for an arbitration." 5 C. J. 27, § 25.

[2] That the proceeding to partition the property cannot be supported as a statutory arbitration is further apparent. It does not appear that the award of the alleged arbitrators was filed with the clerk of the court as provided by the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1283), although the contracts provided that the award "shall be binding" and "may be enforced by either of the parties hereto by proper judicial proceedings." Nor was any hearing held for the purpose of adducing evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 1287.

[3] On the other hand, an examination of the evidence, and a study of the situation of the parties leading to the making of the agreements, convinces us that this is nothing more than a reference to disinterested persons. While there is little authority on the subject of effectuating a partition by such means, there are numerous instances where the practice has been followed. Allnatt points out that Littleton, in enumerating the various methods of arranging and choosing the shares on a partition of coparceners, gives the second as "where they chose certain friends to make partition of the lands or tenements." Allnatt on Partition (Ed. 1820) p. 14; Litt. § 243.

> "I have reason to know," Allnatt further states, "that in many instances where several persons have been entitled to lands, as tenants in common, in fee, or have been proprietors of waste grounds, in respect of different farms, etc., of which they were seised in fee, the only steps taken for the purpose of effecting a partition have been to enter into a deed of covenant, to refer the partition and allotment to the arbitration of some indifferent person."

It is said by Freeman:

> "A deed of partition may appoint certain persons as commissioners to make a division of the lands therein described, and to allot the same among the cotenants according to certain terms specified in the deed." Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition (2d Ed.) § 395.

In Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 383, 25 L. Ed. 855, the court, approving the action of a trustee in leaving a division of certain properties to others, makes the following pertinent comment:

> "And it seems to us that the intervention of disinterested persons for appraising the property and making the allotment was judicious and proper. It is the course most commonly pursued by those who desire to make a division of property."

See, also, Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 569, 2 Pac. 418; Tewksbury v. Provizzo, 12 Cal. 20.

Such a proceeding is not necessarily an arbitration, although there may be circumstances where, through a controversy as to the proper division to be made of the property, or otherwise, a partition may be properly made the subject of arbitration. Code Civ. Proc. § 1281. It is rather analogous to that of an appraisement or a valuation of property (see M. E. Church v. Seitz, 74 Cal. 287, 15 Pac. 839); the distinguishing feature being that, after the value of the property has been determined, it is necessary that it be divided or set apart so as to bring about a separation into two parcels according to the terms of the agreement of submission under which the award is to be made. Nor is this conclusion affected by the incident that the persons chosen to make the partition were sworn in accordance with the provisions of section 1285 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

> "As partition by act of the parties rests on their agreement, it is obvious that they may resort to any method which to them seems best, and that it must be impossible to specify all the methods that may be resorted to, for human ingenuity may devise ways not hitherto employed and which nevertheless satisfy all the interested parties." 30 Cyc. 154.

To iterate, the parties here, instead of endeavoring to divide the estate among themselves, agreed to effectuate the partition by selecting three disinterested persons, hereafter referred to as the partitioners, to determine the matter for them.

[4] 2. As to defendant's first contention, it is shown that the partitioners did not actually make an equal division of the tract of land, but awarded to the defendant an owelty of $3,304. From the earliest times the power to award owelty has been regarded as necessary to the act of partitioning property; for, as said in 30 Cyc. p. 261, speaking generally of the nature of the right:

> "It is not essential, and in truth it can rarely be proper, even where the interests of two or more are equal, to allot each an equal part."

In the year 1682 a case is reported where coparceners, making a partition, expressly agreed upon an owelty of partition. Hulbert v. Hart, 1 Vern. 133. In Lacy v. Gard, 60 Ill. App. 72, a father possessing two tracts desired to arrange a partition between his children and grandchildren. "He selected three neighbors; requested them to view the premises and suggest to him a fair and equal division." Yet as to one of the tracts their report was that it be divided into unequal parcels, "and that the difference in value should be equalized by requiring the party to whom it should be allotted to pay the sum of $300 to the persons to whom the other 20-acre parcels should be given." Also in Long v. Long, 1 Watts (Pa.) 265, a partition was made by "certain persons appointed for that purpose," and, apparently without express authority being given, owelty was awarded. The rule is thus laid down:

> "Partition among the parties is usually effected by the division of the property into as many portions as there are cotenants, such portions being as nearly equal as possible, and the allotment of one of such portions to each of the cotenants. And in case of any considerable inequality between the shares it is usual for those cotenants who receive shares of a lesser value to receive a payment from those receiving the more valuable shares, which payment is termed owelty." 21 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1135.

It is also stated:

> "In making a voluntary partition, or a partition by parol agreement, the parties may agree for the payment of owelty to equalize the shares." Id. p. 1183.

That the parties could have expressly delegated such a power cannot be questioned. This was recognized by Freeman:

> "The power which every cotenant has of joining with his companions in interest in making a partition of the common property, may, no doubt, be delegated by him to another; and, when so delegated, it may be exercised by the agent as effectually as it could be exercised by the principal." Freeman, etc., § 417.

And with equal force the delegation of such power may under proper circumstances be implied.

It is reasonable to infer that the parties here knew the character and extent of the property to be divided. The maps contained in the record and other evidence show the estate to consist of three irregular tracts, separated by the Salinas river and the Southern Pacific Railroad, but practically surrounding the town of Gonzales, the whole embracing 6,263.25 acres, which consist for the most part of farming land, pasturage, and alfalfa fields, marked by numerous canals, roads, fences, hills, and ravines, and occupied at various points by dairy houses, farm buildings, and other structures. Porter testified:

> "From my standpoint, it was physically impossible to divide that property justly acre by acre, share by share, of the land, and do justice to both parties. It can't be done, I think, owing to the topography of the country."

The award itself states that the land could not be divided between the parties in such a way as to equalize the differences in value "without injury to the same." The court, having personally viewed the property, made the following findings:

> "That the property to be divided could not have been partitioned in kind with absolute equality between the parties, quality, quantity, and improvements thereon considered, without detriment to the interests of the owners, for the character of said property was such that the best interests of both of the parties require that some inequality exist in the partition thereof, and that the difference be equalized by a monetary payment; * * * that, in view of the subject-matter to which said contracts related, it was reasonable and conformable to usage to imply therefrom an authority and power in the parties thereby appointed to equalize comparatively slight and necessary inequalities of value in a division of the property, by pecuniary compensation, and such implication is incident to said agreements and is necessary to carry them into effect, and to make possible a fair and equitable partition of the said property."

From these considerations we think it is reasonable to imply from the agreements the power to award owelty, and, as the sum awarded herein is but a trivial amount compared with the total value of the property, the award thereof must be upheld.

[5] The partitioners did not divide the 70 shares of the capital stock of the Gonzalez Water Company share by share, but divided them according to the acres of land lying below the irrigation ditch belonging to the water company. The court found that, although the ownership of the shares was, in fact, severable from the ownership of the land, the stock was of little or no value to persons who did not own land beneath the ditch of the water company, as a share of stock merely entitled the holder thereof to receive water on land below the ditch, and that it was just and reasonable in furtherance of the intention of the parties that the shares be divided in proportion to the number of acres lying below the ditch and irrigable therefrom. The court also found:

> "That the inequalities of value so existing when said properties are considered as deprived of the rights to water incident to the said water stock are fully and fairly corrected and compensated for by the award of said water stock as the same has been made, and the allowance and direction for payment to said Anita G. Gonzalez of the sum of $3,304."

These findings are not only supported by the evidence, but obviously are in accord with the intention of the parties to partition the property as an entirety. Indeed, it cannot be assumed that the parties otherwise would have found it advisable to submit 70 shares of stock to third persons in order to obtain an equal division thereof.

[6] The defendant also contends that the partitioners exceeded their authority in that they awarded a perpetual right of way to the plaintiff over the lands allotted to the defendant, notwithstanding no such authority was expressly conferred by either of the contracts of submission. There is evidence to show that the way or easement was merely the right to use an existing road which was necessary to furnish proper facilities for access to the land to which it was appurtenant, and there were findings that it was reasonable and conformable to usage to award the right of way under the circumstances shown, in order to make possible a fair and equitable partition of the property. It is our opinion that the intention of the parties to vest the partitioners with such authority must be implied, not only from the facts shown, but under the provisions of the Civil Code which implies all things in law which are considered incidental to a contract, and necessary to carry it into effect. Sections 1655, 1656.

> "Though it is not usual to create an easement over another person's land, yet it is otherwise when a separation of property takes place, and it is necessary that a certain part of it should be assigned to a person who cannot have the use of it without a right of way." Lister v. Lister, 3 Y. & C. 540.

[7] 3. The second point raised by the defendant is obviously based upon the theory that the proceeding for the partitionment of the property is a statutory arbitration. It cannot be questioned, under the facts, that the partitioners did not grant the parties an opportunity for a hearing or the right to adduce evidence. After they had determined upon the award Gregg sent a letter to the defendant to attend at a certain meeting if she wished to be heard. But subsequently it was decided by Porter and Gregg to sign the award without further consideration. We do not think, however, that a hearing before the partitioners for the purpose of taking testimony and determining such questions as the parties might choose to raise was anticipated by the parties, or embodied in the terms of their agreements. Porter stated that the question of hearing evidence was never suggested to him by any one prior to the meeting referred to. Gregg testified to like effect. Rather the plain import of the contracts was that the three persons to be selected should go upon the land, make the necessary investigations, and otherwise inform themselves so they might be able to make a fair division of the property. There is, in fact, no provision in either of the agreements calling for any hearing, and we can conceive of no reason why, if the parties should choose to leave such matters wholly to the judgment of the three persons to be selected, they should not be permitted to do so. Such was the procedure which was followed in Casstevens v. Casstevens, 227 Ill. 547, 81 N. E. 709, 118 Am. St. Rep. 291, where three disinterested persons "sometimes in the record called 'arbitrators,' and sometimes 'commissioners,'" went upon the land and decided how the property should be allotted. This was the procedure followed herein, and elaborate plans were prepared by the partitioners in their effort to arrive at a just and equal division. Each of them made personal inspection of the property. Porter and Gregg, who concurred in the award, prepared, or had prepared under their supervision, elaborate drawings showing the location of the various parcels of land and indicating the proposed plan of partition. It is obvious that the parties, not contemplating a formal hearing, desired to leave the whole matter to the skill and unbiased judgment of the three persons who were to be selected to make the partition. Referring to a case of valuation or appraisement, it was said in M. E. Church v. Seitz, supra:

> "Certainly, if parties expressly say in their agreement that the 'arbitrators' are to determine the question upon their own skill and judgment without examining witnesses or hearing argument, there could be nothing to prevent such agreement from being carried out. And if this can be expressed, it can in a proper case be implied."

See, also, Bottomley v. Ambler, 38 L. T. N. S. 545; Hall v. Norwalk Fire Ins. Co., 57 Conn. 105, 17 Atl. 356.

As is said in the first of the two cases last cited:

> "Considering the position and experience of the three gentlemen who were appointed, it may well be that they were perfectly qualified to decide the matter themselves. In such a case as this the arbitrators are not arbitrators in the sense in which arbitrators are appointed in an ordinary case, when they are appointed to ascertain facts and apply the law to the facts brought them on evidence."

While these are cases of appraisement or valuation, there is no difference in principle between them and the case before us.

[8] 4. In support of the defendant's third main contention that the award should be vitiated because of the misconduct of the "arbitrators" two minor points are raised. It is contended that the partitioner Gregg did not sufficiently familiarize himself with the extent and character of the property to be partitioned, by personal investigation or inspection, but left the major part of this work to Harry R. Verrue, who was selected by him as an expert on land values. It appears that Verrue devoted much labor and time carefully considering the matter, personally going over the land, and otherwise determining the most advisable manner in which the partitionment could be made. He submitted his report to Gregg, who discussed the matter with his colleagues, and then the award was made. Gregg testified as to the employment of Verrue as follows:

> "The conclusion embodied in the award is one I reached on my own account. In reaching that conclusion I had employed Mr. Verrue. After visiting the property, I thought it would be well to have the opinion of a man who was well versed in the valuations and conditions of the land in that county, and, knowing that Mr. Verrue had considerable experience, I engaged him for that purpose. I paid him personally."

The court's findings on this point are in part as follows:

> "That said Warren R. Porter and Wellington Gregg, Jr., examined the property to be set apart and the property to be divided and did devote such time to the performance of their duties as was reasonably necessary in order to arrive at an accurate, fair and just conclusion; * * * that said Warren R. Porter and Wellington Gregg, Jr., who signed said award, correctly informed themselves concerning the quantity, quality, improvements, and values of said properties."

It is noteworthy that Porter's plan of partitionment, prepared independently of that made by Gregg with Verrue's assistance, differed only in minor details from that of Gregg's. The award was based on these two plans, as Johnson's plan was found to be, in the opinion of the other two partitioners, unsatisfactory. The court also found:

> "That the award actually made was the product of individual judgment and study of said Warren R. Porter and Wellington Gregg, Jr."

It cannot be doubted that the partitioners, in the performance of their duties, represented the parties in a fiduciary capacity. They were selected because of the confidence the parties reposed in their personal integrity, discretion, and ability, and were intrusted with special powers of agency. There is abundant reason why this trust should not be delegated. Yet it has been said:

> "But it is entirely proper for arbitrators, in a case requiring it, to obtain from disinterested persons of acknowledged skill such information and advice in reference to technical questions submitted to them as may be necessary to enable them to come to correct conclusions, provided that the award is the result of their own judgment after obtaining such information." 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 310.

See, also, Simons v. Mills, 80 Cal. 118, 22 Pac. 25; Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 383, 25 L. Ed. 855; Emery v. Wase, 5 Ves. Jr. 846, 31 Eng. Rep. 889.

With equal force, similar comment may be made regarding partitioners in the situation presented here.

[9] The other point made to the effect that the award is void is based upon the fact that both Porter and Gregg were guests of the plaintiff while they were on the property making their investigations, and that Porter, at least, discussed with her the matter of the proposed partitionment prior to the time that the award was made. The partitioners both denied that either of them was in any manner influenced in making the award by any entertainment provided or courtesy shown by the plaintiff. This was the finding of the court. It is evident that such conduct on the part of the partitioners selected to divide the land in which the plaintiff was directly interested should be scrutinized with care. But we think the facts here are insufficient to even raise the suggestion that the two persons were prejudiced against the defendant by the hospitality of the plaintiff, or that the fairness of their award was in any way affected by it. The finding of the court cannot therefore be disturbed. Were they to be regarded as arbitrators our conclusion might be otherwise in view of such authorities as Grosvenor v. Flint, 20 R. I. 21, 37 Atl. 304, and Robinson v. Shanks, 118 Ind. 125, 20 N. E. 713, for arbitrators are clothed with much of the dignity and attributes of courts, and must exercise their authority with the utmost propriety and caution until they have completely executed their trust. But partitioners do not exercise judicial functions in the same sense as arbitrators. They are, as we have seen, special agents of the parties, rather than quasi judicial officers. What is said here, however, does not necessarily apply to referees appointed by a court to divide or partition property between the litigants before it. In the absence of proof of partiality, or circumstances from which partiality may be inferred, the award must be upheld.

The defendant contends that the findings of the court that the "arbitrators" were selected because of their skill and experience, and that they did inform themselves as to the quality, quantity, improvements, and values of the property, are not sustained by the evidence, but from what has been said it is clear that the contention is without merit.

[10] 5. The final objection, that the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance because there was no proof that the award was as to the defendant just and reasonable, is equally untenable. The evidence supporting the award is full and complete, consisting, as it does, not only of various maps, testimony by the partitioners and various experts, but in addition the court personally viewed the property. While there is some conflict in the evidence, and although it may be claimed that many of the facts testified to support the defendant's argument that the land awarded the plaintiff, notwithstanding the owelty, was worth more than that awarded the defendant, the court has found otherwise, and we cannot disturb that finding. The lower court, in fact, has resolved the mass of evidence in favor of the plaintiff, and has satisfied itself that the award was fair, just, and equitable. Moreover, the contracts, by their express terms, provide that the award shall be binding upon the parties, and it is admitted in the answer that the contracts themselves were just and reasonable. The provision reads:

> "The said parties further mutually covenant and agree each with and to the other that forthwith upon the making by the said arbitrators of the partition and award herein provided to be made by them each will execute and deliver to the other a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the portion of the above-described lands so awarded to such other, and will receive from such other party a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the portion of the above-described lands so awarded to her, and shall do such other things as shall be necessary and proper to carry into force and effect the said award. The award of the said arbitrators shall be in writing signed by said arbitrators or by a majority of them, and the determination of any two of said arbitrators upon any of the matters herein submitted to them shall be binding, and the said award may be enforced by either of the parties hereto by proper judicial proceedings."

Inasmuch as there is no showing that the partition was unfairly made, or that the partitioners were guilty of fraud, the award cannot be inquired into for alleged mistakes in drawing conclusions from the facts before them, and the parties must be held to the terms of their agreements. See Utah Construction Co. v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 162 Pac. 631; Dore v. Southern Pac. Co., 163 Cal. 182, 196, 124 Pac. 817.

SLOSS, J. I dissent. Without regard to other points made, I think it should be held that the trial court erred in enforcing the award, made, as it was, by the arbitrators without giving the defendant notice of any hearing, or the opportunity to be heard or to introduce evidence. It appears that Messrs. Porter, Johnson, and Gregg made independent examinations of the property, and prepared separate plans for partitioning the land. The differences between Porter's plan and that of Gregg were harmonized at conferences between them. All of this consumed a number of months, during which there was some informal discussion between counsel for the two parties with reference to the proposed partition, but no agreement was ever reached. Finally, on February 24, 1910, Mr. Gregg addressed a letter to the defendant, Miss Gonzalez, and Charles W. Slack, Esq., her attorney, informing them, on behalf of his colleagues and himself, that a meeting of the arbitrators would be held on the 25th day of February, 1910, at his (Gregg's) office. It is interesting to note that at this time the arbitrators entertained the view that the granting to the parties of a hearing was, if not a matter of strict legal right, at least within the proprieties of the situation. Mr. Gregg's letter concluded with these words:

> "If you desire to be heard further in the said matter, please be present 11 o'clock."

At the time and place specified Mr. Slack appeared on behalf of Miss Gonzalez, stated, in effect, that she was dissatisfied with the proposed partition, and requested an opportunity to present evidence to show that a division of the lands on the basis which had been suggested would not be equal, and would be unjust to Miss Gonzalez. Notwithstanding this request, made in answer to their own invitation, Messrs. Porter and Gregg determined that no evidence should be heard, and proceeded at once to sign the award which had been prepared.

If the agreement of July 19th provided for an arbitration, it is plain—and this is conceded by the majority opinion—that the arbitrators could not render a valid award without giving to each of the parties notice of a hearing and an opportunity to present evidence. These rights are of the very essence of an arbitration. Curtis v. Sacramento, 64 Cal. 102, 28 Pac. 108; 5 C. J. 84.

> "There are two time-honored rules in relation to arbitrators—one that courts will not enforce an agreement to submit to arbitration, or in other words, that it can be revoked; and the other that arbitrators must give notice of their sessions so as to afford the parties a right to be heard. These rules rest upon the same idea, viz. that an arbitration is a substitute for proceedings in court. It being considered against sound policy to allow parties to deprive themselves of their right of resort to the courts, agreements to that effect are not binding so long as they are executory; but if the parties choose to resort to other tribunals, such tribunals are held to the more important rules which govern courts in their proceedings." M. E. Church v. Seitz, 74 Cal. 287, 291, 15 Pac. 839.

Not every difference of opinion between parties is, however, a proper subject for arbitration. A contract by which the value of property is, for the purposes of the contract, to be fixed by designated persons, is not a submission to arbitration. M. E. Church v. Seitz, supra; Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 124 Pac. 817. But the agreement in the present case goes far beyond this. The question submitted for determination was not merely one of valuation or appraisement. It involved the partition of lands owned in common and the allotment to each of the parties of a portion of the land in severalty. The result of the arbitration was to divest each party of title to a part of the premises, and to vest sole ownership thereof in the other. Such partition is a proper subject for the determination of a court, and we see no reason for holding that, when it is committed to the determination of persons selected by the parties, the resulting proceeding does not constitute a true arbitration.

It is said that there was no controversy between the parties, and therefore no basis for a submission to arbitration. The court found that, when the parties entered into the second agreement, "no difference or dispute existed between them, nor had they themselves made any attempt to divide the properties therein mentioned between themselves." No doubt, the existence of a controversy or dispute is a prerequisite to a submission to arbitration. 5 C. J., 27. But this does not mean that actual litigation between the parties shall have been commenced or threatened, or that they must have engaged in an acrimonious quarrel. It is enough if either of them asserts a right which requires judicial ascertainment and enforcement. For the purposes of the rule, the right of cotenants who have not agreed upon a division of their property to have the same partitioned presents a sufficient controversy to furnish a basis for submission and award. Brown v. Wheeler, 17 Conn. 345, 44 Am. Dec. 550. Section 1281 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "Persons capable of contracting may submit to arbitration any controversy which might be the subject of a civil action between them. * * *"

If a submission to arbitration has its essential basis in a controversy, so, too, does a civil action between parties presuppose a controversy which furnishes the occasion for setting the judicial power in motion. The "controversy" contemplated by section 1281 is one which "might be the subject of a civil action." A complete case for partition by civil action is made out when "several cotenants hold and are in possession of real property," and any one of them desires a partition. Code Civ. Proc. § 752; De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 329, 87 Am. Dec. 81. Each cotenant is entitled to demand partition as a matter of right. Freem. Cot. & Part. § 424. It is not necessary that the other cotenants or any of them shall have objected to a partition. It is enough that the parties in interest have not agreed upon a division between themselves. See Frankfurth v. Steinmeyer, 113 Wis. 195, 203, 89 N. W. 148. That they had not so agreed in this case is apparent from the very fact of their entering into the agreement for submission.

Section 1281, Code of Civil Procedure, after excluding from arbitration questions of title to real property in fee or for life, goes on to provide that:

> "This qualification does not include questions relating merely to the partition or boundaries of real property."

This is, in effect, a declaration that the partition of real property is a proper subject for arbitration. And such appears to be the view taken by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin under a similar statute. McCord v. Flynn, 111 Wis. 78, 86 N. W. 668; Frankfurth v. Steinmeyer, 113 Wis. 195, 89 N. W. 148.

The right to notice and hearing may, no doubt, be waived. But we find nothing in the conduct of the appellant or in the language of her agreement which can support a finding of such waiver. The agreement itself is silent on the subject. If the parties contracted for a submission to arbitration, properly so called, the right to notice and hearing are implied, unless expressly waived by the terms of the submission. Curtis v. Sacramento, 64 Cal. 102, 106, 28 Pac. 108.

> "A right so valuable to the parties and so essential to the accomplishment of justice should not, in any case where the language upon which the claim of waiver is based is doubtful or equivocal, be held to have been surrendered. Nothing short of plain and clear words should be considered sufficient for that purpose." Hart v. Kennedy, 47 N. J. Eq. 51, 61, 20 Atl. 29; 5 C. J. 84.

For these reasons, I believe that the decree enforcing the award should not be sustained.

NORTHWESTERN PAC. R. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1917. On Application for Rehearing, Feb. 26, 1917.)

1. Master and Servant ⚷371—Workmen's Compensation Act—Injuries Covered.

To justify an award to the widow and minor children of a deceased employé, it must be established that the death resulted from accidental personal injury sustained by the employé arising out of and in the course of his employment.

2. Master and Servant ⚷405(4)—Workmen's Compensation Act—Injuries Covered—Evidence.

Evidence held to show deceased freight traffic clerk was not injured in the course of employment, so that an award of compensation to his widow and minor children was improper.

3. Master and Servant ⚷375(2) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Injuries Covered—"Course of Employment."

A local freight traffic clerk who was sent to inspect the books at another station, and who while on his way to such station descended from the train when another individual was injured, thereby departed from the course of his employment, and when he was killed by the train his widow was not entitled to compensation.

In Bank. Petition for writ of review by the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the widow and minor children of Charles A. Bowdish, a deceased employé of petitioner. Award annulled.

On application for rehearing. Opinion modified.

Stanley Moore and Elliott Johnson, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Charles A. Bowdish was in the employ of the petitioner as chief clerk of its freight auditing department. His duties, as the title of his position indicates, were clerical, and for the most part were performed in the city and county of San Francisco, where is located the main office of the company. The company also employed traveling agents, who inspected and corrected the books of local freight agents, and instructed them in the proper keeping thereof. Occasionally Mr. Bowdish was called upon to perform like work. In February, 1914, it appeared that the local agent of the company at Ukiah, a city on one of its lines of railway, was experiencing difficulty in making up his books of account, and Mr. Bowdish was instructed to go to Ukiah, over the railroad of petitioner, and there to aid the local agent in overcoming his bookkeeping difficulties. Mr. Bowdish, in the performance of his duty, left San Francisco in the afternoon of September 14th. In its progress his train arrived at a station known as Asti at about 6:30 p. m. In was dark and raining. As the train was leaving Asti station one Hagemeyer attempted to board it, slipped, fell, and was seriously injured. The train was immediately brought to a stop and aid given to the injured man. In rendering this aid Mr. Hagemeyer was placed upon a stretcher at the scene of his accident, and the train was backed down to that point so that the stretcher could be lifted and placed in the baggage car. This having been done, the conductor and his brakeman shouted the warning signals to the passengers, who had gathered about the scene of the accident, to embark as the train was about to start. The engineer gave the customary signals, the passengers and trainmen boarded the train, and the train got under headway. As it was thus leaving the station for the second time, a brakeman who was standing on the rear platform of the first passenger coach following the baggage car, prepared to close the vestibule. He heard a noise on the steps below him, and looking down noticed a large heavy man attempting to jump aboard the moving train. His hands slipped from the side bar, and before the train could be stopped this man had fallen between the two cars and was so badly injured that he died almost immediately. This man was Charles A. Bowdish. Application by his widow and minor children was made to the Industrial Accident Commission for an award on account of the death thus sustained. An award was granted and petitioner has sued out this writ of review.

[1] The facts above stated are not in controversy. To justify any award it must be established that the death resulted "from accidental personal injury sustained by the employé, arising out of and in the course of his employment." Petitioner contends: First, that no word of evidence establishes this fundamental proposition; and, second, that the findings, in so far as they declare to this effect, are wholly unsupported by the evidence. The findings of the commission upon this point are as follows:

> "On the day in question the deceased had been ordered by his employer to proceed to Ukiah for the purpose of checking up the accounts at that station, and in pursuance of such order he was riding on a train of the defendant; his transportation for that purpose having been supplied by the defendant. Just as the train left Asti, it ran over and injured a man, and when it stopped, on account of such accident, the deceased alighted from the train, and without orders or request from the conductor or train crew. Upon signal being given by the conductor for the train to proceed, said deceased, after the train had started, attempted to board the same, and in some manner his hold slipped and he fell under the wheels, and was almost instantly killed.
> "That the act of said employé in alighting from the train as aforesaid was a natural and reasonable act upon the part of any person traveling upon business of an employer, and was not such a departure from the course of the duties of his employment as to take him outside of the protection given by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act to employés traveling upon the business of their employment; further that the act of the deceased in alighting from the train, thereby to be available in case his services should be useful, was a portion of his implied duties as an employé of the defendant, and therefore that said accident happened while said employé was performing a service growing out of, incidental to and in the course of his employment.
> "That the act of the deceased employé in boarding the train after the same had started, but while still moving at a moderate speed, was not in violation of any orders or instructions of the defendant, and did not constitute more than ordinary negligence."

The determinative findings upon which the award was based and over which this controversy arises are those set forth in the two last paragraphs above quoted. It becomes necessary to consider seriatim the statements of fact therein contained. The first of these statements, in so far as it declares that it was a natural and reasonable act for the deceased to have alighted from the train under the indicated circumstances, calls for little comment. It is quite natural and quite usual for a passenger thus to alight where he knows that a human being has sustained injury, whether the motive which prompts him be one of curiosity, or humanity, or of a commingling of the two. The further declaration to the effect that the act of alighting "was not such a departure from the course of the duties of his employment" as to take the employé out of the provisions of the act is, of course, but a conclusion of law, which will be considered in the discussion to follow. It is sufficient here to point out that the statement seems to imply or admit that his act in alighting was outside of his duties and a departure therefrom. But, singularly enough, this is negatived by the statement immediately following, to the effect (though here again the finding is not direct but is made by way of implication) that in alighting he was actually performing a duty to his employer, although but an implied duty, and that therefore the "accident happened while said employé was performing a service growing out of or incidental to and in the course of his employment."

The transcript of evidence will be searched in vain to discover one word arising to the dignity of evidence, to establish the statement that the deceased alighted from the train "to be available in case his services should be useful," or that if he did that it was any part of his express or implied duties as an employé of the defendant so to do. The testimony of the president and general manager of the road was taken at great length. That testimony is positive and uncontradicted that there was no rule, written or unwritten, and no custom, whereby employés riding upon a train other than and outside of the train crew were called upon or expected to enter into an investigation in case of an accident, to secure the names of witnesses, or to perform any like service. He says:

> "Such duties are entirely confined to the conductor of the train, or special agent, or one of his authorized assistants, or one of our railroad policemen who might be on the train. The conductor has authority to call upon any other employé that may be there for assistance, but it is not considered their duty to volunteer, nor is there any obligation on their part so to do. * * * Furthermore, the conductor or special agent or other official whose duties are naturally such matters would consider it an interference and likely to prove a mix-up."

Moreover, in case of an injury such as this, so far from the rules, customs, or desires of the company being that an outside employé should busy himself over the matter, the company objected—

> "to the extent that he might interfere with efficient service that is being rendered by employés whose direct duty it is to do so. * * * Our conductors and trainmen carry in their pockets a card which says to keep the public away and allow two or three men, or one or two men, who can render assistance."

This is "ordinarily the train crew." It might be "the engine crew." Asked if it was not a fact that his company considered it "a meritorious effort upon the part of any employé, even an employé who was not a member of the crew, rendering assistance to the crew and to the conductor at the time that an accident happens en route," the record shows the following:

> "It is entirely a matter of circumstances and conditions. If we had an employé who was standing on the platform and who saw a passenger fall and could reach a hand out and help him, we would expect him to do it."

Still further in this connection the witness is asked the following:

> "I want to ask you if it isn't a fact that if such a thing is done at any time that you consider it a meritorious effort or endeavor on the part of the employé? This refers to any person injured at all. I am referring to an employé who is not a member of the crew and who renders assistance to a person who is injured en route, if you do not consider that a meritorious act on the part of the employé? A. Absolutely."

Again asked:

"If the conductor and members of the crew are rendering assistance to an injured person and are not in a position to obtain the names of witnesses and facts concerning the accident, wouldn't you expect the employé to render whatever service he could in this particular matter?"

—the witness answered:

"I would expect him to render service to the injured party, not to the company."

Repeatedly was the witness subjected to interrogatories dealing with supposititious cases manifestly designed to secure a statement lending color to the proposition that the deceased had alighted from the train in the performance of his duty to render service to the injured man. In every instance the witness denied such to be a part of the employment, making answer in varied form, but always to the following effect:

"I would simply say that, in so far as the man is concerned, if he was a man who was in an entirely different line of service, and traveling as a passenger, there would be no obligation on him unless called upon."

In this case it will be noted that there is no finding either that he was called upon or that he rendered any service; the finding being merely that he alighted so as to be "available in case his services should be useful." It would require a repetition of many pages of this evidence to show the persistency with which the endeavor was made to secure the desired evidence from the witness. But one page of it, as it is a page relied upon by respondent to the writ, in support of the finding may be quoted:

"Q. In a case where a passenger falls off a train or slips off a train and is injured—I am asking you to assume such a case without respect to your opinion concerning this particular case—wouldn't you consider it, and do you not consider it, a meritorious service upon the part of any employé of the company upon the train to render assistance as best he can to the injured party? A. I would think that it would be— I would consider it his duty as a man to render any assistance that he could. Q. It is the desire of the company, is it not, to have the injured party treated in the best way possible? A. Absolutely. Q. I will ask you, then, if it is not a fact that the company would consider it the duty of the employé where he was in a position to give better aid to the injured party who falls off the train or slips off the train than the crew is in a position to give such assistance? The company in its desire to give first aid and the best treatment possible to the injured party to a party falling off the train considers it a duty of an employé on the train to do whatever he can towards giving that kind of assistance? A. If the man happens to be the nearest to the injured man, as I said, and he can render that assistance more rapidly than any other person on the train, the same as would a passenger or anyone else, it would be his duty as a man to do it. Q. If a passenger and an employé of the company were in a like position concerning the matter, wouldn't you consider it more incumbent upon your employé to do it than you would the passenger? A. I would consider it more incumbent; yes."

Another witness was Mr. Love, a traveling auditor of the company. Like interrogatories were put to him. The answers were the same in substance as those given by Mr. Palmer, the president of the company. Thus he is asked:

"You know, do you not, that the company, the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, and every other company, wants its employés to act in a humane manner after an accident happens? A. Yes, sir; I should naturally expect that. * * * It would be quite natural for anybody to offer their services to the conductor. If I was on a train probably I would offer my services for the relief of the injured only if humane impulse prompted me—prompted by humane impulse only. Q. Suppose you were on a train at Asti station. Suppose the train started up and a passenger getting on the train is injured, and you are in a position to give them aid, irrespective of whether the conductor is also in a position to give that party aid. I would ask you if you would not, under the circumstances, leave your seat in the train and get off and administer what aid you could to the injured party? A. Yes."

And again:

"Q. In fact, you know, do you not, that the company employé is expected to render what assistance he can in the matter, and this rule or these rules, and all other regulations of the company that you know of are dictated for the purpose of giving better aid to the injured party? A. That is right."

Here in fullness has been set forth all the evidence quoted in respondent's brief as supporting this finding. Even as detached from its context, it shows no conflict whatsoever with the direct and positive statements of these witnesses touching the duties of such an employé, and read with the context, it leaves not even the shadowiest ground for argument that the witnesses meant other than to declare what a man, actuated by the impulse of humanity—a passenger as well as an outside employé—might do under the supposititious conditions presented by the questions.

The utmost that was elicited was that it would have been the duty of the deceased to have assisted if his services had been requisitioned by the conductor in charge of the train. It is not contended that the deceased was requested to help. To the contrary, the direct and positive testimony of the conductor and train crew is that they themselves, and they themselves alone, without asking assistance of any, promptly and efficiently rendered aid to the injured man. And in thus stating that there is no conflict in the evidence, the testimony of Hoyle, a passenger upon the train, has not been overlooked. Hoyle does not testify, as respondent states, that "neither the conductor nor any other member of the crew took part in the relief work," and that "Mr. Bowdish took charge of the situation." Mr. Hoyle's testimony is this:

Upon the occasion of the last stopping of the train which preceded the accident to the deceased, Hoyle's wife, who was a passenger with him upon the train, looked out of the car window, saw that some one had been injured, and said that she believed it was Hagemeyer. "Of course, he is the man whom my wife and I both have known for 20 years. I said, 'I will look and see.'" He took for his post of observation a platform of the car and stood there after the vestibule had been opened and others had debarked. He "had a fair view of the body lying on the ground, and saw it was Hagemeyer. The conductor and the brakeman were on the ground. It was, I should judge perhaps, roughly estimating, 15 or 25 minutes before anything apparently was done, any more than people simply standing around, watching the man lying on the ground. In the meantime there was some one, I don't know who he was, a rather chunky built man, seemed to be taking an interest in what was going on, and apparently endeavoring to direct the movements of different ones. He was in civilian's clothes. He, as I recall it, made the suggestion that they better get a cot to put this man Hagemeyer on, and soon a cot was brought, I suppose from the baggage car, and the body was lifted onto the cot, and then the train was backed up, and of course when the train backed up he passed out of sight." The witness did not know Mr. Bowdish. "The color of his clothes [of the man last injured who was Bowdish], as near as I could say, was practically the same [as those worn by the man who, as he recalled it, made the suggestion that they better get the cot]; in fact, it struck me when I went back to the rear of the train after Bowdish had been run over that it was the same man whom I had seen directing the movements, although I could not say that it was."

Furthermore, testifies the witness:

> "I would not state positively he was the same person. He was apparently dressed in the same clothes and about the same size."

This, we repeat, does not rise to the dignity of evidence, and that without regard to the fact that he "roughly estimates" the time as from 15 to 25 minutes after the train stopped before it started again, while all of the trainmen, whose duty it was to note this time, placed the total lapse as between 3 minutes and 5, and without regard to the additional fact that they performed their duties of obtaining a stretcher, placing the man upon it, backing the train up, and putting a man in the baggage car, without suggestion from any other person and without invoking the aid of any other person. Finally, it is notable in this connection that the findings of the commission, which are made as favorable as possible in support of the award, are silent upon the matter of Hoyle's testimony that Bowdish took charge or gave directions, or did any single act in aid of the injured man; the sole finding in this regard being put in the form of a fact, inferentially stated, that Bowdish alighted from the train "to be available in case his service should be useful."

[2, 3] But in addition to this, and accepting this statement as a supported finding of fact, and with it the further statement that his action in alighting from the train "was a portion of his implied duties as an employé," there remains a consideration equally determinative against the validity of this award. The findings proceed to say that, because he alighted in the performance of an implied duty, "therefore that said accident happened while the said employé was performing services growing out of, incidental to, and in the course of his employment." This, of course, is but a conclusion. Up to this point the findings have not declared upon the exact act which Bowdish was performing when he met his death—the act of endeavoring to climb on board a moving train. That is covered by the next declaration:

> That the act of the deceased "in boarding the train after the same had started, but while still moving at a moderate speed, * * * did not constitute more than ordinary negligence. * * * And said employé was not intoxicated at the time of said accident, and therefore that said accident was not caused by the willful misconduct or intoxication of such employé."

Heretofore in our decisions it has been frequently pointed out that the language of our law justifying an award only when an employé is performing services "growing out of and in the course of his employment" is taken from the earlier English act upon the same subject, and under familiar principles was adopted with the construction which the courts of that country had put upon that language. A consideration of the English adjudications will show, first, that upon principle it cannot be said that the accident here occurred while the deceased was performing service either growing out of or incidental to or in the course of his employment. Furthermore, a reading of those cases will disclose that not only upon principle, but upon adjudications presenting the precise question of an employé boarding a moving car under circumstances such as this, it has been uniformly held that injuries thus sustained are not within the purview of the law. Some of these cases have heretofore been considered in Ocean Accident & Guarantee Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 159 Pac. 1041. Others to the same effect are Anderson v. Fife Coal Co., S. C. 8, 4, Scott. L. R. 3, 3 B. W. Comp. Cas. 539; Fletcher v. The Duchess, A. C. 671, 81 L. J. K., B. (N. S.) 33; 55 Sol. Jo. 598, 4 B. W. Comp. Cas. 317, 105 L. T. (N. S.) 121; Losh v. Evans, 51 Week. Rep. 243, 18 Times L. R. 142; Hendry v. Caledonian Ry. Co., S. C. 732. The proposition is as stated in 1 Dresser, Employer's Liability, § 104:

> "When a servant of his own accord and without the direction of his master steps outside the scope of his employment, whether on the master's business or his own, the master owes him no duty as to the dangers he encounters and is not liable for any injury received."

And the particular principle clearly applicable to the case at bar is that an employé, even when in the performance of his duty, may not impose upon his employer any greater risk and responsibility than that inhering in the character of the duty itself. Thus to illustrate: An employé engaged in and about machinery, where a part of his duty is to keep that machinery clean and in running order, while in the performance of that duty may carelessly become entangled in moving cogs, and recover. A traveling man, using a railway train with ordinary precautions and injured by a collision would be granted a recovery. But if that same traveling man, seeking to catch a train to go to another station, still under his employment, should attempt to board a moving train, this being no part of his instructions and no part of his duty, he has added to his vocation perils not contemplated in the contract of employment, and for injuries sustained to him by reason of this added risk the employer is not liable. Such is the case of Wemyss Coal Co. v. Symon, 49 S. L. R. 921, 6 B. W. C. C. p. 298, where a messenger boy, given money to buy his ticket to travel to a certain destination, undertook to board a slowly moving tram car and was injured. It is said:

> "No question of serious or willful misconduct arises in the case. The sole question in the case is whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment."

It was held that no order and that no orderly performance of his duty compelled him to take the risk of mounting the moving car, and that in doing so he was "willfully taking an outside risk not incident to the reasonable requirements of duty." Such also is the case of Jibb v. Chadwick, 8 B. C. C. 152, where a workman's regular course of employment compelled him to travel on trains. He was furnished by his employer with a season ticket enabling him so to do. He was expected to return to Rotherham and report at his employer's office at 6 p. m. each day. Arriving at the station at Sheffield he attempted to board a train while in motion, this train being the last train which would bring him to his place of service on time. He fell and suffered injury, and the unanimous holding was:

> That in attempting to enter the train while in motion "the workman exposed himself to an additional risk by doing an unauthorized and illegal act, which was not in any way incidental to his employment, and that therefore the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment."

For these reasons, it follows that the award must be annulled, and it is adjudged accordingly.

On Application for Rehearing.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and SHAW, LAWLOR, and SLOSS, JJ. The judgment annulling the award is sufficiently supported by what is said in the opinion on the question first discussed, viz.: Whether or not the deceased was acting in the course of his employment in alighting from the train or at any time thereafter. The conclusion that in alighting from the train, and in what occurred thereafter, the deceased was not performing a service growing out of, incidental to, or in the course of his employment disposes of the case, and renders unnecessary the decision on the further question discussed, viz., whether, assuming that the deceased was in alighting from the train and in what he did thereafter acting in the scope of his employment, he did not step without such scope when he attempted to board the train while it was moving, with the result that solely because of such attempt, the consequent accident did not arise out of or in the course of his employment. Upon that one question we are not entirely satisfied as to the correctness of the views expressed in the opinion, and, without expressing any contrary view, we prefer to leave the question undecided in this case, by withdrawing, as we do, our assent to the portion of the opinion dealing therewith.

JOHNSON v. CLARK et al. (L. A. 3884.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑53—"OPTIONAL CONTRACT" TO PURCHASE MINING CLAIM.

A contract for the purchase of mining claims, $100 to be paid by the buyer on execution of the contract as part payment, $1,000 to be paid "on acceptance" within 30 days from date, $1,000 in 30 days thereafter, etc., was an optional agreement; when, by the terms of an agreement, the owner of property binds himself to sell on specified terms, and leaves it discretionary with the other party to the contract whether he will or will not buy, it constitutes simply an "optional contract."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 147, 148.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Optional Contracts.]

2. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑53—OPTION CONTRACT—ACCEPTANCE.

Where plaintiff understood that defendant, optional buyer of plaintiff's mining claims, was going on the property with his employé solely to examine and prospect to determine whether he would accept or not, the fact that defendant went into possession of the property did not amount to an acceptance.

3. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑53—OPTIONAL CONTRACT—ACCEPTANCE.

Where the holder of an option contract for the purchase of mining claims agreed to convey to each of three persons an undivided one-fourth interest in the property, making no present conveyance, but only agreeing to do so in the future, and not assigning his optional contract or any interest in it, but agreeing that, if he closed the optional contract to purchase from plaintiff, he would convey three-fourths of the property acquired under it to the three persons, the action of one of the three persons in paying plaintiff, the optional seller, $1,000, and executing notes, was not an acceptance of the optional contract.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by J. S. Johnson against W. L. Clark and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. B. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Neighbours & Sproul and Chas. W. Hoag, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action to enforce specific performance of a contract made by plaintiff with defendant Clark on November 4, 1911, relative to the purchase of certain placer mining property in Humboldt county, in this state. The other defendants were made defendants with Clark under allegations in the complaint that they had acquired an interest from defendant Clark in the contract of purchase subsequent to its execution. The complaint, among other allegations, sets up the contract with Clark hereafter particularly referred to, alleged an assignment by Clark to the other defendants of an interest in said contract; payment by defendant Neighbours on behalf of himself and all the other defendants of $1,000 specified in the contract to be paid; failure on the part of defendants to further comply with the terms of the contract; and full compliance by plaintiff on his part. No point is made of the sufficiency of the complaint, so that nothing further of its allegations need be stated. Aside from an answer by all the defendants denying the allegations of the complaint, the defendant Maulhardt (though plaintiff alleged that defendant Neighbours paid it for the benefit of all the defendants), filed a cross-complaint seeking a judgment against plaintiff for the repayment of the $1,000 alleged to have been paid by him to plaintiff and the return to him of two promissory notes which he alleged he had executed and deposited with plaintiff under an alleged verbal and contingent agreement made by him with plaintiff.

The court rendered judgment for all the defendants for their costs and in favor of defendant Maulhardt on his cross-complaint for the repayment to him of the $1,000 and the return of the promissory notes referred to. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The findings, with a recital of some of the evidence, will sufficiently present the points on appeal. The court found that plaintiff entered into an optional contract with defendant Clark on November 4, 1911, for the sale and purchase of the placer mining claims heretofore referred to on the following terms: $100 paid by defendant Clark on the execution of the contract as part payment for the claims. The price was $6,100, and payable as follows: $1,000 on acceptance within 30 days from date; $1,000 in 30 days thereafter, and $1,000 in 60 days from date of second payment; $2,000 in 9 months and $1,000 in one year, at 7 per cent. per annum. The gravel worked from said mines to pay 25 per cent. of the proceeds to plaintiff to apply on said notes for the deferred payments which were to be secured by mortgage on the property. Title to be perfect; deed to be executed by plaintiff to Clark, or his assigns, on or before February 2, 1912, together with an abstract showing a merchantable title, provided, however, that the payment of $3,000 is paid at said date, but if not paid on or before February 2, 1912, then the contract to be of no effect, and in that event the said $100 to be retained by plaintiff as liquidated damages.

Upon the issue tendered under an allegation of the complaint that Clark had assigned an interest in the said agreement to the other defendants Neighbours, Maulhardt, and Grant, and that on January 18, 1912, Maulhardt, one of the assignees of Clark, together with Neighbours and Grant, pursuant to the terms of the optional agreement, paid plaintiff the sum of $1,000 and deposited in his favor two promissory notes in bank, the court found, and the evidence shows, that an optional agreement was made by plaintiff and Clark at the date alleged; that Clark had never assigned his interest, or any part thereof, in said optional agreement to all or either of the defendants; that a transaction between defendants Maulhardt and Neighbours and plaintiff of January 18, 1912, was had; that at that time Maulhardt made payment of $1,000 to plaintiff and deposited with plaintiff two promissory notes, but that said transaction was all made, had, done, and performed by said parties in the absence of defendant Clark and subject to his approval; and that Clark, upon being notified forthwith of said verbal agreement between plaintiff and defendants Maulhardt and Neighbours and the payment of said $1,000 and the depositing of said notes, immediately refused to approve said agreement and repudiated all the acts done and performed thereunder. The evidence shows that in the same notice of repudiation of February 14, 1912, Clark also notified plaintiff that he would not take the property.

An additional finding was that plaintiff did not execute a deed conveying said real property to Clark, nor did he cause an abstract of said property to be made or tender the same to defendant Clark. It may be said here, however, that at the time of the transaction of January 18, 1912, between plaintiff and Maulhardt and Neighbours when the $1,000 was paid, plaintiff executed a deed to Clark and to Grant, Maulhardt, and Neighbours conveying to them an equal undivided one-fourth interest each in said mining property and deposited said deed in escrow in the bank to be delivered on compliance on the part of defendants with the terms of the agreement.

The court further found that Clark, and Grant as the employé of the latter, went into possession of the real property towards the end of November, 1911, with the consent of plaintiff; that Clark remained in possession by such consent until the latter part of March, 1912; that neither the defendant

Clark nor any person acting under his authority or by his consent exercised the right to purchase granted under the terms of said optional agreement between plaintiff and Clark.

It appears from the evidence that prior to the commencing of this action plaintiff made a written demand on Clark and the other defendant (on the theory that they were the assignees of Clark under the said optional agreement) that they make the payments and perform the other terms of the contract and take the property, a demand to which they gave no attention, and plaintiff thereupon commenced this action.

Having presented these matters with sufficient fullness to discuss the points made by appellant, we will proceed to their consideration.

[1] He contends, first, that the agreement between himself and Clark was more than a mere option for the purchase of these mining claims, but that, even if it was not, the subsequent acts of Clark and Grant in entering into possession of the property with the consent of plaintiff and working it constituted an acceptance which changed the optional contract into a contract of sale between plaintiff and Clark subject to specific performance as such. But it is quite clear that under any fair consideration of the terms of the agreement between plaintiff and Clark it was simply an optional agreement. When by the terms of an agreement the owner of property binds himself to sell on specified terms and leaves it discretionary with the other party to the contract whether he will or will not buy, it constitutes simply an optional contract. This was all the contract involved here amounted to. Plaintiff agreed to sell to Clark on certain terms of payment. By the agreement itself as will appear in the finding first quoted, it was provided that Clark should have 30 days from the 4th of November, 1911, within which to accept its terms if he wished to do so. Subsequently this time was extended 45 days. The only effect of the agreement as far as Clark was concerned was that if he should fail or refuse to take the property he should lose his $100.

[2] Nor did the fact that Clark went into possession of the property amount to an acceptance. It was not understood by either plaintiff or Clark that it should amount to this. Plaintiff understood that Clark was going on the property with his employé Grant solely to examine and prospect it for the very purpose of determining whether he would accept it or not. This is apparent from a letter from plaintiff to Clark of January 8, 1912, while the latter was working on the property asking for some assurance that there would be no liens for labor or material "should you (Clark) conclude not to buy." True, he remained in possession, working the property, after he refused to purchase it on February 14, 1912, but it appears he did so in order to perform the annual assessment work on the claims which he had orally promised plaintiff he would. In fact, the case of plaintiff was tried on the theory that the contract between himself and Clark was an optional agreement which had subsequently been accepted, it being claimed as additional evidence in support thereof that the other defendants were assignees of Clark of an interest in this optional agreement and by right of this assignment and the written consent and understanding of Clark, one of them, Maulhardt, for the benefit of all, paid the $1,000 and executed the two promissory notes referred to in the evidence and findings, all of which, it is claimed, constituted an acceptance of the optional agreement by all the defendants.

[3] The court found against this contention, and appellant challenges the accuracy of the finding, but the evidence fully supports it. It appears therefrom as to these matters that, while it is true that an agreement was made by Clark with the other defendants the same day that this optional agreement with plaintiff was entered into, Clark nevertheless did not thereby assign or transfer to them the optional agreement or any interest in it. He agreed to convey to each an undivided one-fourth interest in the property. He made no present conveyance, but only agreed to do so in the future. He did not assign his optional contract or any interest in it. He agreed that, if he closed the optional contract to purchase with plaintiff, he would convey three-fourths of the property acquired under it to his codefendants. Until Clark exercised this option there was nothing upon which his contract with the other defendants could operate. The rights they acquired under the agreement with Clark were matters of concern only between themselves; Clark conveyed them no rights under his optional contract. That option was a matter respecting the acceptance or rejection of which the plaintiff and defendant Clark were alone directly interested.

As to the payment of the $1,000 and the delivery of the notes on January 18, 1912, by Maulhardt. Upon this date Clark and Grant were in Humboldt county at the mines. Plaintiff and the other defendants were in Los Angeles. These defendants, other than Grant, called on plaintiff on January 18th and told him of their agreement with Clark, which was the first he seems to have known of it, and as the 45 days extension which had been granted Clark was about to expire they asked for a further extension on behalf of Clark, which plaintiff refused to grant. He refused also to grant one even until the defendants could communicate with Clark, though they told him they could do nothing without consulting with Clark. Plaintiff, however, persisting in his refusal to grant any extension Maulhardt then offered to pay plaintiff $1,000 and place the notes in a bank upon the agreement with plaintiff that they (Maulhardt and Neighbours) should communicate with Clark, and if their action met with his approval the transaction should stand and the sale should go through. If Clark did not approve, then the money would be returned, as also the notes. The evidence leaves no room for question but that the court was warranted in finding that this payment of the money and the delivery of the notes it was agreed by plaintiff and the other defendants should be subject to the approval of Clark; nor can there be any question but that on learning of it defendant Clark promptly repudiated the transaction. The defendants Maulhardt and Neighbours and the plaintiff wrote to Clark of what had been done in this regard, and upon the receipt of their letters Clark immediately wrote to the defendants refusing to approve their action, and likewise wrote to plaintiff saying that he had not authorized the action of the other defendants and "would not stand for it"; that he did not want the property and refused to accept it.

As this disposes of the only points involved on the appeal that require any special consideration, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Action by Winslow P. Hyatt against A. Colkins and others. From a judgment against defendant Colkins, he appeals. Affirmed.

Otto Danaker and E. M. Barnes, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Winslow P. Hyatt and Frank S. Adams, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles. The complaint contained the usual allegations in such an action, that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the land, that defendants claimed an interest in it adverse to plaintiff, which claim was alleged to be without right, and that none of the defendants had any right or interest in the property, with the usual prayer that defendants be required to set forth their claim or interest in the property, that it should be adjudged invalid, and that the title of plaintiff was good and valid, and the defendants be barred from asserting claims to said premises adverse to plaintiff.

Defendant Colkins filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and, failing to answer, judgment was entered against him, from which he takes this appeal.

[1] Taking up his points on appeal: He contends that the court erred in overruling his demurrer. His argument is that his demurrer was well taken, because the complaint did not allege that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises when the suit was brought, and, further, that nowhere in the complaint is it stated in what the invalidity of the instrument which is said to constitute the cloud upon the title of plaintiff consists, or any facts which show its invalidity. We are at a loss to understand how, under the long-settled law of this state, the appellant can see any merit in his contentions. As to the point that the complaint does not state that the plaintiff was in the possession of the property: It was unnecessary to do so. An action to quiet title may be brought by one out of possession. In People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481 (decided in 1885), it was held on this subject that section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure (enacted in 1872) is like section 254 of the former practice act, except that since the adoption of the Code the action to quiet title may be brought by one out of possession. In Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 58 Pac. 264, in meeting a similar objection as that urged by appellant, the court said:

> "The owner of land does not have to be in possession in order * * * to maintain an action to quiet title."

See, also, Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 462, 22 Pac. 284; Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 771; Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 Pac. 517.

[2] As to the point that nothing specific is alleged in the complaint concerning the invalidity or a recital of any facts showing the invalidity of the instrument asserted to be a cloud against the title of plaintiff: It is well settled that there is no merit in such a claim. It was held directly in Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 946, that the plaintiff is not required to set forth the nature of the claim of defendant. In Rough v. Simmons, 65 Cal. 227, 3 Pac. 804, a general demurrer to a complaint like the one at bar was sustained by the trial court, and the judgment reversed in this court. Appellant cites Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Ordway, 38 Cal. 681, as sustaining his claim of the necessity of setting forth in the complaint the nature of the instrument asserted to constitute a cloud upon title. But that was an entirely different action from the one instituted here. That was an action to have a particular instrument, which was specifically pleaded and which it was asserted constituted a cloud on the title of plaintiff, declared invalid. But that class of cases is different from the case at bar. They are provided for under sections 3412 and 3413 of the Civil Code. The present action is one provided for under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The distinction in this respect in which Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Ordway, cited by appellant, is discussed, is fully pointed out in Castro v. Barry, supra, to which reference for any further enlightenment on the point is directed.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Isaack Kohn against C. E. Parent, Hugh Burns, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon and S. C. Denson, both of San Francisco, for appellants. James W. Cochrane, D. Freidenrich, and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to a certain piece of land. The defendant A. B. Kreft was trustee of the estate of Phillip Kohn in bankruptcy, plaintiff having acquired his title by deed from Phillip Kohn and wife. The other defendants appealing are judgment creditors of the insolvent. Their contention is that the deed of Phillip Kohn to his father, the plaintiff, was intended as a mortgage, to secure the payment of $10,000, and that their judgments duly docketed are valid and subsisting liens on the property subject to this mortgage, and that title to the property is in the trustee in bankrupty, subject to the mortgage and to these judgment liens.

The deed was absolute in form. The testimony of plaintiff was that he paid $10,000 for the property, and this is abundantly established by his canceled check drawn in favor of and paid to Phillip Kohn. Since the date of the deed he has occupied the property and spent over $6,000 in improvements thereon. He has continuously resided upon the property since the date of the deed, and paid all city, county, and state taxes upon it. His testimony was supported by that of his son that the transaction between himself and his father was an absolute sale. The deed to the father was executed by the son Phillip and by his then wife, Stella Kohn. She testifies that her father-in-law told her that he was going to lend the son $10,000 upon the security of the property to enable him to adjust the property disputes between the husband and the wife in the matter of their divorce suit then pending or in prospect; that her father-in-law said that the property was valued at $25,000; that he thought it was good security; that the security was so good that he was willing to loan $25,000 on the strength of it. The occasion of this conversation was the first time that she had ever spoken to her father-in-law. Called in rebuttal, he testified that he had never seen his daughter-in-law, except in court; he had never had any such conversation with her; that the property in fact was not worth what he gave his son for it; and that he gave him this money over and above the value of the property because of the son's difficulties. Further evidence was introduced to the effect that the property was assessed for but little over $2,500; that Phillip Kohn, when owner, had in vain offered it for sale to the assessor for $7,500.

[1] It scarcely needs the citation of authority in support of the statement that to establish that a deed absolute upon its face requires clear and convincing evidence thus to vary its written terms and establish that it is a mortgage. Mahony v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 30 Pac. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 39 Pac. 797; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 193, 58 Pac. 543; Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 200, 62 Pac. 473. Mrs. Kohn's testimony touching her execution of the deed, that she glanced over it, did not understand its meaning, and was told that it was a mortgage, is flatly contradicted by Mr. Cochrane, an attorney. He was not Mrs. Kohn's attorney, but was present at her execution of the deed. He denied that he made any such misrepresentations to her, and testified that it was explained to her that the instrument was a deed at the time she executed it, and that no reference whatever was made to it as being a mortgage.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by S. G. Herrington against J. M. Baker. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frederick Baker, of Los Angeles, and J. R. Gilliland, of San Diego, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was on contract. The complaint alleged that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby defendant purchased from plaintiff all the trees in the nursery of plaintiff at Glendora, Cal., which on or about July 1, 1912, should be of a specified size, it being understood that the nursery contained 8,000 trees of three different varieties of citrus fruit trees, the price being 65 cents per tree; that defendant agreed to remove all the trees from said nursery on or before July 1, 1912, and to make therefor certain payments on designated dates up to May 1, 1912, and the balance as the trees were removed from the nursery which was to be not later than July 1, 1912; that plaintiff agreed to "irrigate, cultivate and care for said nursery stock at his own expense and in a good and husbandlike manner until July 1, 1912," which the complaint alleged he had done, and, further, that he had duly performed all the conditions of the contract on his part to be performed; that on or about July 1, 1912, defendant removed all but 3,763 trees from said nursery, refused to remove any more of them, or to pay the balance of $2,604.35 due therefor under the contract, and plaintiff sued to recover that amount.

Defendant in his answer denied that plaintiff had "irrigated, cultivated and cared for said nursery stock at his own expense in a good and husbandlike manner," and as to the trees, the purchase price of which was sought in the action, alleged, among other things, that said trees had not been and are not of a kind or character referred to in said contract; that they have not been and are not up to the standard prescribed in said contract, and have not been and are not fit for the purposes of removal and for the purposes for which defendant contracted to take them.

Judgment was given the plaintiff for the amount prayed for. Defendant appeals from said judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There are but two points presented on this appeal. One pertains to a ruling against the admission of evidence; the other being that a certain finding of the court is not sustained by the evidence. The theory of the defendant under which his counsel framed his answer and attempted to present the testimony which he claims was erroneously rejected by the court was that as this contract related to certain nursery stock to be raised by plaintiff, but which was to be removed by defendant, it was the duty of the plaintiff to cultivate the said stock so as to keep it in proper condition to be removed at any time, and that he failed to do so. A witness called by defendant, aside from testifying as a witness to the condition in which he observed this nursery, was examined as an expert nursery man and asked:

> "What in your opinion would be a proper amount of water for irrigating that nursery, to keep it in proper cultivation, and in a good state or condition, during the months of May and June, for the removal of nursery trees?"

An objection to the last part of the question "to irrigate the ground sufficient for the removal of nursery trees" was made, on the ground that it was a duty which plaintiff was not required under the contract to fulfill. This objection was sustained by the court, and this is the ruling which defendant complains of, it being asserted that the ruling sprang from an erroneous construction which the court placed on the provision of the contract respecting irrigation and cultivation of the nursery stock by plaintiff.

It is insisted by appellant that the agreement on the part of plaintiff "to irrigate, cultivate and care for the nursery stock in a good and husbandlike manner until July 1, 1912," necessarily implied that the nursery stock should be kept in condition in whatever respect was necessary so as to be properly and safely transplanted when the defendant desired to remove it; that the contract was dealing with nursery stock in the possession and control of plaintiff, and, if a particular amount of irrigation was necessary to put it in proper condition of cultivation for removal by respondent, then, from the language of the contract and the subject-matter affected by it, there was an implied duty on the part of plaintiff to keep it in that condition.

We are not required to dispose of this claim of appellant as to the construction of this contract (with which respondent, however, does not agree), because our examination of the evidence in the case satisfies us that, whatever the proper construction of this provision of the contract might be, still, if it was conceded that the construction of the court respecting it as reflected by the ruling on the question asked was wrong, no injury resulted to appellant thereby. As a fact, the only matter which was contested in this case was the condition of the nursery during the months of May and June, 1912—the amount of irrigation which was necessary, not only for general good husbandlike care, but particularly for the keeping of it in a proper condition for the removal of the nursery stock—and, except as to the ruling called in question here, there was no limitation whatever put on either side from going fully into that matter. A large number of witnesses on the subject were called by appellant, as well as respondent. Both sides seem to have used their pleasure in that respect except in the single instance when appellant claims it was denied to him under the ruling of the court. The matter was very thoroughly gone into, drifting early in the trial into the particular question whether proper irrigation required that the nursery soil be kept at all times in such a wet condition that the trees might be removed by "balling" them, or only so irrigated as to permit the removal of the trees with loose roots. There were but few witnesses called who did not feel qualified to testify on the subject and did so in favor of one condition or the other being the proper one. The only apparent limitation, as we have said, which was placed on appellant, was the one asserted to have been worked by the ruling of the court. But in fact there was no limitation whatever, for it appears that, though this witness did not testify on the subject embraced in the question of defendant at the time it was asked him, nevertheless he did so later on in his testimony. He went over the ground for both sides on direct and cross examination, and stated that for the purpose of keeping the nursery in good, husbandlike care, an irrigation every 21 days would be proper, and that nursery stock would "ball" very satisfactorily up to ten days after the irrigation was had—in effect, that if removal by "balling" was contemplated, the irrigation should be made every ten days. As far as removal by "balling" or by loose roots was concerned, he testified that there was no particular method adopted by nurserymen; some preferred one system and some the other.

[1, 2] So that as the very witness who was prevented from answering the question asked in the first instance was subsequently permitted to testify freely on the subject, it is evident that the ruling of the court could not possibly have prejudiced defendant. The trial court found upon this issue of the proper condition of the nursery for the removal of the trees against the defense interposed by defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, so that, the ruling being harmless and the court having found on the issue, the only question is the further one raised by appellant as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings. On that point it is only necessary to say that, there being a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding cannot be reviewed here.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re STODDART'S ESTATE. (L. A. 4669.)

1. Pleading 🔑8(16)—Revocation of Probate—Conclusions.

In petition to revoke probate of will, mere averment that the will was induced by fraud or undue influence is a statement of a legal conclusion and of no avail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 28½.]

2. Wills 🔑155(1)—Execution—Undue Influence—Fraud.

Undue influence and fraud are separate grounds of attack upon a will, although undue influence may be exerted by means of fraudulent representations.

3. Wills 🔑155(1)—Execution—"Undue Influence."

A will is obtained by "undue influence," where improper pressure or other unfair conduct has overcome the volition of the testator and resulted in his executing a paper which represents in fact not his will but that of the person exercising the influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 375, 379.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

4. Wills 🔑278—Revocation of Probate—Undue Influence — Pleading — Sufficiency.

A petition for revocation of a probate of a will, alleging that deceased was advanced in years, blind, and infirm, that proponents resided with her and attended to her business affairs, and that she was dependent on them, and that representations made by them to her were false and made with intention of prejudicing her, with the result that such misrepresentations controlled her mind, was sufficient to raise the issue of undue influence.

5. WILLS ⟹155(5)—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE—MATTERS OF OPINION.

Conceding alleged misrepresentations to have been matters of opinion, they could yet, if designedly and unfairly used as part of a scheme to overcome the will of the testatrix, be regarded as undue influence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Eliza J. Stoddart, deceased, for the revocation of the probate of her will. Judgment dismissing the contest, and petitioners appeal. Reversed.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Gray, Barker & Bowen, Bowen & Bailie, and William A. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. A paper purporting to be the will of Eliza J. Stoddart, deceased, was admitted to probate in the superior court of Los Angeles county on January 25, 1914. The decedent was a widow and left surviving, as her sole heirs, a son, four unmarried daughters, and two married daughters. The son and the two married daughters filed a petition for revocation of the probate of the will. Demurrer to this petition was sustained, and the contestants filed an amended petition. The second pleading was also demurred to, and the demurrer sustained, whereupon the petitioners filed a second amended petition. A demurrer was again interposed, and was sustained without leave to the petitioners to amend. Thereupon the court entered judgment dismissing the contest. From this judgment the petitioners appeal.

The question for decision is whether the second amended petition states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of contest. At the time of her death, Eliza J. Stoddart had been a widow for about 40 years. She left an estate valued, according to the petition for probate, at about $160,000, and derived from the estate of her deceased husband, David Stoddart. In 1905, Mrs. Stoddart had made a will in which, after appointing as executrices her daughters, Mary Euretta and Evelyn Louise Stoddart, and bequeathing to them the sum of $10,000 for purposes not specified in the will, she gave the residue of her estate to her seven children, or the survivors of them, in equal shares. This document provided that in no case should any portion of her estate "be used in the business ventures of my daughters' husbands or son's wife, but shall remain the separate property of the child to whom given." The will now in controversy was made at Oakland on the 7th day of January, 1910. It gave to the four unmarried daughters, Mary E., Florence E., Evelyn L., and Bessie D. Stoddart, the residence occupied by the decedent with her said daughters, and certain personal effects; to each of the married daughters, Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, the sum of $5,000; to the son, Augustus W. Stoddart, the sum of $1,000, and all sums theretofore advanced to him; to Evelyn L. and Mary E. Stoddart, the sum of $10,000 in trust to pay the income thereof to Augustus W. Stoddart during his life, the principal, upon his death, to vest in the six daughters, or the survivors of them. The residue of the estate was given to such of the daughters as should survive the testatrix, in equal shares, provided that, if the married daughters, or either of them, should survive the testatrix, and not then be widows, their shares were to be held in trust, the income to be paid to said married daughters during their lives, or until widowhood. In the event that either married daughter should become a widow, the trust fund should at once vest in her. If she should die, leaving her husband surviving, her share should vest in the unmarried daughters, or the survivors of them, in equal shares; unless the unmarried daughters should all predecease their sisters, in which event the trust funds should vest in the married daughters. Mary E. and Evelyn L. Stoddart were named executrices of the will, with power in a majority of the daughters to select successors to them.

Revocation of the probate was sought on the ground of undue influence. The allegations are substantially these: After the making of the will of 1905, and prior to the execution of the will of January, 1910, Florence E., Evelyn L., and Bessie D. Stoddart frequently stated to their mother, Eliza J. Stoddart, that Augustus W. Stoddart had already received a great portion of his inheritance, and that he was entitled to but very little more from Mrs. Stoddart's estate, whereas, in fact, he had received only $4,000, and his share of the estate, if it were equally divided among the seven children, would be about $43,000; that said Florence E., Evelyn L., and Bessie D. Stoddart also stated on many occasions to the decedent that her married daughters should not receive their portion of her estate during the lifetime of their respective husbands, because said husbands were of extravagant habits and were engaged in speculative enterprises, and, if said married daughters should receive their portions, the said husbands would get the same from them, and would spend or lose the same in speculation. The said three unmarried daughters also represented to their mother on many occasions that it would be imprudent to leave any portion of her estate to any of the children of said daughters, for the reason that, if such were done, the respective fathers of the said children would get the same, and would spend or lose it in speculation. All of these representations, it is alleged, were untrue, and were made to the decedent for the purpose of prejudicing and influencing her against the petitioners and the husbands of the married daughters, so that she would not leave to the son or the married daughters as great a share of her estate as would go to any of the unmarried daughtes. Said Florence E., Evelyn L., and Bessie D. Stoddart urged these misrepresentations upon the decedent, and pressed her not to leave her property so that the husbands of her married daughters could get the shares of their wives from them, "and said decedent was unable to resist such importunity and pressure, and the same controlled her mind at the time said alleged last will was made, and without the same decedent would not have made said will." It is alleged further that, at the time these representations were made, Eliza J. Stoddart was advanced in years, and was growing blind and infirm; that her four unmarried daughters resided with her, and she depended upon them, and all of her business matters were transacted by them; that they would not permit the married daughters to talk alone with their mother on business matters. The petition alleges, on information and belief, that the decedent did not wish to change her will of 1905, and would not have changed it but for the misrepresentations made to her, as heretofore set forth, or but for the urging and importuning of her said four unmarried daughters to leave her property in the manner set forth in the will of January, 1910. If the misrepresentations had not been made, and the decedent had not been urged and importuned by her unmarried daughters, and if they had not dominated her mind, she would not have executed the will of January, 1910, and would have died leaving the will of June, 1905. There is a further allegation that at all times the mother entertained feelings of devotion and affection toward all of her children.

[1] It must be borne in mind, throughout this discussion, that we are considering the sufficiency of a pleading, and nothing else. A quite different question would be presented if the contest had been tried, and we were called upon to decide whether the evidence introduced warranted a verdict in favor of the contestants. No doubt the petition, whether based upon fraud or undue influence, must allege facts from which it can be seen that one or the other of these grounds of contest exists. The mere averment that the will was induced by fraud or by undue influence is the statement of a legal conclusion, and of no avail by itself. But certainly a pleading of any kind is required to state only ultimate facts, and need not specify in detail the evidence by which it is designed to prove those facts.

[2, 3] As we have already said, the charge sought to be made by the appellants is that the will was procured to be made by undue influence. Misrepresentations are set forth, but they are not relied on as an independent ground of contest. Undue influence and fraud are separate grounds of attack. Est. of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 117 Pac. 539. But fraud or misrepresentation may be an element of undue influence. Undue influence, in other words, may be exerted by means of fraudulent representations. Est. of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598; Est. of Ricks, supra. A will is obtained by undue influence where improper pressure, or other unfair conduct, has overcome the volition of the testator, and resulted in his executing a paper which represents, in fact, not his will, but that of the person exercising the influence over him. Est. of Ricks, supra; Est. of Snowball, supra; Est. of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252.

[4] Respective counsel have indulged in elaborate analyses of the facts alleged, and from them have drawn their opposing inferences. These arguments might appropriately be addressed to the trial court or jury after the introduction of the evidence, or to this court on appeal from a judgment revoking the probate of the will. It may well be that the petition discloses various circumstances which may be viewed as supporting the claim that the document executed by Mrs. Stoddart was the expression of her free and independent desires. It may be, too, that the facts which the appellants will be able to prove in support of the averments of their petition would not sustain a verdict against the validity of the will. But on this appeal, which raises a question of pleading alone, we can look only to the petition, and are limited to the inquiry whether it contains, within its many allegations, the statement of any facts constituting a charge of undue influence.

We find that the petition alleges that, at the time of the making of the will, Mrs. Stoddart was advanced in years, and was growing blind and infirm; that her unmarried daughters resided with her, and attended to her business affairs; and that she had become dependent upon them. It is alleged that the representations made to her regarding the claims upon her bounty of her son and her married daughters were false, and were made with the intention of prejudicing her against such son and daughters; that these misrepresentations were frequently and repeatedly made and urged upon her, and that she was unable to resist them; with the result that the misrepresentations and urgings controlled her mind at the time her will was made, and she would not have made the will without them. There are further allegations that one of the unmarried daughters was present at the time of the execution of the will, and arranged the details of its execution, and that the fact of the making of the will, although known to all of the unmarried daughters, was concealed from one of the contestants, although she was then living in the same hotel with the decedent and the respondents.

We are not prepared to say that these allegations are not sufficient to entitle the petitioners to a trial of the issue of undue influence. The pleading alleges, in effect, that the will was not "the natural result of the uncontrolled will of the testatrix." Est. of Snowball, supra. This is the ultimate test of the existence of undue influence. The petition does not state this as a mere conclusion, but sets forth, in addition, the means by which the will of the respondents was imposed upon the testatrix. These means consisted of repeated importunities and misrepresentations designed to compel, and alleged to have been effective in compelling, the execution of a will in accordance with the desires of the respondents, rather than with those of the testatrix, herself. While it is not claimed that Mrs. Stoddart lacked testamentary capacity, the fact of her advanced years and debilitated condition was material, as bearing upon her alleged inability to resist importunity and pressure of this kind. So, too, the circumstance that she was dependent upon her unmarried daughters, and was by them kept from communication with the contestants, is a statement of fact which, although not sufficient in itself to show undue influence, may be considered in connection with the other averments.

[5] The respondents argue with great earnestness that the misrepresentations set out in the petition related to matters of opinion, and that they would not be sufficient to support an attack on the ground of fraud. But conceding this, they may still, if designedly and unfairly used as part of a scheme to overcome the will of the testatrix and compel her to carry out the will of the respondents, be regarded as constituting, together with the other facts alleged, the exercise of undue influence.

We think the demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (two cases). (L. A. 4711, 4712.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑403—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—WILLFUL MISCONDUCT AS MATTER OF AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.

In proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) for compensation for death of a servant, the claimant need not establish innocence of willful misconduct on the part of the deceased workman, willful misconduct, like contributory negligence, being matter of affirmative defense, though the question of willful misconduct goes to the jurisdiction of the Accident Commission in the sense that no award may be made lawfully when the employé's willful misconduct contributed to the injury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑378—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Negligence, or lack of it, on the part of an injured employé, is not the determinative factor in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—WILLFUL MISCONDUCT.

Willful misconduct barring the right to compensation involves something more than negligence, and does not even include every violation of a rule.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—NEGLIGENCE—WILLFUL MISCONDUCT.

An inexperienced employé of a winery was not negligent in entering the suffocating atmosphere of a wine vat to clean it without lighting a candle to test the atmosphere unless he knew of the general practice to make such test, much less with willful misconduct.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑405(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — WILLFUL MISCONDUCT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation for death of an employé of a winery found in a dying condition in a wine vat, which he had been cleaning with another employé, evidence held to sustain the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that there was no such willful misconduct on the servant's part as should defeat his dependents' right to compensation.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑375(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—INJURY IN SERVICE.

An employé of a winery, overcome after going to the aid of another employé who was cleaning a wine vat, was injured while engaged in his employer's business.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑361—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—STATUS AS EMPLOYÉS.

The act of individual partners in placing the firm business under a general manager by general power of attorney authorizing him to act as such, and to receive and control the funds of the copartnership, was merely a private arrangement, not binding, as an assignment for the benefit of creditors, on the workmen employed, who did not cease to be employés of the partnership.

Certiorari to State Industrial Accident Commission.

In Bank. Two proceedings, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, by Roberto Maffia, for Maria Robusto Maffia, and by Victor Zanotti and others, to recover compensation for the deaths of Daniele Maffia and Roberto Zanotti. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and, to review the action of the Commission, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, the insurer, brings certiorari. Awards affirmed.

Gurney E. Newlin and H. W. Kidd, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. These proceedings in certiorari are taken to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation to the dependents of Daniele Maffia and Roberto Zanotti, who were asphyxiated in a wine tank while they were employed at a winery in Los Angeles. Maffia was a foreman. Zanotti was a workman under Maffia's direction.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that the men were working "upon certain wine tanks which were required to be cleaned after emptying them of wine." Regarding the usual manner of doing that kind of work the finding of the commission was as follows:

> "The custom in cleaning said tanks was for one person to work inside and one outside the tank, and that it was forbidden and contrary to the custom then in use for two persons to work inside of a tank at once, because of the danger of asphyxiation; that the custom of said employés, Maffia and Zanotti, was for Maffia to work outside the tank and Zanotti inside, while cleaning it; that there were no eyewitnesses to the accident, but that when discovered both Maffia and Zanotti were found inside of the tank they had been cleaning, in a dying condition; and that death resulted within a few minutes after their being removed."

There were further findings in the Maffia matter in the following language:

> "That it is proper and customary among winemakers before entering a vat to clean it, to test the atmosphere in the vat by a lighted candle, to determine the presence of poisonous gases; that the deceased Daniele Maffia was well acquainted with such custom and the necessity for its exercise; that no rules had been issued by the employer requiring such test to be made, and that there is no evidence to show that the deceased Roberto Zanotti had ever been instructed in the necessity of making such test; that there is no evidence to show whether or not such candle test was made by either of the deceased employés prior to entering the tank in which the accident occurred; that the evidence is therefore insufficient to establish that the death of the said Daniele Maffia was caused by willful misconduct; that no charge of intoxication contributing to said death is made by the defendants herein."

There were findings to the same effect in the case of Zanotti.

Petitioner's first contention is that recovery of compensation should have been denied because of the willful misconduct of the two men, but as a preliminary to a discussion of that point counsel for petitioner insist that proof of innocence of willful misconduct is one of the burdens placed upon all claimants before the Industrial Accident Commission. Counsel rely in part upon the following language found in Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 180–186, 149 Pac. 35–38:

> "The question whether the accident was caused by the 'willful misconduct of the employé' is one that goes to the jurisdiction of the board, and is therefore open to inquiry on certiorari. Under the terms of the act, the liability exists only where there is a concurrence of certain conditions, one of which is the absence of such willful misconduct."

In using the language above quoted, Mr. Justice Sloss, who prepared the court's opinion, was not discussing the burden of proof in proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission, but he was disposing of the contention that the finding of the commission upon the question of willful misconduct of the employé was not reviewable by this court. He concluded that as a matter going to the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission it was subject to examination on certiorari. But the decision does not hold, nor does any authority to which our attention has been called, that innocence of willful misconduct on the part of the injured or killed workman must be affirmatively established in the proceeding before the commission. If this were the rule the petitioner would be compelled in every case to establish all of the rules passed by the employer for the safety of the employés, and then prove that no one of these regulations had been broken by the workman killed or injured in the alleged accident. It is contended that the very definition of the right of an injured workman to receive compensation or of the surviving dependents of a deceased employé to obtain an award provided by law in proper cases depends upon the absence of willful misconduct. In this behalf McDougald v. Boyd, 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168, is cited as authority for the proposition that a statute may prescribe proof of a negative as an essential part of a plaintiff's cause of action. That was a tax proceeding—one in invitum—and it was held that, as the statute did not impose a tax generally upon all transfers of property made in contemplation of death, but only upon those made "without valuable and adequate consideration," the burden was placed upon an officer seeking to collect an inheritance tax of showing that a transaction involving such transfer was in fact without sufficient consideration. The matter at bar is quite different. We are here considering not a proceeding in invitum, but one in which the law contemplates a fair weighing of all of the facts and the rights of the parties with as little formality as is compatible with justice.

[1] "Willful misconduct," in a proceeding such as this, like "contributory negligence" in a damage case, is matter of affirmative defense. While the question of "willful misconduct" goes to the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission in the sense that no award may be made lawfully by that tribunal when the employé's "willful misconduct" has contributed to his injury, nevertheless the commission has the right to hear and determine all controversies between employers and workmen holding relatively the positions occupied by the decedents' petitioners and the firm that employed them. In that sense the matter of "willful misconduct" is not jurisdictional, but purely defensive. The rule has been so declared in British Columbia Sugar Refining Co. v. Granick, 44 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 105, 2 N. C. C. A. 852. This court has held that, while the burden of proof in a matter before the Industrial Accident Commission is upon the applicant, it is not necessary that every possibility of death by other than accidental means should be negatived. Rideout Co. v. Pillsbury, 159 Pac. 435, 436.

The circumstances surrounding the death of Maffia and that of Zanotti do not show whether or not they or either of them made any test of the atmospheric conditions in the tank before entering. For all that appeared in the evidence they may have made tests and may have been satisfied in their own minds that they might safely venture within the tank, or it may have been that one of them entered the tank, was overcome by the fumes, and that his companion seeking to rescue him was also suffocated. These are all matters purely of speculation. But, even if it be conceded that going into the wine tank under the circumstances revealed was negligence of a high degree, that does not help us in the solution of the problem presented to us.

[2] Negligence or lack of it is not the determinative factor in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 180–189, 149 Pac. 35.

[3] Willful misconduct involves something more than negligence, and it does not even include every violation of a rule. Casey v. Humphries, [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. 520. According to the finding of the commission, which is supported by the evidence, there had been no rules formulated by the employer prohibiting an employé from entering a tank or vat before testing the atmosphere therein with a lighted candle.

[4] True, it was the custom, as found by the commission, to make such tests, but Zanotti, in the absence of proof that he knew of such general practice, could not even be charged with negligence in entering the suffocating atmosphere without employing the common preliminary precaution. Boin v. Spreckels Sugar Co., 155 Cal. 612, 102 Pac. 937. Much less might he be charged with willful misconduct.

[5, 6] Regarding Maffia the facts were different. He was a man of experience, and we could perhaps construct an hypothetical case in which such a workman might be held guilty of willful misconduct in the violation of a custom crystallized by long and universal practice into a rule, although not formulated by the employer into a written precept or a spoken command; but we cannot say that under the circumstances presented by this record the commissioners erred in finding the evidence insufficient to establish such misconduct on Maffia's part as ought to defeat the efforts of his surviving dependents to obtain compensation for his death. It might have been that Maffia was overcome after going to the aid of Zanotti, in which event he would have been engaged in his employer's business. Dragovich v. Iroquois Iron Co., 269 Ill. 478, 109 N. E. 999, 10 N. C. C. A. 475; Waters v. Taylor Co., 218 N. Y. 248, 112 N. E. 727. Indeed, a number of explanations are possible not merely to excuse, but logically to account for, Maffia's being in the tank; and we cannot say, therefore, that his mere presence therein and in a dying condition proves circumstantially his guilt of willful misconduct.

[7] The two workmen were employed by the Aquilino-Lagomarsino Wine Company, a partnership for which petitioner wrote compensation insurance. Petitioner disclaims liability on the ground that the partnership business had been assigned for the benefit of creditors, and that the men who were killed had ceased to be employés of the copartnership. The commission found that one week prior to the accident F. A. Lucas had been appointed general manager of the business under a general power of attorney authorizing him so to act as manager and to receive and control the funds of the co-partnership; that neither in form nor substance was this transaction a sale or transfer of the partnership business to Lucas, but was placing partnership business and assets under his control until Lucas and certain other creditors should be paid; and that Aquilino and Lagomarsino at all times remained the owners of the partnership business and the employers of Maffia and Zanotti. These findings are supported by the evidence. The alleged assignment was not made by the copartnership, but by the partners individually. It was a private arrangement which could not be binding upon the workmen employed in the winery. There was no pretense that it was made in accordance with the statutes (section 3457, Civil Code, et seq.) The mere transmission of the custody and management of the business to Lucas was not a sale, a transfer or an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

No other matters discussed in the briefs require attention.

The awards are affirmed.

FREEMAN v. PHIPPS.

(Sac. 2528.)

1. INSANE PERSONS 🔑33(1)—GUARDIANSHIP—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a proceeding for the appointment of a guardian for the person and estate of an insane person, it was not prejudicial to admit in evidence the writing made by the late husband of the insane person requesting the appointment of a certain individual as his successor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. §§ 44–46, 48, 50, 51.]

2. INSANE PERSONS 🔑34 — GUARDIANSHIP — APPOINTMENT OF STRANGER.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1763 et seq., giving the court a broad discretion to conserve the best interests of the insane persons, it is within the power of the court to appoint as guardian a stranger to the person who is familiar with the estate of the insane person by his acting as attorney for the former guardian.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the guardianship of Josephine H. Crocker, an incompetent person, by Josephine B. Freeman, against W. T. Phipps. From a decree for the defendant, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander & O'Donnell, D. E. Alexander, and John O'Donnell, all of San Francisco, for appellant. W. T. Phipps, of Sacramento, guardian, in pro. per.

MELVIN, J. For about 12 years before he died Calvin E. Crocker was the guardian of the person and estate of his wife, Josephine H. Crocker, an incompetent person. For several years prior to his death, which occurred in January, 1916, Mr. Crocker had been an invalid, and during that time much, if not all, of the business connected with the estate of his wife was committed to the management of Mr. W. T. Phipps, an attorney at law, whose offices are at Sacramento. After Mr. Crocker's death Mr. Phipps petitioned for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of Josephine H. Crocker, and a similar petition was filed by Josephine B. Freeman, a cousin of the incompetent, who is the nominee of all of the relatives of said Josephine H. Crocker. The court heard both petitions at the same time, and appointed Mrs. Freeman guardian of the person and Mr. Phipps guardian of the estate of Mrs. Crocker. From that part of the judgment appointing Mr. Phipps, an appeal is taken by Mrs. Freeman.

[1] The court admitted in evidence a writing made by Calvin E. Crocker dated January 18, 1912, by which he requested the proper court, upon his death, to appoint W. T. Phipps guardian of Mrs. Crocker. The admission of this instrument is specified as error. It must be conceded, of course, that a guardian has no statutory right to nominate his successor who shall take his place upon said guardian's death, but we do not see that appellant was harmed by the admission of this instrument. She objected to the receiving of it in evidence, but Mr. Oatman, who identified the signature and told of the execution of the writing, testified without objection to the essential facts set forth therein, namely, that Mr. Crocker preferred Mr. Phipps as his successor; and he added that this preference existed because of the lawyer's familiarity with the affairs of the incompetent's estate, and because Mr. Crocker did not want her relatives to have any control of his wife's property. After this testimony had been given without objection, the document was offered in evidence, and then appellant's counsel objected for the first time. If the court errod, therefore, in admitting the writing, no serious injury was inflicted upon appellant.

[2] It is the theory of appellant that the court abused its discretion in appointing a stranger and in refusing to ratify the choice of all of the incompetent person's kinsfolk. Appellant's counsel concede that no statute compels a court thus to select a guardian from the relatives of the ward, but her counsel say that "analogies of the law" should have governed the court's action, and that the rules prescribed for granting letters upon estates of deceased persons should have been followed.

To this objection the obvious answer is that, even if we regard Mr. Phipps as a "stranger" to Mrs. Crocker in the sense that he did not know her very well personally, the evidence showed without conflict that he was familiar with her business affairs—probably more so than any other person; and the equally obvious reply to the argument in favor of "analogies of the law" is that such analogies have not impelled the Legislature to adopt them. Section 1763 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing the methods to be followed in matters of guardianship of insane and incompetent persons and the powers of the courts in such proceedings, give a broad discretion quite analogous to that vested in courts of chancery to conserve the best interests of their wards. This court has held valid and proper the appointment of a stranger as guardian of the person and estate of an incompetent who was a married man and preferred, if a guardian of his person was to be appointed, that his wife should be selected. Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 218, 131 Pac. 352. Undoubtedly the fact that petitioner Phipps was acquainted with Mrs. Crocker and familiar with the affairs of her estate gave him sufficient standing to justify his application as "a friend" of the incompetent person. Estate of Schulmeyer, 171 Cal. 340–344, 153 Pac. 233. The only duty of the court is to select a proper person for a guardian. Halett v. Patrick, 49 Cal. 590; Guardianship of Sullivan, 143 Cal. 462, 77 Pac. 153. And we find nothing in this record to justify even a suspicion that the court violated its discretion in bestowing the appointment upon Mr. Phipps. In this behalf appellant, while disclaiming any reflection upon the character or capacity of Mr. Phipps, suggests that his intimate business relations with Mr. Crocker during that gentleman's later years should have governed the court and should have impelled a refusal to apoint him guardian of an estate having claims against the estate and property of Calvin E. Crocker, deceased. There is no force in this suggestion. This record discloses the fact that Mr. Phipps was employed about the affairs of this very estate of which he now assumes guardianship under the court's order. There is nothing to indicate that he was ever concerned with other or conflicting interests. We must assume that he is not an attorney for the executor of decedent's estate, because, naturally, the court would not appoint him guardian of Mrs. Crocker's estate if he were. We see no reason to disturb the court's action in any particular.

WOODARD v. GLENWOOD LUMBER CO. et al. (S. F. 6615.)

BROKERS ⟹71—COMMISSIONS FOR OBTAINING CONTRACT—AMOUNT.

Where defendant agreed to pay plaintiff ten cents per thousand for all lumber cut by defendant on another's land on contract secured by plaintiff and defendant did not cut all the timber on the land, plaintiff was entitled to commissions only on the amount cut, since his contract was entirely dependent upon the amount cut by defendant on latter's contract with owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 56.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by L. Woodard against the Glenwood Lumber Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant William M. Aydelotte appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Jarman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Geo. Clark, of San Francisco, J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, Beasly & Fry, of San Jose, and Charles B. Younger and W. P. Netherton, both of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The general facts in this case are set forth in another appeal taken from the same judgment. The decision of this court will be found in 171 Cal. 513, 153 Pac. 951.

For his services in securing for the Glenwood Lumber Company from L. Woodard a contract authorizing the former to cut and remove timber from the lands of the latter, the Glenwood Lumber Company, by written contract, agreed to pay appellant Aydelotte ten cents per thousand feet "for each and every one thousand feet of lumber that the first party or its successors or assigns may become indebted to said Woodard for under the said contract between them." Plaintiff Woodard in time brought suit for a cancellation of the contract for sundry breaches of it, and for a decree quieting his title and restoring him to the possession of his timber lands. Bloom and Miller, who, by assignment, had successively succeeded to the rights of the Glenwood Lumber Company under the contract, were made parties defendant, as was this appellant. It appeared that Bloom and Miller accepted the assignment of Woodard's contract with the Glenwood Lumber Company, subject to appellant's rights under his contract with the Glenwood Lumber Company, and the court so found. It found also that if these defendants had performed their contract and cut the millions of feet of timber upon these lands, appellant would have been entitled to several thousand dollars by virtue of his contract of ten cents per thousand feet. They did not, however, perform their contract nor cut this wood nor "become indebted to Woodard under the contract" for any wood cut. The court, finding all of these facts, found that his fellow defendants had not breached their contract with Aydelotte, and that he was therefore not entitled to a recovery. Upon this appeal it is argued that under the facts found he was entitled to a recovery for the full amount of ten cents per thousand feet of the fifty or more million feet of timber left standing on the land. The difficulty with appellant's position, however, arises from the very terms of the contract itself. It has been sufficiently pointed out that his codefendants did not agree with appellant to cut all or any part of the timber upon the land. Their agreement to do this was with Woodard alone. All, so far as appellant is concerned, that they agreed to do was to pay him ten cents per thousand feet for such portion as they did cut, and this in fact they did, and, as their contract went no further, the court's judgment was correct, and is affirmed.

1. DAMAGES ⟹142—PLEADING—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DELAY IN DELIVERY.

Damage suffered by the buyer of materials from delay in delivery is damage which must be specially and specifically pleaded, and pleading that defendant had been damaged by reason "of plaintiff's said breaches of its said contract" was insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 413.]

2. FRAUD ⟹30—FRAUD UPON OWNER OF BUILDING.

Where plaintiff materialman, in furnishing iron rods rather than steel rods to the contractor for a building, furnished precisely the rods which it had agreed to furnish by its contract with the contractor, if there was any fraud upon the owner of the building it was a fraud of the contractor, and not of the materialman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 35.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judges.

Action by the Judson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, against Richard Lutge, doing business under the name and style of the Folsom Street Iron Works. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for appellant. Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued to recover for the value of materials furnished to defendant. It charged in two counts; the first an express contract with a fixed price for the materials; the second in quantum valebat. The court gave plaintiff judgment in the amount sued for, and from that judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

The material which plaintiff agreed to and did furnish was steel and iron to be used by defendant in the performance of his contract in the construction of the "New Coliseum Building" in the city and county of San Francisco. By his contract with the owners defendant agreed to perform his contract within eighteen working days. He pleaded that plaintiff had delayed in the delivery of the material and did not deliver the material until after the agreed time, "and that by reason of the failure of said plaintiff to perform its said contract with defendant according to plans, specifications and details as aforesaid, said Coliseum Amusement Company (the owner of the premises) has claimed and does claim that this defendant has caused a damage in the sum of $4,000."

The court found that plaintiff duly performed its contract in all respects, saving that it did not furnish the defendant the material within the agreed time. It further found that the material when furnished was accepted and used by the defendant and that the defendant was not in any respect damaged by the delay. The court, however, found both the value of the material under the count in quantum valebat, and found also the contract price of the material in the same sum, as it further found the performance of the contract, excepting in the matter of the delay of the delivery, and that this delay worked no damage to defendant, the allowance of interest was proper as addressed to the finding of the contract price.

[1] Defendant's own testimony was to the effect that he suffered no damage saving for the delay. But in this regard he merely pleads:

> "That by reason of plaintiff's said breaches of its said contract with this defendant, this defendant has been damaged in the sum of $4,000."

The damage for which recovery is here sought is, under every rule of pleading and authority as to damage, one which must be specially and specifically pleaded. Cole v. Swanston, 1 Cal. 51, 52 Am. Dec. 288; Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 102, 87 Am. Dec. 107; Nunan v. San Francisco, 38 Cal. 689; Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 163, 11 Pac. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529; Harron-Rickard-McCone v. Wilson-Lyon & Co., 4 Cal. App. 488, 88 Pac. 512; 2 Sutherland, Damages (3d Ed.) § 419. Defendant's failure specifically to plead this special damage, which here he asserts he suffered, justified the court's refusal to receive evidence upon it, and demanded the finding which the court made against it.

[2] Something is said about a concerted fraud practiced upon the owner of the building by plaintiff and defendant in the substitution of iron rods for steel. But the evidence establishes that plaintiff in furnishing the iron rods furnished precisely those which by its contract with defendant it had agreed to furnish, and, if this were in fact a fraud upon the owner, it was a fraud of the defendant and not of the plaintiff.

LANDWEHR v. GILLETTE et al.

(L. A. 3804.)

1. JUDGMENT ⚷120 — DEFAULT — CLERK'S POWER TO ENTER.

The authority of a clerk to enter judgment after default is purely ministerial, and confined strictly to the statutory provisions, and any judgment otherwise entered by him will be void.

2. JUDGMENT ⚷126(1)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT —ENTRY BY CLERK—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY FEES.

Where a note sued on provided for recovery of a reasonable attorney fee and defendants were defaulted, the clerk had no authority to enter judgment for $500 attorney fee claimed in complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, empowering clerk to enter judgment on default "in an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if no answer has been filed."

3. JUDGMENT ⚷126(1)—DEFAULT — CLERK'S POWER TO ENTER—STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, empowering clerk to enter judgment on default in actions "arising upon contract for recovery of money or damages only," is limited to cases where contract provides definite sum as liquidated damages, or where the clerk's duty will be merely that of computation, and does not authorize such action merely because the complaint claims a certain amount as damages, the reasonableness of which by section 2 is to be determined by the court.

4. JUDGMENT ⚷112—MATTER ADMITTED BY DEFAULT—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A defendant's failure to answer in suit upon note providing for recovery of reasonable attorney fee did not admit the complainant's allegation that $500 was a reasonable attorney fee, but merely that something was recoverable under that provision.

5. JUDGMENT ⚷112—MATTER ADMITTED BY DEFAULT—AMOUNT DUE.

In action for value of goods sold alleged to be reasonably worth the sum charged, a default does not admit liability to the extent charged, but merely some liability to be determined by the court.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by H. A. Landwehr against G. G. Gillette and others. Default judgment for plaintiff set aside, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Jones & Evans, B. J. Bradner, and S. F. Macfarlane, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county setting aside a judgment.

The action in which the judgment was entered was brought to recover upon a promissory note executed by defendant Fundenberg and indorsed by the other defendants. As set out in the complaint, the note was for $3,000 principal, with 6 per cent. interest, and contained a provision that "in case suit is instituted to collect this note, or any portion thereof, I promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit," and it was alleged in the complaint that the sum of $500 was a reasonable attorney's fee to be paid to the plaintiff on the bringing of said suit. The prayer was for a judgment for the principal and interest on the note, $500 attorney's fee, and costs of suit.

Defendants were duly served with summons, but made no appearance in the action. Thereafter their defaults were entered by the clerk of the court, who on the same day himself entered up a judgment against defendants for the amount prayed for in the complaint, including therein the sum of $500 as attorney's fees. Subsequently certain of the defendants moved to set aside said judgment, which motion being granted, this appeal is taken therefrom by plaintiff.

The sole question presented on this appeal is as to the authority of the clerk of the court on default to enter a judgment in the action, including reasonable attorney's fees. The authority of the clerk of the court to enter up a judgment where a defendant has defaulted after personal service of summons on him is given by subdivision 1 of section 585, Code of Civil Procedure, and, quoting from such portion as is material here, provides that:

> "In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if no answer has been filed * * * the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the prayer of the complaint, including the costs. * * *"

Subdivision 2 of said section provides that:

> "In other actions, if the defendant has been personally served and no answer has been filed * * * the clerk may enter the default of the defendant; and thereafter the plaintiff may apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint."

These embrace the only provisions respecting an entry of judgment upon default made after personal service, and the question is: Was the action upon this promissory note, as far as the claim respecting reasonable attorney's fees is concerned, such an action "upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only" where judgments shall be entered by the clerk, or did it fall within "those actions" where the plaintiff must apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint?

[1] It is, of course, well settled that the authority given the clerk to enter judgment after default is, when properly exercised, a ministerial one solely. His power must be conferred by the statute, and in exercising it he must conform strictly to the provisions of the section or any judgment entered by him will be void. Kelly v. Van Austin, 17 Cal. 564; Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 425, 9 Pac. 727; Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., 136 Cal. 574, 69 Pac. 220; Farrar v. Steenbergh, 159 Pac. 707.

[2] Was the suit in which the judgment therein was entered an action "upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only," within the purview of subdivision 1 of the section in which the clerk could enter up a judgment as prayed for in the complaint? We are satisfied that it was not.

While the note provides that reasonable attorney's fees, if incurred by the bringing of an action, shall be fixed by the court, we do not attach particular importance to that circumstance. In the view we take of the construction to be put on the subdivision of the Code referred to, that particular reference to the court would require no different construction if it were not contained in the note.

[3] While it is true that the language used in subdivision 1 of the section is quite broad and authorizes the clerk after default to enter up judgment in all actions "arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only," still what is meant by that language is that the contract to warrant the exercise of such authority by the clerk alone in entering judgment must by its terms as set forth in the complaint call for the payment of some fixed and definite sum in money or damages. In the nature of things this provision of the Code must be construed to apply to contracts which provide for some definite fixed amount of damages ascertainable from the contract sued on or from the terms of which a certain computation or calculation may be made by the clerk. As the duty of the clerk is purely ministerial, his power could only be exercised and properly apply in the case of such a contract, and must be limited thereto. If the contract declared on is indefinite and uncertain in the amount of damages which plaintiff is entitled to recover on it, and in the nature of things must be ascertained and fixed, the matter then is necessarily one for judicial determination by the court, and not for ministerial action by the clerk. Hence it must appear from the contract sued on, either from its terms as set forth in the complaint or from the allegations in the latter respecting it, that a definite or liquidated sum of money is to be paid as damages; an amount which is definitely fixed by the contract sued on or which from the allegations of the complaint may be ascertained by mere computation or mathematical computation of the clerk. When this is the situation the clerk in entering judgment acts simply in a ministerial capacity. Nothing more is required of him than to figure up from exact data in the contract or in the complaint what plaintiff is entitled to, and hence, an entry of judgment would be authorized under the section. But this is not the situation presented here. The contract—the note—does not amount to a liquidated demand for a certain, definite, fixed sum of money consisting of principal and interest which would leave to the clerk on a default only the duty of making a mere calculation of interest to fix the exact amount of damages for which judgment should be entered. It is rendered uncertain or indefinite by reason of the provision for reasonable attorney's fees to be allowed on the contingency of suit to collect the note as special damages. While the complaint alleges that $500 is a reasonable attorney's fee, it does not lie with plaintiff to determine what shall constitute a reasonable attorney's fee, nor can his counsel bringing the action fix the amount thereof for purposes of a judgment by alleging in the complaint a sum which he may think would be reasonable. Its reasonableness could not be ascertained by computation, because no data has been furnished in the note or complaint for doing so. It must remain uncertain and indefinite until resolved into a certain sum by some one authorized to do so. Certainly it is not a ministerial duty for the clerk, but is one pre-eminently judicial to be performed by a court.

[4] It is argued that the failure of defendants to answer was an admission by them that the sum alleged was a reasonable attorney's fee. But this is not the legal consequence which follows from such default as far as entering a judgment by the clerk is involved. The default is an admission of some things. In an action of this character, for instance, it admits that by the terms of the note sued on the defendants are liable, in addition to principal and interest, for the payment of some amount as a reasonable attorney's fee, and that the plaintiff is entitled to have a recovery therefor. But this is as far as the default constitutes an admission. It simply admits that something is due as a reasonable amount for attorney's fees, but not that the amount alleged in the complaint constitutes it. This, under the contract and under the law, is a matter peculiarly for judicial determination which a defaulting defendant knows or is presumed to know, and while he admits the breach of the contract by his default and his liability for general damages, in those amounts which can be determined by exact computation from the note or the complaint setting forth its terms, yet as to the recovery of reasonable attorney's fees, which are special damages authorized to be recovered in addition to the general damage, his default only admits he is liable in some sum, but only in such a sum as may be determined after his default by the judgment of the court itself. In 23 Cyc. 753, speaking on this subject, it is said:

> "If the action is in tort or upon an unliquidated claim or demand, default admits plaintiff's right to recover, but not the amount to which he is entitled, and therefore further proceedings will be necessary to determine the amount of the judgment. But if the cause of action is such that plaintiff is entitled to recover a fixed sum, or nothing at all, or if the amount of the damages is ascertainable by mere calculation, the default admits his right to recover the sum demanded in the declaration or complaint, and the judgment may be entered therefor."

[5] An action like this, in as far as it involves a recovery of reasonable attorney's fees under the terms of a note providing therefor in case of suit, is no different from an action brought for the recovery of the reasonable value of goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to defendant and alleged to be reasonably worth the sum charged, or an action for services rendered to defendant which are alleged to be reasonably worth a certain sum. It is settled in those cases that, as the contract sued on is not certain or definite as to the amount for which defendant is liable, although the complaint alleges a fixed sum as the reasonable value, a default does not admit the liability to the extent charged, but simply a liability to some extent and the amount of the recovery is to be determined by the court to which application must be made therefor, and respecting which the clerk has no right to make entry of judgment. B. & M. R. R. Co. v. Marchand, 5 Iowa, 471; B. & M. R. R. Co. v. Shaw, 5 Iowa, 563; Wynne v. Prairie, 86 N. C. 73; also Witt v. Long, 93 N. C. 391; Wolf v. Hamberg, 8 S. C. 84; 1 Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 89, p. 117.

There is nothing in the case of Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 Pac. 24, cited and relied on by both sides, which directly aids in the solution of this question either way, although inferentially it seems to support the claim of respondent. In that case there was a default judgment, but there was no question raised in the case of the right of the clerk to enter up the amount of a reasonable attorney's fee. There was no allegation of a reasonable fee, for the reason that the note sued on there provided that in the event of suit the plaintiff should recover 10 per cent. of the total amount found due on the note as attorney's fees. There was no question about the power or want of power of the clerk to enter a default judgment in the case as to an attorney's fee. As far as any question about the entry of judgment for attorney's fees in that case was concerned, the claim was that the complaint in the action did not contain a sufficient allegation to support its allowance. As the complaint set forth the note in full which embraced a provision for an attorney's fee and alleged the amount due for principal and interest, it was held that there was a sufficient allegation on which to base an allowance of such fee as a simple matter of computation; that the provision in the note itself as to attorney's fees and the allegation of the amount due for principal and interest in the complaint left only a ministerial duty for the clerk to perform, namely, to figure up the attorney's fee at 10 per cent. on the principal and interest due. This is a very different matter from the clerk entering up a judgment for an attorney's fee under the provision of a note stipulating only for the payment of reasonable fees.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by Ellen Thompson and others against C. H. Hance, Treasurer of the City of Los Angeles, and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Delmas, Imel & Banks, of Los Angeles (Delphin M. Delmas, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants. Albert L. Stephens, E. R. Young, Marshall Stimson, F. C. Austin, and Swanwick & McCormick, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment entered after defendant's demurrer to the complaint had been sustained. The action was instituted for the purpose of resisting payment of bonds which were sought to be made a lien upon property within a district assessed to pay for certain improvements on a portion of Hill street, in the city of Los Angeles, and for the cost of the construction of a tunnel extending for a part of the distance traversed by it under a portion of said street. It appears from the averments contained in the complaint that on December 29, 1911, the city council of the city of Los Angeles adopted and the mayor of said city approved a certain ordinance declaring the intention "to improve a portion of Hill street, and to construct a public tunnel under a portion of said street, and determining that bonds shall be issued to represent the cost thereof, and declaring the work or improvement to be of more than local or ordinary public benefit and that the expense of said work shall be assessed upon a district."

By the first section of said ordinance it was declared that the public convenience required and that it was the intention of the city council to order certain work, including a tunnel, which was to pierce a hill some 90 feet in height intervening between the level portions of said Hill street, at First street and at Temple street. Hill street had been previously graded officially upon the part of it extending over the mound through which the tunnel was to pass. Some of the sections of the ordinance related to the performance of street work on the official grade of Hill street.

By the second section the contemplated work was declared of more than local or ordinary public benefit and the council designated a district thus to be benefited, and by the next section announced that certain described lots of lands should be assessed to pay for the cost of that improvement.

The ordinance contained a direction to the city engineer to prepare a diagram; a finding that the cost of work along the line of the street to be improved would be more than 50 cents per front foot; a statement of the determination of the council to issue serial bonds (describing them in detail); and an announcement that the bonds were to be issued in accordance with the provisions of "'An act to provide a system of street improvement bonds to represent certain assessments for the cost of street work and improvement within municipalities, and also for the payment of such bonds,' approved February 27, 1893, and of all acts supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof." This by-law also contained provisions for posting and publication of notices of the work and of the passage of the ordinance itself.

The pleading recites in detail the proceedings following the adoption of the ordinance including the preparation and approval of the city engineer's diagram and the other necessary steps done in conformity with "'An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885, and the acts amendatory thereof," culminating in the letting, execution, and performance of a contract for the work. Then follow allegations of the acceptance of the work, the assessment by the board of public works to cover the cost of the improvement; the issuance of a warrant to the contractor's assignees; and the delivery to them, after the full expiration of 35 days of certain street improvement bonds. Plaintiffs aver that they own property against which certain of these bonds have been issued; their refusal to pay the claims represented by said bonds; and the consequent threat and preparation to sell their land to pay the said bonds. They pray for the equitable relief suitable to prevent such results, and ask that the bonds be declared invalid and void. It is to be remembered also that the complaint contains an accurate description of the tunnel and a statement that it was designed and is used solely for the passage of pedestrians and vehicles, being one of the most frequented thoroughfares of the city.

Appellants contend that the improvement —or that part of it represented by the tunnel—was made without authority, and that the city was not clothed with power to levy a local assessment to pay for said tunnel. Respondents assert that ample authority is provided by the statute commonly known as the "Vrooman Act" (St. 1885, p. 147) and the amendments thereto, especially that of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 626). This law gives to the city council authority, whenever the public interest or convenience may require, to order—

"the whole or any portion, either in length or width, of any one or more of the streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, courts, places, boulevards, highways, crossings, intersections or public ways of any such city graded or regraded to the official grade, planked or replanked, paved or repaved, * * * and to order the construction or reconstruction therein of sidewalks, crosswalks, culverts, bridges, gutters, * * * and channels for sanitary and drainage purposes, * * * hydrants and appliances for fire protection, tunnels, viaducts, conduits and subways, breakwaters, levees, bulkheads and walls of rock or other material to protect the same from overflow or injury by water, * * * and the construction or reconstruction in, over or through property or rights of way owned by such city, of tunnels, sewers, ditches, drains, conduits and channels for sanitary and drainage purposes or either or both thereof, with necessary outlets, * * * and to order any work to be done which shall be deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of such streets, avenues, sidewalks, lanes, alleys, courts, places or public ways or property or rights of way of such city."

[1] It is evident to us that this statute does not, in and of itself, give to the city council the power to construct such a tunnel as the one described in the complaint in this case. Nor does the "Vrooman Act," or any one of its amendments, confer upon the city council authority to assess the cost of any such improvement upon a local district. The "Vrooman Act" is a street improvement act. The instrumentalities mentioned therein and in the amendments thereto are those used in connection with the improvement of streets. The word "tunnels," as employed in these statutes, is not susceptible of the interpretation which respondents would give to it, namely, independent subterranean avenues for travel. The word is used in such manner as to leave no doubt that it has reference to tunnels for the purpose of draining surface streets. As first used in the above quotation the word appears in association with "viaducts, conduits," and other words applying to means of controlling surplus waters, and is followed by the expression "to protect the same from overflow or injury by water." The words "the same" refer to the streets and other public places enumerated in the first section of the act. It is plain that the "tunnels" here mentioned are mere auxiliaries to proper drainage of a street, square, or other public place. Used a second time in section 2 of the "Vrooman Act," as amended in 1911, we find the word "tunnels" embraced in the part of the act giving power to the council for the construction over or through rights of way or property owned by the city of "sewers, ditches," etc., "for sanitary and drainage purposes or either or both thereof," indicating that the "tunnels" designated were to be mere instrumentalities for the elimination of storm waters or sewage. The closing words of section 2 of the act of 1911 quoted herein emphasize the fact that the statute is a street improvement act, and not one for the authorization of the construction of a tunnel for the accommodation of part of the traffic of a great city. It is argued that as only commas are used in the section from which we have quoted it is possible to divorce the words "to protect the same from overflow," etc., from the enumeration of instrumentalities preceding that expression. If there were any possible doubt upon this subject it would be removed by an examination of another act of 1911 approved two days later than the amendment to the Vrooman Act." The statute sometimes known as "The Improvement Act" (Stats. 1911, p. 730), has a section 2 exactly like the one similarly numbered in the amendment to the "Vrooman Act," except that semicolons are used to divide the groupings of words. We find the following expressions therein punctuated as here indicated:

> "Pipes, hydrants and appliances for fire protection; tunnels, viaducts, conduits and subways, breakwaters, levees, bulkheads and walls of rock or other material to protect the same from overflow or injury by water."

This punctuation amounts almost to a demonstration that the legislative intent did not extend to the conferring upon city councils of power under the "Vrooman Act" to construct tunnels for purposes of public travel. In the case of Gassner v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 82, 116 Pac. 73, this court held that provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, substantially identical with those of the "Vrooman Act," did not authorize a district assessment to meet the cost of a tunnel.

[2] It is equally clear that the tunnel here under discussion does not come within the purview of the "Vrooman Act" as a mere part of the street itself. Respondents cite Sears v. Crocker, 184 Mass. 586, 69 N. E. 327, 100 Am. St. Rep. 577, as authority upon the proposition that a subway, under certain conditions, may be regarded as legitimately a part of a public street. It is true that the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in that case decided that no additional servitude was taken by the city of Boston in constructing a subway below the surface of a public street, but the facts before the court in that case differed greatly from those presented by this record as a brief quotation from the opinion of the learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts will indicate:

> "In the present case the travel which is being provided for is from place to place within the city. There are stopping places on the subway at convenient points. In that respect it is different from a tunnel designed only or chiefly for travel for long distances. The new method is a substitution in part of a subterranean use of the streets for a use of their surface for the same general purpose. It is impracticable to have direct communication between the premises of abutters and the cars in the tunnel, but by going a short distance access to them may be had from any place. We are of opinion that this use of the streets is within the purposes for which the lands were taken, and that no additional servitude is created by it."

The tunnel we are dealing with is one having no intermediate connection between its terminal portals with the surface above, and moreover, it does not follow the lines of Hill street throughout its entire length. In that respect it is more unlike a part of the street than the Stockton street tunnel in San Francisco, of which Mr. Justice Sloss, in delivering the opinion of this court in Mardis v. McCarthy, 162 Cal. 94–103, 121 Pac. 389, 393, said:

> "We doubt whether the construction of a tunnel 'in or under' a street is fairly to be regarded as a repair or improvement of the street."

[3] It being clear that the general statutes relating to street improvements are not sufficient in and of themselves to uphold the assessment attacked by plaintiffs, we will examine the argument of respondents to the effect that in the charter of the city of Los Angeles is found the authorization and the conferring of power which supports the proceedings taken to construct the Hill street tunnel, and to assess the cost thereof upon a benefited district. Prior to the passage of the ordinance by which the construction of the Hill street tunnel was ordered the charter of Los Angeles had been amended. By section 2 of the amended charter (Stats. 1911, p. 2059), it is provided that:

> "The city of Los Angeles, in addition to any other powers now held by, or that may hereafter be granted to it under the Constitution or laws of the state, shall have the right and power * * *"

These words are followed by the enumeration of many specific rights and powers. The eleventh subdivision gives to the city power:

> "To acquire by purchase, lease, condemnation or otherwise, or to construct, and to own, maintain, equip and operate tunnels, conduits, viaducts and subways; to regulate and control the use thereof, and to fix and collect charges for such use."

The thirteenth subdivision is in the following language:

> "To establish, lay out, open, extend, widen, narrow, or vacate, pave or repave, or otherwise improve streets, lanes, alleys, boulevards, crossings, courts, and other highways and public places."

The nineteenth is as follows:

> "To levy and collect, or cause to be levied and collected, assessments upon property according to frontage, or upon property in districts according to benefits, to pay for the improvement of streets, or for the construction in any public street, alley or other public place, or in any right of way owned by the city, of sewers, drains, water or gas mains, and lines and conduits for transmitting electric current, and other pipes, mains, lines and conduits, or for other public improvements."

The thirty-ninth subdivision of section 2 provides that:

> "The powers conferred by this article shall be exercised by ordinance, except as otherwise provided in this charter."

Respondents assert that these provisions give to the city council the right to construct tunnels, to assess districts to pay for such improvements, and to proceed to do these things either by power conferred by general statute or by authority given by virtue of the charter. Examining these parts of the charter we fail to find any authority in the city to levy an assessment upon a district for the cost of such construction. Conceding that subdivision 11 gives the power to construct a tunnel such as this for the use of the public, and that subdivision 13 extends such power to include the subsequent improvement and repair of a tunnel, we find nothing in subdivision 19 or in any other part of the charter authorizing the assessment of a district for the purpose of raising the amount necessary for the initial establishment of a tunnel, as distinguished from the repair or improvement of an existing subterranean avenue. The words "or for other public improvements" must be construed in connection with the other parts of the subdivision which relate to the improvement of public streets or the construction in public streets or places of conveniences for sanitation, drainage, and the transmission of water, heat, electricity, gas, and the like. To construe the words "for other public improvements" as conferring a power to assess for a tunnel of this sort would be to wrench them from their context, and, ignoring the rule of ejusdem generis, to give them a meaning at variance with the obvious legislative intent. It is difficult to believe that, in a provision intended by the framers of the charter to confer in terms the right to assess a district for the improvement of existing streets, the higher power to raise money for the construction of a costly tunnel would be given in the general phrase "for other public improvements."

Respondents cite Mardis v. McCarthy, supra, as sustaining their claim of authority under the charter, but the provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco which we reviewed in that case were explicit, and by them the board of supervisors was clearly authorized to order the construction of tunnels and to provide therefor by district assessments. In that case and in the later case of Hayne v. City and County of San Francisco, 162 Pac. 625, we were dealing with a charter which in its enumeration of the powers of the supervisors with reference to tunnels went far beyond the provisions of the charter of Los Angeles in respect to the city council. Neither of those decisions supports the position of respondents in this case.

[4] Respondents contend that the validating clause of the bond act makes the issuance of the bonds conclusive of the regularity of the proceedings prior thereto, but this question is not involved. The city council lacked power to levy the assessment on the property in the designated district. Therefore the method employed is not material.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

GRAY et al. v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 1500 et al. (Sac. 2555.)

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS 🔑2—EQUAL INTEREST OF STATE AND NATION.

In the preservation and development of navigable inland waterways, the nation and the state have a common interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 63.]

2. NAVIGABLE WATERS 🔑6—RECLAMATION PROJECT—REPORT OF COMMISSION.

St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 117, declaring that navigation and reclamation problems shall be solved according to plan of California Débris Commission with such amendments and modifications as the state reclamation board might make, made the report of the California Débris Commission to this extent the law.

3. DRAINS 🔑13—CREATION OF RECLAMATION DISTRICT—STATUTE.

St. 1913, p. 130, creating reclamation district 1500, is a public statute, and construction of levees therein provided is a part of its execution.

4. DRAINS 🔑18 — DUTY OF RECLAMATION DISTRICT.

When Reclamation District 1500, created by St. 1913, p. 130, accepted its charter, it became obligated to build levees therein provided, and its duties were public and not private in nature.

5. NAVIGABLE WATERS 🔑2 — POWER OF STATE TO CONTROL.

The right of control over navigable waters embraces power to do anything subserving the purpose, and when the act is done, if private property is not taken, property owners must yield uncompensated obedience.

6. COMMERCE 🔑18—FEDERAL CONTROL—RELATION TO FEDERAL POWER.

The general power of the federal government to control navigable waters is found in the constitutional grant to regulate commerce, and state control is only secondary to such authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13.]

7. Navigable Waters ⚷2—Control—Police Power.

The federal or state control of streams for navigation purposes is an exercise of police power, although the question in a particular case of whether the proper limits of police power have been exceeded is one of fact.

8. Drains ⚷1—Reclamation Project—Police Power.

Drainage and reclamation of lands apart from question of navigability is a legitimate exercise of the state police powers.

9. Drains ⚷57—Reclamation Project—Validity of Acts.

If a particular act in carrying out a reclamation project is within the limits of police power, it is valid, and individuals have no cause of action, although suffering injury; such loss being damnum absque injuria, and in some instances property may be completely destroyed for this purpose.

10. Drains ⚷57—Reclamation Project—Temporary Injury to Land.

The raising of a flood plane in a reclamation project temporarily flooding plaintiff's land, and which will end when the project is completed, and which plaintiffs may protect themselves against, is done under a legitimate exercise of police power, and plaintiffs' loss is damnum absque injuria.

11. Constitutional Law ⚷81—"Police Power."

Police power, in its final analysis, is the power to govern.

12. Constitutional Law ⚷81—Eminent Domain ⚷69—Distinction between "Police Power" and "Eminent Domain."

Uncompensated submission of property owners is exacted in exercise of police power, while in eminent domain, compensated obedience for taking or damaging private property is the owner's constitutional right.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Eminent Domain.]

13. Eminent Domain ⚷70—Police Power—Reclamation Project—"Damaged."

Const. Ark. art. 2, § 22, providing that private property shall not be "taken, appropriated or damaged for public use," without compensation, does not abridge exercise of police power, and does not apply to temporary damage resulting from a reclamation project; the word "damaged" not referring to acts which are damnum absque injuria.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 175.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Damage—Damages.]

14. Waters and Water Courses ⚷38—"Natural Water Course"—"Depth of Water of One Foot Along the Line of Greatest Depression"—Reclamation Project.

Sutter basin in reclamation district 1500 does not constitute a "natural water course," since it has no well-defined channel, a "depth of water of one foot along the line of greatest depression" meaning an expanse of water a mile on either side.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Natural Water Course.]

15. Evidence ⚷29—Judicial Notice—Reports of Commission.

The court will take judicial notice of reports of California Débris Commission, and of state engineers, which have been adopted by statutes.

16. Evidence ⚷10(5), 11—Judicial Notice—Land and Water Conditions.

The court will take judicial notice in reclamation proceedings of state history, topography, and general land and water conditions.

17. Appeal and Error ⚷837(10)—Review—Evidence Not in Record—Court's View of Premises.

The fact that the court viewed premises to understand evidence, given concerning reclamation project, cannot be considered on appeal as the taking of independent evidence not contained in the transcript, and supporting his finding.

18. Waters and Water Courses ⚷115—"Surface Waters."

"Surface waters" are those from rainfall, snows, or springs which finally, in obedience to natural law, gather into well-defined channels, then becoming defined streams.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 126.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Surface Water.]

19. Drains ⚷43—Right of Reclamation District—Protection Against Flood and Surface Waters.

A reclamation district may protect and levee against flood waters, and it is immaterial that surface waters may form some part of the volume; there being an adequate channel left to take care of the surface water.

20. Constitutional Law ⚷92—Vested Rights—Abrogation of Property Rule.

Where a rule of property has grown up on the principle of stare decisis, it may be abrogated by court or Legislature, since a rule of property is not a vested right which may not be taken away without compensation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Samuel Gray and others against Reclamation District No. 1500, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

HENSHAW, J. Above the confluence of Feather river with Sacramento river lies a vast V-shaped tract of land. Much of this land is swamp and overflowed land of the character contemplated by the Arkansas Act, and title to it passed to the state of California by virtue of that act. Defendant reclamation district 1500, organized for the purpose of reclaiming the portion of this land within its boundaries, was proceeding with the work of levee construction when, at the instance of these plaintiffs, who for general purposes may be described as owners of land within the same triangle, lying to the north and east of the lands of the reclamation district, and fronting upon Feather river, the work was stopped by a prohibitory injunction of the trial court. Still further, a mandatory injunction was decreed, by which the defendant reclamation district was ordered to destroy the levees which already it had constructed.

The district is the same district, the work the same work, the law of the creation of the district the same law, that were considered in Reclamation District No. 1500 v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 154 Pac. 845.

The geological and topographical conditions concerning these lands and others similarly situated have been the subject of frequent exposition by this and other courts. For a general review of these facts reference may be made to Kimball v. Reclamation, etc., Comm., 45 Cal. 344; Hagar v. Yolo Co., 47 Cal. 222; Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406; North Bloomfield G. M. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569. Summarizing for the convenient consideration of the questions here presented, those conditions are the following: The Sacramento river and its principal tributaries, rising in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, flow with high gradients onto the low lying lands of the Sacramento valley. It is declared that anciently this valley was a shallow arm of the sea, and has been reclaimed from the ocean by the soils carried down by the rivers and deposited in it. This valley is still low land, and upon entering it the high gradient of the Sacramento river necessarily drops off to a very low one, with a corresponding arrest of current and carrying capacity. Fed by the heavy rains and the melting snows of the mountains, the onrush of these waters overflows the banks of the river and the waters themselves spread out over vast areas of these low-lying lands. Under the well-known principle of physics that the capacity of water to carry foreign matter in suspension is dependent upon the velocity of the water, and that the instant the velocity is checked the water begins to deposit a portion of the matter held in suspension, the following conditions resulted: By the checking of the flow of the Sacramento river and its tributaries at its banks and edges and by the gradual deposit on top of these banks as the flood waters passed over them in slow moving sheets, the banks themselves and very considerable tracts of land upon either side were raised to a height greater than that of the lower lands beyond.

Thus the rivers themselves came to move along the center of ridges of their own construction. These ridges were highest in immediate proximity to the rivers, and sloped gradually downward to the lowest plane of the valley. As the flood waters poured out of the rivers they found their way into these vast areas of lower lands lying on either side of them. These low areas came to be known as "basins," and were bounded upon the river side by the high lands constituting its banks, and upon the opposite side by no well-defined boundary, but only by the natural and gradual rise of the land above the possibility of flooding. So both as to the higher lands near to the river and to the higher lands opposite their condition was that of susceptibility to occasional and unexpected flooding, depending in any year upon the quantity of water which the river, called upon and unable to carry in its natural bed, cast out over the surrounding country. Thus as to such lands a man's farm might escape flooding for ten years and be flooded on the eleventh. But the lower lying areas were subject to regular recurrent annual floods. We have spoken of these vast areas of low lying lands as basins. Such is the designation which has been given them by hydraulic engineers. There are several of them. Following down the course of the Sacramento river there is, to the east, first, the Butte basin, separated from the Sutter basin by a slight elevation of the land caused by the proximity of the Sutter or Marysville Buttes and by the embankment or ridge built up as we have heretofore described by Butte creek. Next the Sutter basin, in which are the lands of defendants, subject to overflow both by the waters of the Sacramento river and of the Feather river. Below Sutter basin and still upon the east side of the river is the American basin near the junction of the American river with the Sacramento, and finally below this the Sacramento basin, containing within it the city of Sacramento itself. Upon the west side of the river and opposite Butte basin and Sutter basin lies the Colusa basin, and below that and separated therefrom by Knight's Landing ridge, itself the ancient high bank of Cache creek which subsequently abandoned its former course into the river and turned southward, is Yolo basin. At all times there flow into these basins minor streams usually known as creeks, which upon the east of the river commonly have their sources in the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and to the west of the river in the Coast Range Mountains. They gather up as well, of course, the surface waters coming from the rainfall upon the lands themselves. But both these elements of supply are insignificant as compared with the vast volumes of water delivered into these basins from the Sacramento river. The general characteristics of all these basins are similar. The river poured its excess waters into them in low places and breaks through the banks, known as sloughs, and over the banks themselves in sheets. These sloughs had well-defined channels as they cut through the higher lands of the river banks, which channels feathered out into nothingness as the sloughs poured their waters into the vast flat area of the basins' low lands. Here and there along the lines of these basins were such sloughs, and always at the lower end was one through which, as the river waters receded until they were below the level of the plane of the submerged area, the waters of these basins were gradually drawn back into the stream. Until the basin itself was filled to the level of the river, it was not unusual for the lower slough, as well as the upper, to be pouring the river waters into the basin, and, upon the other hand, as the waters in the river channel proper receded, it was not unusual for the upper as well as for the lower slough to aid in emptying the waters of the basin back into the mother stream. It is with Sutter basin and Butte basin lying immediately above it that we are here concerned. But this brief narration of the general conditions has been made necessary to an understanding of one important phase of this litigation which must be considered, and to the due consideration of which the following additional facts are necessary to be known:

[1] In what has already been said we have dealt with the condition of the Sacramento river in its state of nature before the advent of the white man. That river was and is a navigable stream. It and the San Joaquin river, which joins it in its lower reaches just above their common inflow into Suisun bay, are the two navigable inland waterways of the state of California. In the preservation and developement of these waterways the nation and the state have a common interest and certain incontestable rights. With the discovery of gold in the upper reaches of all the eastern streams tributary to the Sacramento, as well, indeed, as upon the upper reaches of the Sacramento river proper, hydraulic mining began. As a direct consequence of this, enormous quantities of débris were brought down stream and into the Sacramento river. In addition to this, farming operations, by tearing up the grass roots and loosening the soil, produced an erosion of all these lands theretofore not known. In combination, the beneficial result was merely an increase in the sedimentation of the low-lying swamp and overflowed land. The evil results were many. The immense quantities of detritus brought down by the streams raised enormously the bed of the river, necessarily lessened its depth, aggravated flood conditions, caused the precipitation of large quantities of "slickens" upon the adjacent farming lands to their great injury, shoaled San Pablo Bay, and (so ran the evidence) lessened the depth of water over the bar at the entrance of the Golden Gate. The navigability of the river itself was seriously impaired. These conditions were greatly intensified by the fact that individual works of reclamation and public works by levee districts, drainage districts, and reclamation districts had taken from the normal flood areas immense tracts of land, so that the waters were checked, and by the checking deposited greater quantities of their sediments in suspension and were forced over lands not theretofore subject to flood, and continuously imperiled leveed lands, as notably the city of Sacramento itself and its surrounding district. The attention of the national government was directed to these conditions. A California Débris Commission was appointed by congressional legislation, and hydraulic mining within the watershed of the river was limited to conditions to be prescribed and permitted by this Commission. This statute was upheld in United States v. North Bloomfield G. M. Co. (C. C.) 81 Fed. 243, and North Bloomfield G. M. Co. v. United States, 88 Fed. 664, 32 C. C. A. 84.

[2] In 1893 Congress passed the act creating the California Débris Commission (Act March 1, 1893, c. 183, 27 Stat. 507 [4 U. S. Compiled Stats., p. 4604]). The Commission gave to the question exhaustive study and research, and made its written report, which was approved by the Secretary of War and transmitted to the House of Representatives in June, 1911. Devastating floods had occurred in 1907 and 1908. As soon as the substance of the report was made known, the Governor of the state included in his call for a special session of the Legislature the consideration of this great question. This session was called to convene on November 27, 1911, and was directed—> * * * and to make an appropriation to pay the expenses of the state engineer in the performance of such additional duties as may be imposed, and creating a reclamation board and defining its powers."

"to enact laws and pass resolutions concerning the report of the California Débris Commission,

The report of the Débris Commission formulated a general plan. It was recognized that modifications of this general plan might be necessary, and that the details of it were still to be worked out. The reclamation board created by the Legislature was called into existence to do these things. The Legislature declared that the problem of navigation and reclamation should be solved in accordance with the plan of the California Débris Commission, with such amendments and modifications as the state reclamation board might make. The report of the National California Débris Commission thus and to this extent became a part of the laws of this state. Stats. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 117.

A brief consideration of that report here becomes necessary. Primarily charged with the duty of maintaining and improving the navigability of the river, the Commission recognized that the solution of this problem was indissolubly and inseparably connected with the control of the flood waters. Says the report:

> "The interests of navigation, débris control and flood control in the case of this river are so inseparably connected that it is thought they should be considered under one general project."

The report found that in the American and Feather rivers alone there were at least 300,000,000 cubic yards of material which must eventually pass down the Sacramento river to tidewater, and this without reference to the necessity of deepening the lower courses and channel of the river below Sacramento, which were already greatly impeded by shoal water and sand bars. It pointed out the utter incapacity of the stream in times of high water to perform any considerable part of the duty of carrying these waters. It discussed at length the geographical and topographical conditions, and described with elaboration the "basins" as in outline we have hereinbefore described them. It declared in its estimate that a proper control of the floods would result in the reclamation of about 400,000 acres of most fertile land, in addition to protecting 300,000 acres more, now reclaimed but always in danger. Reviewing the various suggested methods, the Débris Commission adopted the "by-pass system" as recommended by engineers Grunsky and Jackson in 1894, with enlargements of the work made desirable by added knowledge of the enormity of the floods.

The by-pass system contemplates, first, the erection of levees along the Sacramento river and its tributaries, the closing up of crevasses and sloughs, so that the highest efficiency may be attained for navigability and as a necessary concomitant for enabling the river to carry débris and aid in the scouring and deepening of its own channel. Artificial spillways or wiers are to be constructed at designated points to take out of the river its excess or flood waters, which are thus immediately brought under control. These waters are to be carried down defined canals or channels in the basins, which are known as "by-passes." Through the ridges, as at Knight's Landing, these will be actual canals dug through the soil. In other places they will be in part surface canals bounded by appropriate levees upon either side. The greatest of these basins, and the one forming the most direct connection with tide water, is the Yolo basin. Beginning with the Colusa basin on the west side of the river, the by-pass in this basin leads through a canal in the Knight's Landing ridge into the Yolo basin. By this same system the waters of the smaller Butte basin are led by a by-pass into the larger Sutter basin by-pass. These accumulated waters are taken into the enlarged Feather river above its junction with the Sacramento, controlled by appropriate wiers and levees and diverted into the Yolo basin, and by another defined by-pass along Cache creek are carried into the main stream at the delta lands near its mouth.

It is with this contemplated work, as touching Butte basin and Sutter basin that we are here principally concerned. About 13 miles above Colusa, upon the east side of the river, there is a break in the bank known as "Moulton's break," through which the flood waters poured into Butte basin. This break is to be controlled by a wier. Into Butte basin flows Butte creek, whose waters, with the river waters of Moulton wier, are to be carried by a by-pass into Sutter basin, which, so far as may be observed by the eye, is but a continuation of Butte basin. Butte creek discharges its waters into Butte slough, which, as hereinbefore pointed out, is another break in the eastern bank of the Sacramento river, through which break the waters of the river pour into the basin in flood times, and through which break the waters of Butte creek are drawn into the Sacramento at its lower stages. Butte slough is to be cut off, and below it a wier known as the "Tisdale Wier" has been constructed, with a connecting by-pass from the river leading into the main by-pass of the Sutter basin. The water is thus to be carried within the defined boundaries of the Butte basin by-pass, connecting with the Sutter basin by-pass, into the Feather and Sacramento rivers as above outlined. Through Sutter basin the by-pass or canal is partly on the surface, and the waters are to be carried between controlling levees built on either side. The waters of the connecting Tisdale by-pass are likewise to be confined within levees.

This, for our purposes, sufficiently outlines the proposed work. In 1913 the state of California enacted a most comprehensive statute (St. 1913, p. 252) dealing with these matters. It declared (§ 7) that:

> "The purposes and objects of this act are to carry into effect the plans of the California Débris Commission for the control of the flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries, and to vest in said reclamation board control and jurisdiction over said plans," etc.

It gave the reclamation board power to acquire necessary lands by purchase or by condemnation to carry out the great purposes of the act. It forbade the further doing of reclamation work by individuals or districts, excepting under the approval of the board, to the end that such work might not interfere with and might be directed to the aid of the general scheme of reclamation. It provided for compensation to individuals or districts doing work in and of the general plan. It created a vast drainage district known and designated as "Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District," declared it to be a body politic and corporate, and empowered it to levy assessments according to the benefits for the prosecution of the work. All of the lands of plaintiffs, as well as of the lands of defendants, lie within this district.

Some idea of the magnitude of the undertaking may be gathered when it is stated that the actual flood volume of the Sacramento river is exceeded by only three rivers in the United States—the Mississippi below its confluence with the Missouri, the Ohio river, and the Columbia river; while taking into consideration the relative areas of drainage territory, the flood volume of the Sacramento is 15 times as great as that of the Mississippi and four times as great as that of either the Ohio or the Columbia.

Progress has been and is being made in the doing of this work. Thus, to accommodate the waters brought down by the Yolo by-pass, equal appropriations and expenditures are being made by the national and state governments to deepen and widen the mouth of the river, the national government superintending the work. Congress at its present session has appropriated $5,600,000 in furtherance of the plan, and the act has become law. The city of Sacramento has provided a large fund for the construction of a minor by-pass for its own protection. The canal through Knight's Landing ridge, allowing the waters of Colusa basin to flow into Yolo basin, has been constructed. Other work has been performed by individuals and by districts, as outlined and approved by the reclamation board.

[3] In 1913 reclamation district No. 1500, defendant herein, was created by a special act of the Legislature. Stats. 1913, p. 130. The lands of reclamation district No. 1500 are a part of the lands of Sutter basin. Their western frontage is on the Sacramento river. The northern boundary is the Tisdale by-pass. The eastern boundary (that is so far as reclamation works are permitted) is the proposed eastern line of the Sutter by-pass. In the terms of its creation it was declared:

> "It shall be the duty of said reclamation district No. 1500 to construct a levee forming the south side of Tisdale by-pass and a portion of the westerly side of the Sutter basin by-pass, the center line of which levee shall be substantially along the following lines, the same having been approved by the state reclamation board March 31, 1913."

The act creating this reclamation district is a public statute. The construction of the levees is the execution of this public statute. Reclamation Dist. 1500 v. Superior Court, supra. In the performance of this duty and under the direction and approval of the reclamation board, the defendant had constructed the levee forming the southern boundary of the Tisdale by-pass and was carrying on its work by the construction of the connecting levee, which was to form the western boundary of the Sutter basin by-pass, when by the injunction of the court it was ordered to cease work and destroy the levees which it had already constructed.

The foregoing statement has failed utterly in its purpose if it has not made it apparent that many different interests are here involved, with their corresponding rights and duties. Thus, there is primarily the interest of the United States in protecting and improving the navigation of the Sacramento river and its navigable tributaries. And as this navigability is inextricably associated with flood conditions, there are the rights of the United States to deal with those flood conditions in aid of navigation. Next there is the same interest upon the part of the state in navigation and the same rights in the matter of flood control. Upon these matters the nation and the state are acting, not only in harmony, but, it may be fairly said, under contract. Quite detached from these interests is the further interest of the state alone in the reclamation and bringing into use of its swamp and overflowed land—an interest which is accentuated by the duties which it may have assumed under its acceptance of the Arkansas grant. Next are the interest and the duty of defendant reclamation district to build the levees, which by the very charter of its organization it was called upon to build, and which by the acceptance of that charter it became in duty bound to build. Again, there is the interest of the owners of the land within the defendant reclamation district, which is, of course, essentially a private and personal interest. And, finally, as opposed to all of these, is the interest of plaintiffs in preventing, and their right to prevent, an illegal damaging of their property, which asserted illegal damage is the foundation of their action.

[4] In their complaint plaintiffs treat the action of the defendant reclamation district as being in its nature private and personal and as working a private nuisance to the unlawful injury of their land. Running through the case, however, is the additional assertion that the construction of these levees, with the resultant backing up of the water over parts of their lands, is an unlawful exercise of the right of eminent domain, damaging their property without compensation first paid therefor.

And here it becomes necessary to outline the findings of the trial court upon which it based its judgment. It was imperative, of course, for plaintiffs to recognize that the major part of the vast volume of water in Sutter basin was flood water. Their efforts, therefore, were directed to establishing that they were not vagrant flood waters, but were waters under the river's control, and that the river carried these excess waters through a well-defined waterway or channel from a point above to a point below. In this effort they were successful and the court so found. The whole judgment rests upon this finding that Butte slough and Sutter basin in their entirety form a natural water course. From this finding follows the logical conclusion that defendant has not been protecting itself against flood waters, but has been illegally interfering, obstructing, and impeding the waters flowing in a natural watercourse. The court itself reasoned and declared that Butte slough is a well-defined channel extending from the Sacramento river southerly to the basin; that Butte creek empties much of its waters into Butte slough; that during flood or high-water periods the waters pouring into Butte slough from the Sacramento river deflected the waters of Butte creek from Butte slough, and the two combining flow into Sutter basin. As the water flows southerly through the basin it spreads out and forms a vast sheet of water, presenting the appearance of an inland sea. Sacramento slough, at the lower end of this basin, is a well-defined water course, and is the outlet of the basin when the waters of the river fall sufficiently to permit the drainage of the basin. Thus the inlet and outlet of the basin are well-defined water courses within the definition of Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391. Such, in brief, is the court's review, and it declares that:

> "The one controlling question in the opinion of the court, and which is practically decisive in both cases, is whether or not Sutter basin is to be regarded as a part of the Sacramento river, a continuation of Butte creek during the flood season, or whether it is to be classified as mere flood waters and brought within the rule announced in Lamb v. Reclamation District, 73 Cal. 125 [14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775]; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515 [23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575]; Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157 [32 Pac. 976, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163]; and Sanguinnetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466 [69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169]."

The first proposition which demands consideration as applicable to this and numerous other cases which have arisen or may arise goes to the power of the government, here both national and state, to do the projected work, assuming the finding to be true. This consideration deals with navigation alone, though as has been repeatedly said, in the present instance, the control of flood conditions is essential to the solution of the navigation difficulties. As in this matter the national government is working in harmony with the state government, we may, for convenience, use the word "state." The supreme control of the state over its navigable waters was early declared in Eldridge v. Cowell, 4 Cal. 80, approved in United States v. Mission Rock Co., 189 U. S. 391, 23 Sup. Ct. 606, 47 L. Ed. 865.

[5] This right of control embraces within it not alone the power to destroy the navigability of certain waters for the benefit of others, but extends in the case of streams to the power to regulate and control the navigable or nonnavigable tributaries, as in the débris cases, to the erection of structures along or across the stream, to deepening or changing the channel, to diverting or arresting tributaries, in short, to do anything subserving the great purpose; and, in general, when the act is done, if it does not embrace the actual taking of property, but results merely in some injurious effect upon the property, the property owner must, for the sake of the general welfare, yield uncompensated obedience. But a few of the innumerable cases to this effect need be cited. Lamb v. Reclamation District, 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; Henry Dalton Sons v. Oakland, 168 Cal. 463, 143 Pac. 721; U. S. v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U. S. 53, 33 Sup. Ct. 667, 57 L. Ed. 1063; Lewis Blue Point Oyster Co. v. Briggs, 229 U. S. 82, 33 Sup. Ct. 679, 57 L. Ed. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 232; Greenleaf Johnson Lumber Co. v. United States (D. C.) 204 Fed. 489; Black River Imp. Co. v. La Crosse Booming & T. Co., 54 Wis. 659, 11 N. W. 443, 41 Am. Rep. 66. See, also, Final Report of the National Waterways Committee, 15 Senate Documents, p. 45, 66th Congress (2d Sess.) 1911–12; People v. Russ, 132 Cal. 102, 64 Pac. 111; U. S. v. Rio Grande Dam, etc., Co., 174 U. S. 690, 19 Sup. Ct. 770, 43 L. Ed. 1136.

[6] This general power, so far as the national government is concerned, is found in the constitutional grant to the United States of the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states, and the state's power in this regard is limited only by the supervisory control which the paramount authority may exercise over it. This power over navigable waters and over navigation is essentially an attribute of sovereignty, and some of its forms find expression in the exercise of the police power.

[7] When we come to this consideration it is perhaps well to point out and to be borne in mind that as the nation, in matters of navigation, is supreme, and as it has decided upon the method which shall be taken to protect and improve the navigability of the Sacramento river, and as the state is acting in conjunction with the federal government, the question might be treated as an exercise by the federal government alone of its powers over the matter. In such a case, so treated, as we shall see, these plaintiffs would have no grievance which in the federal courts would entitle them to redress. But owing to the inseparable connection between navigation and flood control, and owing to the further fact, often adverted to, that the state is interested in flood control, not alone as affecting navigation, but as affecting its general welfare and benefit in the reclamation of vast domains of land, the exercise of the police power under these circumstances presents a twofold aspect: First, the exercise of that power by the United States for purposes of navigation alone; second, the exercise of that power by the state for purposes of reclamation as well as navigation. In both aspects it is beyond question that the acts and conduct of the two governments are referable to the police power. Of this the decisions themselves remove all doubt. Though, of course, whether in any given instance, as in this instance, the proper limits of the police power have been exceeded, with the result that unlawful confiscation or damage is worked, remains still a question for consideration. But upon the general proposition that the police power is exercised in improving the navigability of a stream, it is sufficient to refer in our own state to Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536, Hoagland v. City of Sacramento, 52 Cal. 142, and Green v. State, 73 Cal. 29, 11 Pac. 602, 14 Pac. 610, while so far as the national government is concerned, it is sufficient to direct attention to Jackson v. United States, 230 U. S. 1, 33 Sup. Ct. 1011, 57 L. Ed. 1363, and Cubbins v. Mississippi River Comm. (D. C.) 204 Fed. 299. In both of these cases the Supreme Court of the United States was dealing with asserted damages inflicted by the levee system of the Mississippi river, whose conditions are in all vital respects similar to those of the Sacramento river.

[8] Upon the second proposition, viz. that the drainage and reclamation of lands, apart from any question of navigability, is a legitimate exercise of the police power of a state, it is sufficient, without quotation, to refer to Hagar v. Board of Supervisors, 47 Cal. 222; Lamb v. Reclamation Dist., 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; People ex rel. Chapman v. Sacramento D. Dis., 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207; Laguna, etc., Dist. v. Martin Co., 144 Cal. 209, 77 Pac. 933; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Chicago & Alton R. R. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 35 Sup. Ct. 678, 59 L. Ed. 1204.

[9] Still treating the question in its governmental aspect as being the state's exercise of its police power, we have reached the point in our discussion where it can be declared as beyond question that the general act under which this work was being done is referable to the police power, and therefore valid, and as a necessary corollary of this it follows that if in the doing of this particular piece of work the limits of the police power are not transgressed, the plaintiffs have no just cause of complaint, it is too well recognized to need the citation of authority that in its legitimate exercise the police power often works, not only damage to property, but destruction of property. Injury to property can, and often does, result from the demolition of buildings to prevent the spread of conflagration, from the abandonment of an existing highway, from the enforced necessity of improving property in particular ways to conform to police regulations and requirements. So full are the books of these instances that it is superfluous to cite authorities upon the proposition. And equally well settled and understood is the law that in the exercise of this same power property may in some and indeed in many instances be utterly destroyed. The destruction of buildings, of diseased animals, of rotten fruit, of infected trees, are cases that at once come to mind as applicable to both personalty and realty. Always the question in each case is whether the particular act complained of is without the legitimate purview and scope of the police power. If it be, then the complainant is entitled to injunctive relief or to compensation. If it be not, then it matters not what may be his loss, it is damnum absque injuria.

[10] Our present question then is: Is the state of California liable in damages in exercising the police power in the control of a nonnavigable water drain or water course of the Sacramento river when in so regulating this flow it causes the water to back against lands which otherwise would not have been affected thereby, with the result that those lands are temporarily flooded in whole or in part? Temporarily flooded, we repeat, because this case presents none of the features of Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. Ed. 557, where a public improvement—a dam—in navigable water, made under local statutory authority, permanently flooded the plaintiff's land and "destroyed its use for every purpose," and where the Supreme Court, declaring the case to be an extreme one, held that this was a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, for which the owner was entitled to compensation. In the case at bar it is to be observed that the flooding, occasioned only by reason of the diminution of the area of the Sutter basin, will in the first place be but temporary, and will end when the reclamation works in the Sutter basin are completed, and, in the second place, may be protected against by the levee district, in which most of plaintiff's lands are situated, and by the other property owners by a back levee, or by the construction of the eastern levee of the Sutter basin by-pass, for their proportionate expense in building which their lands would be liable under assessment by the Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District; while, upon the other hand, the builders would be entitled to compensation from that district for any excess expenditure over their due proportion which they might incur in the construction of the work.

But that work of the character here enjoined is work done under a legitimate exercise of the police power, and that the damages which will result from it, such as are here contended for, are damages for which the owner of the land is not entitled to compensation, is, without the slightest conflict in them, established by all authorities, federal and state, at least where the constitutional provision forbids merely a taking. Our own cases, such as Green v. Swift, supra, and the cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, such as the Jackson Case and the Cubbins Case, supra, are the only references which need be made to support this incontestable declaration.

Such being the case, the final query upon this subject-matter is this: Has the amended provision in our Constitution, providing that private property may neither be taken nor damaged for public use without the prepayment of compensation, limited and abridged the exercise of the police power of the state in its efforts directed to the abatement of this great public nuisance?

[11, 12] Has it limited and abridged the exercise of the police power, which, by an adopted definition, this court has declared to be in its final analysis "the power to govern"? Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 694, 151 Pac. 398. Much has been said by the courts about the broad, the obvious distinction between the police power and the power of eminent domain. We will not unnecessarily enmesh ourselves in the intricacies of exact definition. Indeed, we think that so far as these powers meet and overlap, no precise definition can be given. But this much is incontestably true: Where the police power is legitimately exercised uncompensated submission is exacted of the property owner if his property be either damaged, taken, or destroyed. In the exercise of the power of eminent domain, compensated obedience for the taking or damaging of his property is the owner's constitutional right.

The problems do not arise from any similarity in the nature of the powers themselves. They arise in each case from the difficulty of determining whether or not the asserted exercise of the police power is but a disguise for evading the private owner's rights, with the result that his property is taken or damaged without compensation in a case where compensation is called for.

But we are here particularly concerned with that phase of the police power which is directed to the abatement of a nuisance in aid of navigation and in the reclamation of vast tracts of state land. Where similar questions have arisen in states containing the same constitutional provision as does our own, the courts have found no hesitation in declaring that the principle of damnum absque injuria has not been modified by the provision added to the constitutional law of eminent domain touching the damaging of private property. The general rule, so far as the federal decisions are concerned, has been sufficiently declared. It may be summed up in the following language from 5 Ency. of the U. S. Sup. Court Reports, page 612:

> "Private interests are subservient to the right of the state in the exercise of the police power to carry out a system of drainage designed to benefit and protect the public health from the injuries arising from swamp and overflowed lands, and, except where property is taken for which compensation must be paid, such interests must give way to any general scheme for the reclamation or improvement of such lands. The drainage of large bodies of swamp and overflowed lands, even though done for the purpose of reclaiming them for agricultural purposes, and not for the purpose of promoting the public health, is a public purpose and a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and damages resulting to property through the carrying out of such a scheme are damnum absque injuria, and do not constitute a taking of property under the Fourteenth Amendment."

We may briefly consider some of the cases arising under Constitutions identical with our own. The Constitution of Illinois contains the same provision found in ours. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. People, 212 Ill. 103, 72 N. E. 219, drainage commissioners appointed pursuant to the law sought by mandate to compel the railway company to construct, enlarge, and deepen and widen a waterway over and across its own right of way, and to construct a new railroad bridge over this deepened waterway. The railroad company contested upon the ground that the demand was not within the legitimate exercise of the police power, but, to the contrary, that its enforcement would be a taking and damaging of the railroad property in the necessary expenditure of money to be made, without compensation. The Supreme Court of Illinois declared:

> "Uncompensated obedience to a regulation enacted for the public safety under the police power of the state is not a taking or damaging, without just compensation, of private property, or of private property affected with a public interest,"

—and mandate issued accordingly. In the same case (200 U. S. 561, 26 Sup. Ct. 341, 50 L. Ed. 596, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175), the Supreme Court of the United States declared, upholding the judgment of the Supreme Court of the state:

> "We hold that the police power of a state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity, as well as regulations designed to promote the public health, the public morals or the public safety. * * * 'Compensation has never been a condition of its exercise, even when attendant with inconvenience or peculiar loss, as each member of a community is presumed to be benefited by that which promotes the general welfare.' * * * But the clause prohibiting the taking of private property without compensation 'is not intended as a limitation of the exercise of those police powers which are necessary to the tranquillity of every well-ordered community, nor of that general power over private property which is necessary for the orderly existence of all governments.'"

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541, 13 Atl. 690, 4 Am. St. Rep. 659, the Constitution provided that in the taking of private property for public use there should be made "just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the destruction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury, or destruction." It was held there that the meaning of the Constitution was "to give a remedy merely for legal wrongs and not for such injuries as were damnum absque injuria." This case, carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, was affirmed in 153 U. S. 380, 14 Sup. Ct. 894, 38 L. Ed. 751. The Georgia Constitution, containing the same provision, was construed in Peel v. City of Atlanta, 85 Ga. 138, 11 S. E. 582, 8 L. R. A. 787. The city, owning a lot of land, opened a public street upon it. The plaintiff complained that her land was damaged because the result was to bound it on three sides by three public streets. There were other special elements of damage alleged. After a review of the law it was held that the asserted damage, though actual, was damnum absque injuria. To the same effect is Austin v. Augusta T. Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 671, 34 S. E. 852, 47 L. R. A. 755. Chicago & Alton Ry. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 35 Sup. Ct. 678, 59 L. Ed. 1204, presented this same question under a different state of facts. The case arose under a Missouri statute. In that state the rule of decision permits a proprietor to levee or make an embankment against surface waters. The railroad company had done this thing, with the result that the surface waters thus checked and impounded interfered with the use of Tranbarger's land. The state of Missouri passed a statute making it compulsory upon railroad companies to build suitable ditches, drains, and culverts through their embankments, and providing penalties for a failure to construct them. Tranbarger sued the railroad company to enforce such a penalty based upon the injury which his land had sustained. It was argued by the railroad company that at the time and after the construction of their embankment it was within their legal right to maintain it as it was maintained, without regard to the fact that it arrested the flow of surface water; that to force them to make cuts and culverts through their embankments without compensation was a taking and damaging of their property in violation of the Constitution. So far as the taking or damaging was concerned, it was clear and undeniable. It is declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a satisfactory answer to all these objections that:

> "The act under consideration is a legitimate exercise of the police power, and not in any proper sense a taking of the property of the plaintiff in error."

In the state of Washington, where the constitutional provision is the same as ours, it was held that the operation of a railroad gave no right of action to the owner of nearby property, though his property was injured thereby, such consequential injuries being damnum absque injuria. This was in answer to the contention rested upon the eminent domain provision. The authorities are reviewed and the conclusion is expressed that:

> "We are of the opinion that this eminent domain constitutional provision does not change or lessen the force of the doctrine of damnum absque injuria." Taylor v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. 85 Wash. 592, 148 Pac. 887, L. R. A. 1915E, 634.

In our own state the recent case of Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 132 Pac. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248, held that restricting and forbidding the carrying on of a lawful operation within a prescribed territory was valid as an exercise of the police power whose exercise "is not limited by the fact that the value of investments made in the business prior to any legislative action will be greatly diminished," and this conclusion could have been reached only after the determination that this real damage was damnum absque injuria. Under writ of error the Supreme Court of the United States sustained this view, declaring (239 U. S. 410, 36 Sup. Ct. 145, 60 L. Ed. 348):

> "It is to be remembered that we are dealing with one of the most essential powers of government, one that is the least limitable. It may, indeed, seem harsh in its exercise, usually is on some individual, but the imperative necessity for its existence precludes any limitation upon it when not exerted arbitrarily. A vested interest cannot be asserted against it because of conditions once obtaining. Chicago & Alton R. R. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 68 [35 Sup. Ct. 678, 59 L. Ed. 1204]. To so hold would preclude development and fix a city forever in its primitive conditions. There must be progress, and if in its march private interests are in the way they must yield to the good of the community."

Closely paralleling the present case in certain of its essential features is the Arkansas case of McCoy v. Plum Bayou, etc., Dist., 95 Ark. 345, 129 S. W. 1099, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 396. The case involved the reclamation of a flood basin of the Arkansas river. The reclamation levee was built across certain sloughs through which flood waters from the river found their way after escaping from its banks, and through which the waters returned to the river as it receded. The action was brought, after construction of the levee, to recover for the damages arising from the fact that the flood plane outside of the levee district was raised by the building of the levee, and it was established that the water rose higher afterward than it ever did before. The Supreme Court of Arkansas gave deep consideration to the question, with reference to numerous authorities, including our own case of Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra. After this review the court concluded that:

> "The defendant could rightfully construct the levee in the manner described without liability to plaintiff for damages. It is insisted, however, that a distinction should be made because of the provision of our Constitution that 'private property shall not be taken, appropriated, or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor.' Article 2, § 22, Const. 1874. In reaching the conclusion above announced, we are not unmindful of the constitutional provision, but where no right has been violated, there is no injury for which the liability affords compensation, and it is a case of an injury without damages."

The Supreme Court of Mississippi, under a constitutional provision like ours, where the acts complained of were the acts of its levee commissioners in controlling the waters of the river whose name the state bears, has held that the landowner is not entitled to compensation because the construction of the levee renders the land between it and the river worthless for agriculture and necessitates the removal of houses on the protected side of the levees. Richardson v. Levee Commissioners, 68 Miss. 539, 9 South. 351.

Nothing in any of our decisions in the slightest militates against this conclusion. Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109, contains a discussion of the meaning of the word "damage" as newly placed in the Constitution. The holding was that it applied to special consequential damages which the owner of adjoining property received over and above the common injury to other abutters on the street or the general public, by reason of a street improvement. It based its conclusion largely upon the views of the Supreme Court of Georgia, reference to which has hereinbefore been made. No difficulty arises over this case, which by its very language is limited to special damage occasioned to particular property which is not a common damage to all abutting property. Upon the other hand, in De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237, this court in bank, referring to the contention that because of the modification of our Constitution, the doctrine of Green v. Swift, and Green v. State, and Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra, were no longer the law, passed it by with the statement merely that "it is possible this may be true." But here and now, therefore, for the first time is the question presented, and for the reasons above given, we hold that the doctrine of damnum absque injuria is applicable to the prospective temporary consequential damage which it may be found will be inflicted upon the plaintiffs' lands by the future raising of a flood plane, which floods are of temporary duration and character, which raising the plaintiffs may protect themselves against, and which floods, in the progress of the work, will be taken care of so that future injury will be avoided, all this under the state's plan of vast magnitude and importance to abate, on behalf of the whole state, as well as for the benefit of private landowners, including these plaintiffs, flood conditions, which, if unchecked, would inevitably lead to the destruction of the navigability of the river and to the greater impairment and damage of all the adjacent land. Further than this it is not necessary here to go.

The second branch of this case which is proper for review goes to the right of the defendant, as an organized irrigation district, to do this work for its own protection, without regard to its public character as part of the proposed work of the nation and the state. This necessitates a consideration of the attack made by appellant upon two of the vital findings of the court; the first being the finding that Sutter basin is a natural water course within the meaning and definition of the law, and that the defendant is illegally obstructing it; the second being that these obstructions result in an illegal forcing back on the lands of plaintiffs of surface waters which they are entitled to have flow on without impediment.

[14] Touching the first finding, the topographical and hydrographical conditions have been pointed out with sufficient exactness. All of the waters which Sutter basin contains are emptied into the river when flood conditions have ceased, so that one may drive along and across the whole basin. A depth of water of one foot along the line of greatest depression means an expanse of water a mile on either side, and every addition to the depth of the water proportionately extends its area. In times of high water it is but a geographical continuation of the upper Butte basin, the waters of which from Moulton break, from Butte creek and from minor sloughs and drainage ditches move down, covering a correspondingly vast area. Butte slough, as has been pointed out, has a defined channel only as it cuts through the high lands constituting the east bank of the Sacramento river. Sacramento slough at the lower end has a defined channel of identically the same character. The waters of Tisdale wier pour into this basin as into a lake. The waters of Feather river for seven or eight miles above its junction with the Sacramento likewise pour into this basin. Not inaptly the trial court in its opinion described it under these conditions as an "inland sea," and yet in its findings declared it to be a water course of the Sacramento river. In support of this finding respondents' principal reliance is placed upon the case of Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391. All that was decided in that case touching this matter was that when there are natural and accustomed limits to the channel of a river, though the channel for the dry season may be more limited and that for the wet season more extended, and when usually recurring floods flow in one continuous stream in the accustomed enlarged channel and are naturally confined thereto, such regularly recurring flood waters are deemed to be a part of the ordinary flow of the stream. It would seem superfluous to elaborate upon the distinctions between such a condition as this and that shown here to exist. There are sloughs, principally in the lower reaches of the river, which are properly channels and they are the more frequent near the low-lying lands in the delta regions at and about the confluence of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin. There are Steamboat slough, and Sixteen Mile slough, and Three Mile slough, and Montezuma slough and many others which are distinctively waterways. Such a slough is spoken of in Island Rec. Dist. v. Floribel A. S., 167 Cal. 467, 140 Pac. 4. But, on the other hand, Butte slough in this case is precisely of the character of Wilkins slough, discussed in Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra, the closing of which slough was there complained of. Touching Wilkins slough it was there said:

> "It is not a channel or fork continuously carrying a large part, or any part, of the waters of the Sacramento river. It carries no water at all except 'in times of flood'" —and it was declared not to be a water course. Whether or not a water course exists is "to be determined as matter of law from the evidence in the case." Sanguinnetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169. Under all of the accepted definitions of a water course, our own as well as those from other states, Sutter basin is not a water course but a catchment area, principally for the reception of the flood waters of the Sacramento river. "The whole space between the foothills and a river is not to be called the channel because it sometimes overflows." Kansas City Ry. Co. v. Smith, 72 Miss. 677, 17 South. 78, 27 L. R. A. 762, 48 Am. St. Rep. 579; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 241; Sanguinnetti v. Pock, supra; Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra; Los Angeles Cem. Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375.

[15, 16] Moreover, the reports of the California Débris Commission and of state engineers have been adopted by state statutes. This court takes judicial notice of them. Jackson v. U. S., 230 U. S. 1, 33 Sup. Ct. 1011, 57 L. Ed. 1363. In addition to this, the history of the state, its topographical and its general conditions, including notorious facts concerning its rivers, are all matters of judicial cognizance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 401, 48 Pac. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183; Olive v. State of Alabama, 86 Ala. 88, 5 South. 653, 4 L. R. A. 39, and note; Chamberlayne, Evidence, § 74. This evidence, within our judicial knowledge, absolutely negatives the concept of a water course. The same contention was presented to the Supreme Court in the case of the Mississippi river, whose flood conditions have been recognized and declared to be similar to those of the Sacramento (Lamb v. Reclamation District, supra), and the Supreme Court of the United States declared the contention untenable upon its own judicial knowledge. Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 351, 36 Sup. Ct. 671, 60 L. Ed. 1041.

[17] Respondents' final argument in support of this finding, that by an inspection of the premises which the court made it received evidence which is not embodied in the transcript on appeal, and which must be considered as sufficient to support the finding, upon the authority of Hatton v. Gregg, 4 Cal. App. 537, 88 Pac. 592, is completely disposed of, without the necessity for considering any other matters, by the judge's own statement, as follows:

> "So far as receiving any evidence, I cannot say that I did. I simply received a brief impression of the country."

Such a view, taken for the purpose of gaining a better understanding of the evidence given, will not, of course, be held to be the taking of independent evidence from which such a finding as this may draw support.

Independently of the findings establishing a natural water course, the court further declared that defendants' levee work impeded the natural flow of surface waters, and would force them back on plaintiffs' lands. Herein it stated that there are "numerous creeks and water courses * * * which gather up, and from time immemorial have gathered up, the surface waters which flow upon the above-described lands of plaintiffs and other lands in the vicinity thereof in said county of Sutter, * * * and which creeks and water courses carry and deposit such waters naturally into said Sutter basin, * * * and at times of heavy rainfall in every year carry not less than 2,400 second feet of water"; further, that the by-pass or channel east of the levee of defendant will not be "sufficient to carry off or discharge all or any material portion of the surface waters that would otherwise flow to and upon the lands within said district." This is explained by an elaboration of the finding, which declares that the completion of defendants' levee work will result in a diversion of the waters of Sutter basin "and the diverted waters will at all seasons of high water be raised to such an extent as to form a 'Water Cushion,' which will effectually impede and obstruct the natural flow and prevent the natural discharge of all waters mentioned, all of which waters are surface waters, and will cause the same to overflow and leave their natural courses and to spread out over and inundate the lands of plaintiffs." And, finally, that the elevation of the flood plane will not be caused entirely by flood waters; "on the contrary it will be caused by the obstruction of said Sutter basin, which is a natural water course, and the waters so obstructed will be the combination of the natural flow of Butte creek, or surface waters from the watershed lying between Feather river and the Sutter basin and of flood waters."

[18] Surface waters, it is well understood, are those waters from rainfall, from melting snows, from springs, which seeping or percolating, or vagrantly wandering over the surface of the earth, finally, in obedience to natural law gather into well-defined channels, where their character as surface waters at once ceases and the waters themselves take on the new character of the body of a defined stream. Gould on Waters (2d Ed.) § 265; Farnham, Water & Water Rights, § 878; Schaefer v. Marthaler, 34 Minn. 487, 26 N. W. 727, 57 Am. Rep. 73; Rait v. Furrow, 74 Kan. 101, 85 Pac. 934, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 157, 10 Ann. Cas. 1044. We will not pause here to discuss appellants' contention that these findings from which we have quoted are self-destructive, in that they include in and define as surface waters those flowing in what the court declares to be natural, well-defined water courses. In fact it is established, and it is beyond question of doubt, that some of these are natural creeks within well-defined channels, which gather up the rainfall in so far as their capacities permit. In times of heavy rains their channels are wholly inadequate for this purpose and the waters spread out, precisely as they do in the case of the larger rivers. In some instances artificial drains have been constructed communicating with these natural channels, in others the natural channels themselves have been enlarged. But, passing on to the main question, the court does not mean to find that this small amount of 2,400 feet of water in comparison to the enormous flood flow, aggregating over 220,000 feet, is or could be so obstructed by the works of defendant that adequate drainage has not been left for the passage of the surface water alone. Its finding in this regard is explained by the language which we have already quoted, and which means that the curtailment of the flood basin creates out of these flood waters a "Water Cushion" which will arrest the flow of the surface water and cause it to back up and overflow parts of plaintiffs' lands.

[19] But the defendant's right to protect and levee against flood waters cannot be questioned. Nor is this right impaired by the fact that these surface waters, as they usually do, form some part of the whole volume of water. A landowner has performed his full duty under such circumstances if he make adequate provision for the escape of the surface waters alone. In this aspect the present case is precisely that of Sanguinnetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169. There is no finding in this case that the channel which is left is insufficient to take care of the surface waters were it not for the flood waters, and Sanguinnetti v. Pock is full authority for the statement that if such an adequate channel is left, defendant's right to construct its levee against flood waters is not impaired by the consequences which may result from a commingling of the flood and the surface waters.

[20] Sanguinnetti v. Pock is determinative of the question, but there is another consideration which may with propriety be adverted to. Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346, 13 Am. Rep. 213, declared for the civil law rule, forbidding a lower owner from interfering with the natural drainage of surface waters onto his land from the proprietor whose lands were higher. It was an adoption of the civil-law rule (Walker v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 165 U. S. 593, 17 Sup. Ct. 421, 41 L. Ed. 837; Cass v. Dicks, 14 Wash. 75, 44 Pac. 113, 53 Am. St. Rep. 859), notwithstanding the fact that the common-law rules are made the rules of decision in this state, where applicable (Stats. 1850, p. 219; Pol. Code, § 4468). And this is made quite apparent from the later case of McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575. But in the last-mentioned case it is added that a rule of property has grown out of the earlier decision and, on the principle of stare decisis, that decision will be adhered to. But it is a rule which this court would have the power to abrogate by the adoption of the common-law rule if in its judgment this were the wiser policy to pursue. Jones v. Cal. Devel. Co., 160 Pac. 823. It is of course a rule which the Legislature itself could change. For a rule of property is not a vested right in property which may not be taken away without compensation. This case, then, though in different form, presents the features of the Tranbarger Case, 238 U. S. 68, 35 Sup. Ct. 678, 59 L. Ed. 1204. The Missouri constitutional provision, as has been pointed out, is the same as ours. The rule as to surface waters was the common-law rule authorizing the landowner to protect himself against them. It was as much a rule of property as the civil-law rule in this state is a rule of property. By statutory enactment the state of Missouri modified the rule as to the railroad company, and compelled it under penalties and at great personal expense to make provision for cuts, drains, and culverts to allow the escape of surface water from the land of Tranbarger upon which, before that law it had, so far as the conduct of the railroad company was concerned, legally stood. One of the contentions of the railroad company before the Supreme Court of the United States was that this rule of property gave it a vested right of which it was not only divested by the statute in question, but in the divestiture there was imposed upon it great expense and a taking of property without process of law. The Supreme Court of the United States made answer as follows:

> "The previous immunity from responsibility for such injury was nothing more than a general rule of law, which was not in terms or by necessary intendment imported into the contract. For just as no person has a vested right in any general rule of law or policy of legislation entitling him to insist that it shall remain unchanged for his benefit (Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 134 [24 L. Ed. 77]; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 532 [4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232]; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 495 [24 Sup. Ct. 349, 48 L. Ed. 525]; Martin v. Pittsburg, etc., Co., 203 U. S. 284, 294 [27 Sup. Ct. 100, 51 L. Ed. 184, 8 Ann. Cas. 87]), so an immunity from a change of the general rules of law will not ordinarily be implied as an unexpressed term of an express contract. See Gross v. United States Mortgage Co., 108 U. S. 477, 488 [2 Sup. Ct. 940, 27 L. Ed. 795]; Pennsylvania R. R. v. Miller, 132 U. S. 75, 83 [10 Sup. Ct. 34, 33 L. Ed. 267]."

Certainly with this authority before us, an argument of no little weight could be advanced to the effect that the state of California, in making it the duty of this reclamation district to construct these levees in furtherance of its own work did, as did the state of Missouri; that is to say, it set aside the rule of law as to surface waters so far as that rule would operate to impede the great purpose which it had in view.

But we need not pursue this suggestion further, nor base our decision upon it, since what has been said and shown besides and beyond this argument, affords complete justification for the action of defendants. And herein we may conclude with the language of the Supreme Court in Jackson v. United States, 230 U. S. 1, 33 Sup. Ct. 1011, 57 L. Ed. 1363, where, to a complainant under like circumstances, it made answer that, even though his land, because of the proposed work, would be subject to occasional overflow, though never overflowed before, "there would be no right on the part of an individual to insist that primitive conditions be suffered to remain, and thus all progress and development to be rendered impossible," and that the untenable position of plaintiffs is "that they have the right to stereotype the conditions existing at the time they built their levees to the extent of preventing anyone from subsequently exerting his right to build a levee to protect his land."

It is manifest that this case, so far as evidentiary matters are concerned, was most thoroughly tried in the court below. This court, however, is unable to make findings of fact. If, on the going down of the remittitur it shall appear that no further material evidence is to be presented, the trial court will make its findings in accordance with the legal views here expressed and render its judgment accordingly.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

DEAN v. HAWES. (Civ. 1971.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1237—Liability of Surety—Statute.

Under the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 942, where a judgment was modified and affirmed on appeal, and the remittitur issued thereon, and appellant did not pay the judgment within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur from the Supreme Court in the court from which the appeal was taken, judgment was properly entered against the sureties on the undertaking to stay execution for the amount of the modified judgment and interest and costs.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1233—Bonds—Action Against Sureties.

In determining the amount of the judgment to be entered against sureties on an undertaking to stay execution, the trial court had no jurisdiction to consider costs which had been awarded the appellant on two earlier appeals, for which he had then instituted proceedings to collect, which were still pending and are involved in another appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Santa Cruz County; B. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Henrietta S. Dean, judgment creditor, against George W. Hawes, judgment debtor, and Geo. W. Wood and another, sureties on undertaking to stay execution. Judgment for plaintiff against the sureties, and Hawes appeals. Affirmed.

George W. Hawes, in pro. per. Chas. B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff taken against W. E. Vandervort and George W. Wood for the sum of $614 in this action, in which the above persons were the sureties of the appellant herein upon an undertaking to stay execution upon a former appeal. The judgment upon such former appeal having been modified in some respects, but otherwise affirmed, and the remittitur having issued thereon, and the appellant not having paid the amount of said judgment, the judgment creditor caused a judgment to be entered against the said sureties upon the undertaking on appeal in accordance with the terms of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The sureties have not appealed from said judgment, but the defendant, their principal, prosecutes this appeal therefrom.

It is contended by the respondent that the appeal should be dismissed for the reason that the defendant has no right of appeal from a judgment taken under said section of the Code against his sureties on a former appeal. We do not deem it necessary, however, to decide this question, for the reason that we find from the record before us that there is no merit otherwise in this appeal.

[1] The status of this case is quite fully set forth in the decision of this court upon the former appeal. Dean v. Hawes, 29 Cal. App. 689, 157 Pac. 558. The judgment affirmed upon that appeal after the modification noted therein was for the sum of $460. This judgment, of course, carried interest upon said sum from the date of its original rendition, and also carried the costs awarded to plaintiff upon the trial of the case. These two accretions to it made up the sum of $614, for which judgment was properly entered against the sureties of appellant under section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant, however, insists that, since he had been awarded his costs against the plaintiff upon said former appeal, and also upon a still earlier appeal, these two amounts, which he asserts aggregate the sum of $214.56, should have been deducted by the trial court from the amount for which this judgment against the sureties was taken. The record discloses, however, that the defendant and appellant herein had already and prior to the taking of this judgment against his sureties instituted proceedings against the plaintiff for the collection of his two former awards of costs, and that those matters are involved in another appeal yet to come before this court.

[2] Under such conditions the trial court had no jurisdiction to deal with those matters in determining the amount of the judgment to be entered against the defendant's sureties and from which the present appeal was taken. There is no merit, therefore, in the appellant's contention upon the present appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by E. N. Smith against Samuel Semon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry Gottesfeld and Edward Lande, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the balance claimed to be due upon a contract for the purchase of an automobile from the assignor of the plaintiff.

The chief and only meritorious defense urged by the defendant in his pleadings and upon the trial of the cause consisted in his averments and proffered proofs, that he had made a certain settlement with the seller of the automobile and assignor of plaintiff, by the terms of which his contract had been canceled and his obligation to make further payments thereon terminated, in good faith and without notice of the prior transfer of the contract to the plaintiff. Upon this particular issue the evidence before the trial court showed the following state of facts: On March 10, 1915, the defendant made and entered into a contract for a conditional sale to him of an automobile by one D. J. Alberger, doing business under the name and style of D. J. Alberger Auto Sales Company, by the terms of which contract the said Alberger agreed to sell said automobile to the defendant for the sum of $775, of which the sum of $200 was to be paid on the date of said contract, and of which the balance was to be paid in stipulated monthly installments, the title of the machine to remain in the seller until these payments had been fully made. Attached to said contract was a printed form of notice, to the effect that D. J. Alberger had upon the date thereof sold, assigned, and transferred said contract, together with his right, title, and interest in the automobile covered thereby; and that his sole connection with said contract thereafter would be that of an agent of the assignee thereof for the sole purpose of collecting the payments to become due thereon; and that all other dealings in relation to said contract must be had with the assignee thereof. The spaces in said form of notice which should contain the name of the assignee of the contract were blank at the time of the execution of said contract and notice and at the time of the written acknowledgment of the receipt of a copy of such notice by the defendant, and which was signed by him at the same time that the contract itself was executed, viz. on the 10th day of March, 1915. The evidence further showed that the plaintiff became the purchaser and assignee of said contract on or about April 7, 1915, and that the blanks in said notice had been filled in with his name, as assignee of said contract, when the same was delivered to him. There was no evidence before the court that the transfer of said contract had not been made in good faith and for value. The plaintiff did not give to the defendant any other formal notice of the transfer of the contract to him, but there was some evidence before the court to the effect that upon one occasion after the date of the transfer of the contract to the plaintiff the defendant, coming to the place of business of Alberger, had there met and been introduced to the plaintiff by said Alberger in these words, as testified to by the plaintiff:

> "Mr. Semon, this is Mr. Smith. You know who he is. You hold some of his papers."

Testifying as to this meeting the plaintiff continued:

> "There was no special conversation, except that I wished him success in the dealings we had together."

The defendant admits a casual meeting with the plaintiff at the time and place stated, but denies that there was any such conversation. Several weeks later the automobile was very seriously damaged in a collision, and was by the defendant taken or sent to the place of Alberger for repairs; whereupon Alberger and the defendant entered into an agreement by the terms of which the defendant was to pay to Alberger the sum of $200, and relinquish the automobile, in full acquittance of the contract and of his obligations thereunder. This was done; and the defendant apparently supposed that the contract and his obligations thereunder were at an end. A few weeks thereafter the plaintiff appeared at the defendant's place of business with the contract and demanded the balance of the payments due thereon, which the defendant refusing to make, he instituted this action to recover. From the judgment in his favor, the defendant appeals.

[1] The verdict of the jury upon the trial of the cause was against the defendant's contention, based upon the foregoing state of the evidence, that his settlement with Alberger had been made without due notice of the prior assignment of the contract to the plaintiff; and in that regard the contention of the appellant herein is that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence in the case. It is true, as the appellant contends, that the written notice of the assignment of the contract in question was in blank in so far as the insertion of the name of any assignee thereof was concerned, at the time of the defendant's admission of the receipt of a copy thereof made on the day of the execution of the contract itself; and that the same did not therefore convey to him sufficient notice of the transfer of his contract to any particular assignee. It is also true, as the undisputed evidence in the case discloses, that the contract was not in fact assigned and transferred to the plaintiff until nearly a month after the date of the execution thereof and of said notice. It would seem to follow that this notice in the condition in which it was at the time the defendant acknowledged the receipt of a copy of it, and in the absence of any actual assignment of said contract, could not of itself suffice to satisfy the requirements of section 368 of the Code of Civil Procedure with respect to notice of the assignment of choses in action.

[2] But while this much may be conceded it must also be noted that this notice, while thus insufficient to constitute in itself a notice of assignment of the contract to any particular person, was some sort of notification to the defendant of an existing purpose and intent on the part of the other party to the contract to make a present or prospective transfer thereof; and in this very connection the defendant himself testifies that at the time he wrote his acknowledgment of the receipt of a copy of such notice Alberger informed him that he intended making a present transfer of the contract. It is also to be noted that said notice contained matter which rendered it much more than a notice of assignment, for by its terms the defendant was expressly informed that the only authority retained by the seller of the automobile was to receive the deferred payments thereon, and that all other dealings in respect of the same must be had with the transferee of said contract whoever he might be. These facts are to be taken in connection with another piece of evidence in the case, viz. that the above-quoted testimony of the plaintiff with respect to his introduction to the defendant in the place of business of Alberger and to the terms of that introduction. The statement there made by Alberger to Smith in the presence and hearing of Semon that "you have some of his papers," and the statement of Smith to Semon that "I wished him success in the dealings we had together," while in themselves but slight, and, we think, insufficient proof of notice to the defendant of the assignment of his contract to the plaintiff, was still some evidence thereof; and if this evidence, was believed by the jury to be true, and if it was considered by them in connection with the terms and scope of the written notice, of which the defendant had acknowledged receiving a copy, to be sufficient to put the defendant upon inquiry as to the state and whereabouts of his contract at the time he undertook to make his settlement with Alberger, we are unable to say that these facts and proofs when thus considered by the jury were not sufficient to put the defendant upon such notice that any subsequent settlement with Alberger would be made at his peril, and would thus be the equivalent in legal contemplation of actual notice of the plaintiff's intervening rights in the premises; and hence we cannot hold upon this appeal that the verdict of the jury was not supported by the evidence.

[3] The appellant herein makes the further contention that the trial court committed an error in striking out of his answer his first pleaded defense, the substance of which was that the assignor of the plaintiff was not the owner of the automobile at the time of the sale thereof by him to the defendant; but this action of the court, even if error in the then state of the case, would be error unattended with injury to the defendant, for the reason that the contract when introduced in evidence proved not to amount to a present sale of the automobile, but only to be a contract for a future and conditional sale thereof. In the case of such contracts it is well settled that the ownership of the thing to be sold and transferred in futuro need not be in the person making the agreement of sale at the time of such agreement.

The appellant also urges that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by him, and in giving certain instructions at the plaintiff's request. These instructions related to the matters of law and fact above under discussion, and undertook to set forth in the form of instructions the respective views of the parties as to the law of the case; and, as we have seen, defendant's theory of the case has not been adopted, and hence his offered instructions were not improperly refused.

We find no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

LILLIS v. SILVER CREEK & PANOCHE LAND & WATER CO. et al. (Civ. 1617.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 1, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1917.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚷45(2)—CONTRACT FOR USE OF WATER—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the reformation of a contract entitling plaintiff's predecessor to the use of water for irrigating purposes when the quantity of water in his canal did not exceed 75 cubic inches flowing per second, evidence held to show that the quantity had been so fixed by mutual mistake of the parties thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 158, 184–188, 190.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚷143—IRRIGATION—"MINER'S INCH OF WATER."

The standard miner's inch of water, as fixed by St. 1901, p. 660, is the equivalent or equal to 1½ cubic feet of water per minute measured through any aperture or orifice, making it equivalent to one-fortieth of a second foot.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 🔑152(11)—IRRIGATION — DECREE—"SEVENTY-FIVE CUBIC INCHES OF WATER MEASURED UNDER A FOUR-INCH PRESSURE."

In an action for the reformation of a contract with a water company for the use of 75 cubic inches flowing per second, a decree that the amount had been so designated by mutual mistake when the parties intended a use of 75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure left the exact quantity of water to which plaintiff was entitled unascertained; as the expression "75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure" has no meaning whatever as applied to the measurement of a flowing stream.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑428(7) — OFFICERS—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE—STATUTE.

In an action to reform a contract for the use of water for irrigation purposes, a showing that defendant's president prior to defendant's purchase of the canal had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to the extent of plaintiff's right to the waters carried in the canal was equivalent under Civ. Code, § 19, to constructive notice of the fact which he could have learned had he prosecuted the inquiry.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by S. C. Lillis against the Silver Creek & Panoche Land & Water Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Belmore Land & Water Company appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions.

See, also, 21 Cal. App. 234, 131 Pac. 344.

Bennett, Turnbull & Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Short & Sutherland, of Fresno, for respondent.

HART, J. This appeal is by the Belmore Land & Water Company from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon a transcript of the testimony prepared by the phonographic reporter under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action is for the reformation of a certain contract, made on the 3d day of March, 1904, and duly entered and filed of record in the office of the county recorder of Fresno county on the 2d day of November, 1905, by and between the defendant Silver Creek & Panoche Land & Water Company and one W. J. Hayes, predecessor in interest of the plaintiff, and whereby it was stipulated and agreed that said Hayes was entitled to the use of and to divert upon his lands from the irrigating canal of the Panoche Company a certain quantity of water, such diversion to be made by means of a lateral connected with the main canal.

The controversy here arises over a dispute between the parties as to the quantity of water to which the parties intended, by their agreement, to stipulate and agree that said Hayes should be entitled. The contract is set out in hæc verba in the complaint, and in the respect as to which the dispute here has arisen reads as follows:

> "* * * It is hereby understood and agreed that said second party is entitled to use upon any portion of his said land the water flowing in first party's canal from said Panoche creek at all times when the quantity of water flowing therein does not exceed 75 cubic inches flowing per second when the same reaches the land of said second party."

In a number of other places in the said contract the quantity of water to which it is agreed that the second party should be entitled is designated as above given.

The contention of the plaintiff was, however, that the parties to the contract intended to say and that the contract was intended to read and mean that the second party should be entitled to a flow of "75 miner's inches" instead of a flow of "75 cubic inches," as the agreement was made to read. Accordingly the complaint, by appropriate and sufficient averments, sets forth that it was the true intention of the parties to the said contract to write in and express therein, in lieu of the words "75 cubic inches flowing per second," wherever said words appear in said agreement, the words "75 miner's inches," and that the words, "75 cubic inches flowing per second," as so used to define the quantity of water which the said second party (Hayes) should be entitled to divert under said agreement, were written therein by and through the mutual mistake of the parties thereto; that, in conformity with the real intention of the parties to said agreement, and ever since the execution thereof, and down to the 2d day of January, 1910, the plaintiff and his predecessors in title have taken water from said main water ditch or canal for the irrigation of the land of the plaintiff described in the complaint; that during all of said period said water has been diverted from said main canal through and by means of a lateral ditch sufficient in size to carry 75 miner's inches of water; and that said quantity of water has been so diverted by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title during the irrigating season in each year since the execution of said contract "and whenever said water has been needed for the irrigation of the land now owned by the plaintiff as aforesaid."

It is shown by the complaint that on the land of the plaintiff irrigated by means of the canal and lateral in question "there is growing about 30 acres of alfalfa, and that there is now, and will continue to be, needed on said land water for the purpose of irrigating said alfalfa and other crops."

It is alleged that the defendant and appellant, Belmore Land & Water Company, has or claims to have succeeded to the right and interest of the defendant Panoche Company in and to the ditch or canal "above described"; that "on or about the 2d day of January, 1910, the defendant Belmore Land & Water Company, without any right, and against the will of the plaintiff, erected an obstruction in said lateral ditch, at the point where the same diverts water from said main water ditch or canal, by reason of which water was and now is prevented from passing from the said water ditch or canal to the land of the plaintiff above described; and that by reason of such obstruction to the flow of water plaintiff has been deprived of all water necessary to irrigate said alfalfa." It is alleged that "the facts constituting said mistake were not discovered by the plaintiff, nor by any predecessors in title of the plaintiff, more than three years prior to the commencement of this action; that said facts and said mistake were discovered by the plaintiff on or about the 2d day of January, 1910, and said facts and said mistake were unknown to the plaintiff and to his predecessors in title prior to said date."

Besides seeking a reformation of the contract in the particular mentioned and a decree adjudging him to be entitled to divert and use upon his land from the appellant's canal the quantity of water designated in said contract as so revised, the plaintiff asks for an injunction pendente lite restraining the defendants from interfering with the plaintiff in removing the obstruction which prevents water from flowing "into said lateral ditch as it has been accustomed heretofore to flow, and interfering with plaintiff's use of said ditch and his taking water from said main canal to irrigate his said land," etc.

A demurrer, upon both general and special grounds, was interposed by the appellant, and the same by the court sustained. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the appellant, and an appeal therefrom was taken by the respondent here. The cause came to this court by transfer from the Supreme Court, and the judgment was by this court reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, and a petition to have the case heard by the Supreme Court after judgment by this court was denied. Lillis v. Silver Creek & Panoche Land & Water Co. et al., 21 Cal. App. 234, 131 Pac. 344.

The defendants by their several and respective answers deny all the material averments of the complaint, and allege that the contract as executed by the parties thereto and filed for record expressed the real intention of said parties as to the quantity of water which the plaintiff's predecessor in title and the plaintiff were entitled to have diverted from the appellant's canal to the lands of the former for the purpose of irrigating the same.

The court found that at and prior to the time at which the agreement in question was made and executed the immediate parties thereto intended that said contract should mean, and that the legal consequences thereof should be, that said Hayes (second party and predecessor in title of the plaintiff) should be entitled to take from the appellant's canal for use upon his (now plaintiff's) land at all times water to the amount and quantity of 75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure; that, through a mutual mistake of the original parties to the contract, the said contract, as to the provision defining the quantity of water to be so taken and used, was made to read "75 cubic inches," etc., in lieu of "75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure," as the parties intended the agreement to read.

It will be observed that, notwithstanding that the complaint alleges that the contract should have been made to read, according to the real intention of the parties, "75 miner's inches" instead of "75 cubic inches flowing per second," the court found that the contract should be so revised as to give to the plaintiff the right to divert from the canal "75 cubic inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure." This finding corresponds strictly with the testimony presented, aside from the agreement itself, upon the question of the intention of the parties as to the quantity of water which the plaintiff and his predecessor in title were to be entitled to divert from the canal for the purpose stated in the complaint.

[1] It is very clear from the evidence that the provision in the written agreement purporting to fix the amount of water which Hayes should be entitled to take from the canal does not state or specify the quantity which it was the real intention of the parties that he should be entitled so to divert, and that the amount so fixed was the result of the mutual mistake of the parties to the agreement; for, as was said by this court in this case when it was before us on the former appeal, above referred to:

> "The quantity [of water] mentioned in the contract would hardly be sufficient to find its way through a ditch during the irrigating season."

In fact, the term "cubic inch per second," as used in the contract, is one that has never to our knowledge heretofore been used in California in connection with the measurement of water to be used for any purpose and one that would, if generally used, almost invariably lead to absurd consequences. Particularly would this be so in the case where, as here, the measurement is for the purpose of apportioning water for the purposes of irrigation, since, as we think will be found to be true upon an arithmetical analysis of the phrase, 75 cubic inches per second are the equivalent only of 0.32 of one gallon per second. Obviously such a quantity of water would be absolutely valueless or without utility for practical purposes of irrigation. This proposition alone or of itself would seem to be sufficient to sustain the conclusion that the parties to the agreement in question had mutually fallen into an error in attempting to define the quantity of water which was by said agreement to be awarded to one of them for the irrigation of his land for agricultural purposes. No sane person would purposely limit his right to the use of water for irrigating his land to a quantity which could not be of any possible benefit to him, or, indeed, which could not be utilized at all.

That the Panoche Company conceded that Hayes was entitled to divert a quantity of the waters running into its canal from Panoche creek sufficient to irrigate his land for agricultural purposes is incontestably shown by the fact itself of the making of the contract. The dispute between them, which was of long standing, was merely as to the quantity of water which Hayes should be entitled to divert from the canal. The evidence shows that, after negotiations between the two parties extending over a long period of time, during which, with a view to avoiding litigation, a correspondence relating to the dispute was carried on between the attorneys of the respective disputants, an agreement was finally reached and reduced to writing whereby the amount of water Hayes was to be entitled to divert from said canal and use upon his land was supposed to be specifically apportioned and definitely specified. The letters passing between the attorneys of the parties and a draft of a written contract which was not used, because it provided for "100 cubic inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure" (25 such inches more than the Panoche Company was willing to concede to Hayes), unquestionably show that the understanding arrived at between Hayes and the Panoche Company was that the former should at all times when necessary to his purposes be entitled to divert from the canal and thence to his land a quantity of water equal in amount to "75 cubic inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure." Whatever the quantity so defined amounts to, if, indeed, the phrase means anything at all as a unit in water measurement for any purpose, it is clear that the attorneys conducting the negotiations leading to the execution of the agreement, as well as the trial court in this case, were of the opinion and believed that a quantity of water equal in amount to "75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure," would be amply sufficient to subserve the purposes of Hayes.

[2, 3] But the serious question now confronts us: What does the expression "75 cubic inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure" mean? In other words, what is the precise quantity of water which the court has thus found that the plaintiff is entitled to divert from the appellant's canal? Did the court intend so to revise the agreement as to make it provide that the plaintiff should be entitled to use, as the complaint alleges was the real intention of the parties, "75 miner's inches of water," and conceived that "75 cubic inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure" were the equivalent of 75 miner's inches?

The miner's inch of water, as fixed by statute in California, is defined as follows:

> "The standard miner's inch of water shall be equivalent or equal to one and one half cubic feet of water per minute, measured through any aperture or orifice." Stats. 1901, p. 660.

This makes the miner's inch equivalent to one-fortieth of a second foot. Prior to the adoption of the above statute an inch or miner's inch in this state was defined as the quantity of water passing through an orifice one inch square under a 4-inch pressure, which would make the inch equivalent to one-fiftieth of a cubic foot per second. Under the statutory definition or standard, above given, 75 inches or miner's inches would amount to 90 cubic feet per minute, or 673.2 gallons per minute, or 11.2 gallons per second. These figures, confirmed by the opinion of the state engineering department, are based upon definite, well-defined, and well-understood standards or units of water measurement. The expression "a cubic inch measured under a 4-inch pressure" conveys to our minds no meaning whatever. Indeed, we are advised by the authority above referred to that:

> "The expression, '75 cubic inches measured under a 4-inch pressure' has no meaning whatever as applied to the measurement of a flowing stream."

Thus the decree leaves the whole matter of quantity "up in the air." No one can say how much water the plaintiff may, under the decree, divert from the appellant's canal. The rights of the parties are not defined with sufficient definiteness to enable either to know when the other is going beyond his rights. If the plaintiff, conceiving that, under the terms of the decree, he was entitled to divert more than 75 miner's inches, and should do so to the detriment of the appellant, how may it be told from the decree that he (the plaintiff) is not justified in diverting such quantity of water, or, on the other hand, if the appellant should so obstruct appellant's gate or weir as to prevent the passage into his lateral of a sufficient flow for his purposes, who can say, from the decree, that the appellant would not be within its just rights in so doing? But counsel for the respondent declare that the phrase adopted by the court in specifying the quantity of water to which the plaintiff is entitled is well understood in hydraulics, and conveys a definite meaning as to the quantity it expresses. They refer to Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) § 890, as in confirmation of their statement, and assert that:

> "None of the writers of 'books on water rights' would have had the least difficulty in determining the meaning of the language used by the trial court in its decree."

But neither Kinney nor counsel tell us how much water is comprehended within or expressed by the language of the decree.

They do not say or, so far as their briefs go, claim that a cubic inch of water measured under a 4-inch pressure is equal to a miner's inch. If it is not, is it less or is it more than a miner's inch, according to their conception of its description? The fact is, as stated, that the phrase "cubic inch measured under a 4-inch pressure" is unknown in hydraulics as a unit of measurement, and, as the state engineer has declared, has no meaning whatever as applied to the measurement of a flowing stream.

It necessarily follows from the foregoing that the trial court wholly failed to ascertain and find the exact quantity of water to which the plaintiff is entitled under the agreement, and that the decree is likewise deficient and does not define or adjudicate definitely or at all the respective rights of the parties to the agreement. Obviously the parties are entitled to know exactly what their respective rights are judicially determined to be.

[4] In all other respects than the above the findings are supported and the decree is definite and sufficient. The only question which we have thus far not considered is whether the appellant purchased the water rights and canal in question in ignorance of the rights of the plaintiff. As to this proposition, it should be said that the evidence shows that the appellant's president, Farnham, visited and inspected the canal prior to the purchase and while his company was negotiating for the purchase of the ditch; that he saw the plaintiff's lateral and gate, and was informed that the latter had and was exercising certain rights in the waters of Panoche creek as the same were carried through said canal; that Farnham made no special effort at any time before the purchase to ascertain precisely to what extent the plaintiff was entitled to use the water from the canal; that the gate and lateral of the plaintiff as the same were then and had been for a number of years used by him had been so constructed and were being so maintained as that he was thus enabled to divert from the canal and thence to his land an infinitely greater quantity of water than the agreement provided for. But, without further reference to the evidence in this particular, it is sufficient to say that, on the whole, the proofs disclose that Farnham and the appellant through him, prior to the purchase by the latter of the canal, had "actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry" as to the extent of the plaintiff's rights in the waters carried by the canal, and hence had constructive notice of fact itself, and could have learned the fact had he prosecuted the inquiry. Civ. Code, § 19; 2 Pom. Eq. Juris. § 11.

It follows from the foregoing that the question as to the precise quantity of water which the plaintiff is entitled to divert from the canal to and upon his land is the only one left for retrial.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to hear and consider only such further evidence as may be produced before it upon the question of the quantity of water which the parties to the agreement in question intended that the plaintiff should be entitled to divert from the appellant's ditch or canal and thence to his land.

SPITZER v. CITY OF OAKLAND.

(Civ. 1917.)

1. Money Received 🔑4—Title of Plaintiff.

Although an action for the recovery of money claimed to have been received for the use and benefit of plaintiff is in the nature of an equitable proceeding, wherein the plaintiff must prove that he has a better title than the defendant to the money received, where plaintiff, upon attempting to procure the arrest of "bunco men" who had swindled him, unwillingly placed in the hands of the police department for use as evidence in case arrests were made money received by him from a "bunco sharp," he has a sufficiently superior title to recover the money from the city, who claims no title, but merely seeks to retain the money upon the plea that plaintiff originally came into possession of it through some unlawful transaction, and inquiry as to the source of plaintiff's title was rightly limited to whether plaintiff was apparently in the sole and peaceable possession of the money at the time he unwillingly and for a single purpose delivered it to the police department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Money Received, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–13.]

2. Money Received 🔑19(4)—Right to Interest.

Under the direct provisions of Civ. Code, § 1917, in an action against a city for money received to the use of plaintiff and detained from him after demand, plaintiff was properly allowed interest on such money upon judgment for its recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by James G. Spitzer against the City of Oakland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Paul C. Morf, City Atty., G. E. Jackson, Asst. City Atty., and John J. Earle, Deputy City Atty., all of Oakland, for appellant. John W. Gwilt and James P. Montgomery, both of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,000 alleged to have been received by it for the use and benefit of the plaintiff and to have been unpaid to him upon demand. The answer consists in a denial that the defendant received the said sum or any part thereof for the use of the plaintiff.

Upon the trial of the cause the following facts appeared: The plaintiff, who resided in the East, had come out to California about a year before the episode occurred out of which this action arose, and while here had fallen afoul of some "bunco men" who "buncoed" him out of the sum of about $2,800. He went home, but about a year later returned with the resolution and intent of trying to recover his lost money. He presently fell in with another "bunco" sharp, who, under the pretense of co-operating with him in betting on a horse race, handed him $1,000 in bills. Instead of betting on the horse race the plaintiff went to the police department in Oakland with a view to procuring the arrest of the bunco men. The officer in charge demanded that he leave the money in the hands of the police department for use as evidence in case arrests were made. The plaintiff testified that he did this, though unwilling, and that, no arrests having been made, he later returned and demanded the money, which demand the police department refused to accede to, but instead turned the money into the treasury of the city of Oakland, which also through its proper officials has refused to deliver the same or any part thereof to the plaintiff upon his demand. Thereupon this action was brought.

The only defense which was attempted to be urged at the trial was that the plaintiff had not shown sufficient title in himself to the money in question, although it was conceded the defendant made no claim of title to it. The trial court held in the light of the foregoing facts that the plaintiff's possession of the money at the time of its delivery to the police department upon its demand therefor for the single purpose for which it was unwillingly handed over to its officers was a sufficiently superior title to enable the plaintiff to recover the money from the defendant, its depositary, claiming no title thereto.

[1] We think the view taken by the trial court upon this question was correct. It is conceded on both sides that the action for the recovery of money claimed to have been received for the use and benefit of another is in the nature of an equitable proceeding, wherein the plaintiff must prove that he has a better title to the money received than the defendant has to it; but the adoption of this principle does not lead to its application to the case of a defendant who has and claims no title to the money except that derived from its receipt from the plaintiff, but who nevertheless seeks to retain it upon the plea that the plaintiff originally came into possession of the money through some unlawful transaction. To make such application of the doctrine would be to open the door to every depositary of money having no right to retain the same save that arising out of the fact of the deposit, to put in question the sources from which a depositor himself derived the money. Our attention has not been called to any line of authority which supports such a contention. On the other hand, the following cases uphold the contrary view: Willson v. Owen, 30 Mich. 474; Woodworth v. Bennett, 43 N. Y. 273, 3 Am. Rep. 706; McDonald v. Lund, 13 Wash. 412, 43 Pac. 348. As between the plaintiff and the defendant no equities were either pleaded or asserted which called for the application of the principle; and, this being so, the trial court rightly limited the inquiry as to the source of the plaintiff's acquisition of the money in question to the fact as to whether or not the plaintiff was apparently in the sole and peaceable possession of it at the time he unwillingly and for a single purpose which has passed to the point of accomplishment delivered it into the keeping of the police department. We think the trial court properly decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover this money.

[2] We are also of the opinion that under section 1917 of the Civil Code the plaintiff was properly allowed interest in the sum found and adjudged by the court.

McCALEB v. McCALEB. (Civ. 2209.)

DIVORCE ⚷151—NEW TRIAL—RIGHT—EFFECT OF ACCEPTING BENEFIT OF JUDGMENT.

In a suit by a wife for divorce, she was denied a divorce, but awarded alimony. She accepted payments of the alimony awarded, and then moved for a new trial. Held that, having accepted satisfaction of that portion of the judgment favorable to her, she could not have a new trial as to her right to divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Effie G. McCaleb against William H. McCaleb, who cross-complained. There was a judgment that neither party was entitled to a divorce and awarding alimony to plaintiff. From an order denying defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. H. P. Starbuck, Canfield & Starbuck, and E. W. Squier, all of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this action for divorce there are a complaint and cross-complaint and answers made to each. The case advanced to trial and evidence was introduced; whereupon the court made its findings of fact and judgment decreeing that neither party was entitled to a divorce.

Included in the decree was a provision giving to the wife alimony in the following terms:

> "That while the plaintiff and defendant continue to live separate and apart that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff the sum of $10 per month from and after the entry of this decree; that the payment of said allowance may be secured by a valid lien on any of the community or separate property of the defendant as the plaintiff and defendant may agree upon, and in case they cannot agree upon such security and lien, then this court shall determine what property the defendant shall convey in trust to a trustee selected by this court, sufficient of said separate or community property as security for the payment of said allowance until the further order of this court."

The plaintiff, following the entry of judgment, proceeded to give notice of her intention to move for a new trial. Thereafter, on October 28, 1913, the defendant gave notice of his motion to have an order made denying and dismissing the plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground that plaintiff had accepted the payments of $10 per month for four months next preceding the date of the notice. This motion was supported by the uncontradicted affidavit of the defendant showing the payments to have been made and received as stated. Defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's proceeding for a new trial was denied, and this appeal was taken from that order.

The point urged by the appellant is that the plaintiff, having accepted the benefit of the judgment in so far as it was in her favor, was therefore estopped to have the judgment reviewed on appeal, and that she thereby waived her right to an appeal. Primarily this contention rests upon the well-established rule that, where a party accepts satisfaction of a judgment, the judgment then passes beyond review at the instance of the party accepting satisfaction. People v. Burns, 78 Cal. 645, 21 Pac. 540; Estate of Baby, 87 Cal. 200, 25 Pac. 405, 22 Am. St. Rep. 239; Estate of Shaver, 131 Cal. 219, 63 Pac. 340. In the cases cited satisfaction of the whole judgment appears to have been made. In this case the plaintiff proposed to have reviewed the judgment denying her a divorce. If she was successful in such proceeding upon appeal, the reversal of the judgment would set aside not only the determination of the trial judge as made against the plaintiff on her asserted grounds for divorce, but would also set aside the judgment for the payment of alimony. The rule seems to be that, where the different provisions of a judgment are so connected that a part cannot be reversed without a reversal of the whole, a party is not permitted to enforce the portions of the judgment in his or her favor and appeal from the adverse portions thereof. First National Bank v. Wakefield, 138 Cal. 561, 72 Pac. 151. The particular case which has been urged as complete authority sustaining appellant's position is that of Storke v. Storke, 132 Cal. 349, 64 Pac. 578. That also was an action for divorce, and a divorce was granted to the husband and an award made in the judgment of $250 alimony and $200 attorney's fees to the defendant. The defendant accepted payment of the money and at the same time proceeded to prosecute a motion for a new trial. A motion was made by the plaintiff there to dismiss the appeal on the same ground as urged in this case and was denied by the trial court, which order was reversed upon appeal, the court saying:

> "Another reason exists why the motion for a new trial should be dismissed. Defendant accepted the part of the judgment that was beneficial to her. It was a final judgment, and by its terms gave her $450. This sum was based upon the findings, and was the result of the litigation. Defendant took the $450, and now seeks to attack the judgment through which she received it. This she cannot do. Having taken the benefit, she must bear the burden. The amount of this judgment was not large, but the principle is the same. It may have been as great a hardship to plaintiff to have paid the $450 as it would be to a wealthy man to pay $450,000. If the defendant should procure a new trial, she would still have the $450, and plaintiff would not have his divorce. If she has used it, or is otherwise unable to pay it back, the plaintiff cannot be placed in the same condition in which he was before the trial. The principle is well settled that a party accepting and receiving the portion of the judgment beneficial to him cannot appeal from it"—citing cases.

This decision seems decisive of the question presented upon this appeal. While we are unable fully to reconcile the holding with the argument of the decision in First National Bank v. Wakefield, supra, we feel bound by the precedent established by the Supreme Court where the facts and conditions affecting the judgment were so nearly similar as those presented by this record.

The order denying the motion of the defendant to dismiss plaintiff's motion for a new trial is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. McDONNELL. (Cr. 365.)

1. HOMICIDE ⟹250—MANSLAUGHTER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held to support verdict of guilty of manslaughter.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⟹829(5)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the court gave several instructions, such as one that when one without fault is placed under circumstances sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that another designs to commit a felony or some great bodily injury upon him, and to afford grounds for reasonable belief that there is imminent danger, he may, acting under such fears alone, slay his assailant, and be justified, etc., the court properly refused defendant's proposed instruction that if the circumstances surrounding defendant at the time of and immediately preceding the killing were sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man that deceased was about to inflict upon defendant great bodily injury or death, it was not essential that deceased should have had or attempted to use a weapon in order to entitle defendant to defend himself.

3. HOMICIDE 🔑300(7)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—APPLICATION TO EVIDENCE.

The instruction was properly refused where defendant claimed that he was in danger from the use of some sort of weapon in the hands of deceased, and not merely from his fists; the charge thus not being applicable to any theory of the case based on the evidence.

4. HOMICIDE 🔑300(5)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the law of self-defense was adequately covered in other instructions, an instruction, given at the people's request, that although the right to take life or use a deadly weapon in self-defense is unquestionable, one on whom another has made a mere assault with his fist, not with the intent to kill or do great bodily harm, and who is not deceived as to its character, is not justified in taking life or in using a deadly weapon in self-defense, was not improper as misleading the jury, though it was not entirely clear or accurate.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1172(2)—APPEAL—ABSTRACT ERROR.

Where the theory of self-defense was based on an attack with a deadly weapon, the instruction involved simply abstract error.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑789(8)—INSTRUCTION.

In a prosecution for homicide, the trial court properly refused the instruction that the words "moral certainty," as used in relation to the jury's conviction of guilt, is a state of impression produced by facts in which a reasonable mind feels a sort of coercion or necessity or necessity to act in accordance with it, that degree of certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it, as the charge would have been no benefit to the average juror in relation to when a verdict of guilty should be returned.

7. HOMICIDE 🔑297—INSTRUCTION.

Ordinarily, an instruction, taken from the statute, as to what constitutes justifiable homicide, should not be condemned.

8. HOMICIDE 🔑109—SELF-DEFENSE—DEPRIVATION BY LEGISLATURE.

Under Const. art. 1, § 1, guaranteeing the right to defend life, the Legislature cannot deprive a person, who is not a wrongdoer, of the right of self-defense.

9. HOMICIDE 🔑118(3)—SELF-DEFENSE—DUTY TO RETREAT.

Where defendant was violently and inexcusably beaten in his own home by deceased, a man of quarrelsome disposition, and ordered deceased to leave the house, and told him he would kill him if he returned, whereupon deceased apparently seized a deadly weapon, and turned with manner and language plainly indicating his intention to kill or seriously injure defendant, defendant was not required to retreat, even though it would not have increased his peril, but had a right to stand his ground and slay his adversary if he believed himself in imminent peril.

10. HOMICIDE 🔑340(1)—INSTRUCTION—JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

In a prosecution for murder, it appeared that defendant had been violently and inexcusably beaten in his own home by deceased, a man of quarrelsome disposition, had ordered deceased to leave, and told him that he would kill him if he attempted to return. Deceased apparently seized a deadly weapon, and turned with manner and language plainly indicating his intention to kill or seriously injure defendant, who shot him. The court instructed that homicide is justified when committed by any person in the lawful defense of himself when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design on the part of the other to take his life or to do him some great bodily injury and imminent danger of such design being accomplished, but a person claiming such justification, if he were the assailant, or "engaged in mortal combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed." Held, that the giving of such instruction was prejudicial error in view of the peculiar facts of the case.

11. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑823(1) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

A correct instruction on a subject does not cure the error of an incorrect one, but merely produces an irreconcilable conflict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Daniel Joseph McDonnell was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, and J. D. McLaughlin, of Quincy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was charged with the murder of Charles Cosker, and convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

In pointing his contention that we should hold as a matter of law that the conviction was unwarranted by the showing made, appellant presents a fairly comprehensive and accurate epitome of the evidence which we may substantially reproduce:

It is admitted that defendant at his home killed deceased, February 16, 1916. Deceased went to the home of defendant, about 7 o'clock in the evening, and together they went to the house of one McKenzie, a short distance away. About 8 o'clock the two left McKenzie's, Cosker announcing that he was going to the Chinese store with a present of pie and bread for the owner. While at the store each had two drinks of liquor. They returned to the home of McKenzie about 9 o'clock, and, at their joint invitation, he accompanied them to defendant's home. There they all drank liquor furnished by defendant, and Cosker occupied most of the time in lauding and reciting extracts from speeches of President Wilson. Several times he invited his two auditors to come to his house and read the speeches which he had cut out of the Sacramento Bee. Both declined the invitation, saying it was too late. McKenzie left defendant's house between 10 and 11 o'clock. But before he went away, according to the testimony of appellant, deceased had remarked that if he sold his mine he intended to go around electioneering for President Wilson, whereupon defendant laughed and deceased "got a little sore" and said: "You and Rorey don't want to read these speeches; you are turncoats like Tom and Will" (referring to his brothers). Both answered "No," and Cosker continued with the speeches. The only testimony as to the circumstances immediately preceding and attending the tragedy was furnished by the defendant himself. He testified that, after McKenzie's departure, deceased continued to praise Wilson and his speeches until about 11:30 p. m., when he announced that he was going home. Defendant lit a candle, and they left the kitchen, where they had been since their arrival at the house, and went into the back room. When they reached the center of said room deceased repeated his invitation to defendant to come to his house and read the speeches. Defendant responded that it was too late, and that he did not want to awaken the wife of deceased. Deceased then caught defendant by the shoulder and started to pull him, scratching his neck in doing so. Then he "swung" on defendant, saying, "You and Rorey are G—— d—— s—— of b——, and I don't believe you want to read those papers," at the same time with his fist striking defendant in the face. The candle fell to the floor, and while defendant was picking it up deceased hit him again and knocked him down. A muzzle-loading shotgun was in a corner near where defendant fell, and he got it and ordered deceased to leave the house. As Cosker reached the back door he picked up something from where a lot of tools, including a blacksmith hammer, were kept. Defendant could not see what it was—his "eyes were dazed"—and deceased stepped out on the porch and stood for a moment muttering, with his back to defendant, who said, "Charlie, you get out of here and go home; if you come back in here I will kill you;" whereupon deceased said, "You s—— of a b——, I'll learn you whether you can draw a gun on me; it ain't loaded anyway," and swung around toward defendant with his right arm upraised, and defendant shot. Defendant could not see whether deceased had anything in his hand or not.

The blacksmith hammer was found in the snow about three feet from the right arm of deceased where the body was lying full length with his right arm outstretched, his feet close to the edge of the porch. Defendant's face was bruised, his eye blackened, and his face bloody. The hammer, according to defendant's story, was placed near the door by some boys a day or two before who had been using it in breaking ice.

The wound which caused the death of Cosker was on the left side of the neck, right over the collar bone, nearer the front than the back of the neck. That was the only wound except one on the back of the right hand, about five-eighths of an inch long, crescent shaped, which looked as if he had struck his hand against something and broken the skin.

The undertaker testified that from placing cotton in the wound to stop the blood he formed the opinion that its course was slightly downward toward the inside of the right shoulder. The body had been moved from its position in the snow to the home of deceased before this was done. Dr. Eckhardt testified that under these circumstances the course or direction of the wound could not be determined with any accuracy without a probe, and that no person by pushing cotton in with his fingers could determine with any degree of accuracy the direction of the wound.

Defendant and deceased were on friendly terms prior to the homicide, so much so that defendant had an appointment to cut deceased's hair on the following morning. Deceased was a larger and stronger man than appellant.

Thomas and William Cosker, brothers of deceased, and James M. Hayes were the first to reach the scene of the homicide. They testified that they did not see the hammer in the snow on that occasion, but Hayes and Thomas Cosker did observe it when they returned the second time. They were there the first time three or four minutes. The hammer was from 2½ to 3 feet to the left or westerly from the body. The witnesses admitted that they were more or less excited, which, of course, seems quite natural. Thomas Cosker testified that his brother's snowshoes were about 50 feet from the house, separated a little, and that the slope from the house to the point where they were found was downward. The snowshoes were left outside of the house when McKenzie, deceased, and defendant reached the house.

The reputation of deceased for peace and quiet was bad.

Thomas Cosker testified that defendant came to his house about 11 o'clock on February 17th, and knocked at the door, and when it was opened "he told me that he had killed Charlie, and I said, 'What! You killed Charlie?' and he says, 'Yes, I shot him,' and then my wife says, 'What did you shoot him for?' and he said, 'Accident,' and I says, 'Accident be damned,' and my wife then made the remark, 'Oh, my God; what did you shoot him for?' and he said, 'I don't know, that damned gun,' and during that time he went away; that when he reached the place he saw his brother's body lying face downward, McDonnell standing stride of him holding his head up, saying, 'I shot him, I shot him.' James Hayes asked him why he shot him, and he said, 'Self-defense; if I had not shot him he would have shot me,' and I said, 'Get out, Dan; Charlie ain't got no gun and never owned one in his life.' Then he said, 'He was coming after me with a club,' and I made a motion with my hand, like this, and said, 'Show me his club; there is no club here,' and he never said another word, but I told him to get out of there and he put Charlie's head down and went into the house." He testified further that defendant, on the occasion of his second visit to the scene, said: "I shot him. Probably I will go to San Quentin for a few years, but that is all right."

William Cosker also testified that he heard defendant say: "I have killed him, I have killed him, and I don't give a damn if I go to San Quentin for a few years. It makes no difference." Other relatives of deceased gave similar testimony, but it is not necessary to repeat it. Some other witnesses, we may state, declared that defendant said, "If I had not got him he would have got me," and that he directed them to look around for the club or hammer used by deceased.

Appellant presents a critical analysis and comparison of the testimony of the various witnesses and he argues, with force and persuasive eloquence, that the only rational conclusion is that defendant was entirely justified in the homicide. No doubt, a similar argument was made to the jury, but they were not convinced by it, as the verdict shows. As is manifest from the foregoing, much can be said in favor of appellant's theory, and has been well said by his counsel. We need not set out the reasons which he advances for his contention, although they have received our careful consideration. We deem it, however, proper to say that, in our opinion, for us to reverse the cause on this ground would be to usurp the exclusive function of the jury to pass upon questions of fact where there exists room for rational difference of opinion.

[1] We cannot say there is no substantial support for the verdict, and that only one reasonable conclusion from the evidence could be drawn by sensible men. There was evidence—how credible it was for the jury to determine—which tended to discredit the testimony of appellant, and his manner when upon the witness stand, of which we can obviously obtain no accurate or complete portrayal in the record, may have constituted a circumstance of great significance in the determination of his guilt or innocence. And it may be said that the recital of the facts by him while upon the witness stand leaves some room for doubt whether at the time he fired the fatal shot he actually believed he was in imminent danger of receiving great bodily harm or of losing his life, or whether he may not have been somewhat moved by resentment in consequence of the brutal treatment he had received at the hands of deceased. We deem it unnecessary to notice any more specifically in this connection the record presented, but we are satisfied that this point should be resolved against appellant.

In People v. Wright, 4 Cal. App. 706, 89 Pac. 365, this court said:

> "It is true deceased had a few seconds previously fired at defendant apparently with the purpose of killing him, and defendant might, under the circumstances, have had reason to believe that deceased would continue the assault, and that his only safety was to kill or disable deceased before the latter could again fire. There is evidence which would have sustained the jury in so finding. But these were matters for the jury to determine, and with their conclusion this court cannot interfere."

In People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 75, 145 Pac. 1019, it is said:

> "Undoubtedly the defendant's own story exculpates him, but it was for the jury to say whether or not that story should be believed. The evidence was therefore sufficient to justify the verdict."

It is entirely clear that at least with equal propriety the same rule may be applied here. In a large proportion of such cases the defendant is the only surviving witness of the homicide, and beyond the mere fact of the homicide little additional evidence to the testimony of the accused can be secured. It is important, therefore, that there be no unwarranted interference with the prerogative of the jury to determine the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, including the testimony of the defendant as well as that of any other witness. As to this, of course, the appellate courts are not authorized to substitute their judgment for that of the jury and of the trial court.

[2] Appellant complains of the action of the court in refusing his proposed instruction as follows:

> "You are instructed that if the circumstances surrounding defendant at the time of and immediately preceding the killing were sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man that deceased was about to inflict upon defendant great bodily injury or death, it is not essential that deceased should have had or attempted to use a weapon. Under such circumstances defendant was as much entitled to defend himself from great bodily injury from the hands of Charles Cosker as he was to defend himself from the use of a weapon or weapons in the hands of Charles Cosker."

Although somewhat hazardous to predict what courts may or may not hereafter declare, it may be, as appellant claims, that no court has ever declared or will declare "that a man has no right to defend himself against great bodily injury unless it is inflicted with weapons or instruments." Men undoubtedly have been permanently disabled and even killed by blows from the fists of powerful assailants, and the law justifies homicide under such attack or threatened attack, provided there be reasonable ground for apprehending death or great bodily injury. The court, however, so fully instructed the jury upon the subject that there could have been no misunderstanding as to the rule. The language, it is true, was somewhat general, but, without a strained construction, it could not be said to limit the right of defense as apprehended by appellant. Several instructions of similar import were given, but it is sufficient to call attention to this:

> "Where one without fault is placed under circumstances sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that another designs to commit a felony or some great bodily injury upon him and to afford grounds for reasonable belief that there is imminent danger of the accomplishment of this design, he may, acting under these fears alone, slay his assailant and be justified by the appearances. And, as where the attack is sudden and the danger imminent he may increase his peril by retreat, so situated he may stand his ground, that becoming his 'wall' and slay his aggressor even if it be proved that he might more easily have gained his safety by flight."

[3] Another conclusive answer to the proposition is that appellant's claim was that he was in danger from the use of some sort of weapon in the hands of deceased, and not merely from his fists. In other words, the instruction was not applicable to any theory of the case based upon the evidence. It is true that defendant did not testify that he believed that deceased was about to assault him with a weapon—or at all, indeed—but that is the inference which he sought to create by the following statement:

> "When I stooped down to pick up the candle, he hit me again, and as he knocked me down, I grabbed the shotgun and I said, 'Get out of here as quick as you can.' As he grabbed me he started to the door, and he picked something up. I could not tell what it was—my eyes were dazed—and he stepped out on the porch with his back to me, and I said, 'Charlie, you get out of here and go home; if you come back in here I will kill you,' and with that he said, 'You s—— of a b——, I'll learn you whether you can draw a gun on me; it ain't loaded anyway.' Then I shot, and he fell off the porch."

In his cross-examination he said deceased "swung around with his right arm" before the shot was fired. At any rate, it is quite apparent that appellant's theory was that he was in danger from the use of a deadly weapon.

[4] At the request of the people the court gave this instruction:

> "Although the right to take life or use a deadly weapon in self-defense is unquestionable, yet, one on whom another has made a mere assault with the fist not with intent to kill or do great bodily harm, and who is not deceived as to its character, is not justified in taking life or in using a deadly weapon in self-defense."

It is said by appellant that:

> "This instruction while taken from People v. Romero, 143 Cal. 459, 77 Pac. 163, does not state the law correctly for the reason that the right of self-defense depends in no degree upon the intent or will of the person slain."

[5] In the Romero Case the only objection to the instruction was that there was no evidence upon which to base it, and this was held to be untenable. The instruction is not entirely clear or accurate, and it probably would be better if it had not been given, but we do not think it could have misled the jury. It might be possible for a person to believe, and have reason to believe, that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm from his assailant, although the latter had no such intention and the former was aware of it. However, in view of other instructions upon the subject of self-defense against apparent danger, the jury must have understood the law in relation to that particular feature. Besides, if erroneous, the instruction involved simply abstract error for the reason already suggested, that the theory of self-defense was based upon a threatened attack with a deadly weapon, and the instruction was not pertinent to the evidence.

Defendant's proposed instruction No. 13, as to the burden of proving justification, was undoubtedly covered by instructions which were given.

[6] It is questionable whether the jury would have received much enlightenment from this proposed instruction:

> "The jury is instructed that the words 'moral certainty' as used in these instructions is a state of impression produced by facts in which a reasonable mind feels a sort of coercion or necessity or necessity to act in accordance with it. It is that degree of certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it."

It might be quite interesting and illuminating to a philologist, but it is believed that it would be of no benefit to the average juror. Indeed, the instruction as a whole seems to us somewhat uncertain and obscure, and while it would probably have done no harm, if it had been given, it is fair to say that it would have done no good. It is even doubtful whether Chief Justice Shaw's celebrated description of "reasonable doubt" is of any particular assistance in most criminal cases, but it is probably as good as any that could be suggested. After all, the intelligent juror reaches the conclusion that under the law it is his duty to convict if he is thoroughly convinced and entirely satisfied of the defendant's guilt, and if not, it is his duty to acquit, and we would save trouble and confusion if we would refrain from much of our learning and refinement about these terms and confine ourselves to such simple and comprehensible statements of the duty of the jury as just indicated.

The proposed instruction of appellant as to the burden of proof of the prosecution and the right of the defendant to act upon appearances and his privilege to stand his ground were amply covered, we think, by other instructions given by the court.

Probably the most serious question arises out of the action of the court in giving this instruction:

> "Homicide is justifiable when committed by any person in the lawful defense of himself, when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design on the part of another to take his life, or to do him some great bodily injury, and imminent danger of such design being accomplished, but a person claiming such justification if he were the assailant or engaged in mortal combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed."

The objection is directed to the portion we have italicized, and appellant argues:

> "This instruction is erroneous because it states that not only the assailant, but one who is engaged in mortal combat must decline further struggle before the homicide is justifiable. This, of course, is not the law. The instruction was harmful in this case because of the attitude and argument of the prosecution."

Then he quotes from the transcript certain questions addressed to appellant as to why he did not close the door and go into the kitchen and his answers thereto, and the assertion is made that the prosecution argued before the jury that it was the duty of McDonnell to retreat to the kitchen and close the door or to attempt to close the outer door.

The Attorney General answers that the instruction is in the language of the statute (subdivision 3, § 197, Penal Code), and that it was held to be a correct statement of the law in People v. Herbert, 61 Cal. 546. Therein the history of said subdivision is given, and it is declared that it is no new statement of a legal principle for the first time stated in the Codes, but that it follows the crimes and punishment act of 1850, and has been the law ever since. As far as the said opinion is concerned, though, it is apparent that the point before us was not made. The attention of the court was occupied in considering the question whether the instruction required the existence of absolute necessity to justify or excuse the homicide, or whether it was consistent with the doctrine that the slayer could act upon appearances, provided they were such as to create a reasonable apprehension that there was design to take his life or to inflict upon him great bodily harm. This is made manifest by the quotation therein from the case of Shorter v. People, 2 N. Y. (2 Const.) 193, 51 Am. Dec. 286, wherein the Court of Appeals of New York, through Bronson, J., learnedly discusses the question of self-defense.

It might be said, also, although the point was not considered, that since the evidence was not before the Supreme Court the instruction, if erroneous, could not be held on the record to be prejudicial.

[7, 8] Manifestly, there is force in the contention that an instruction taken from the statute should not be condemned. Ordinarily that is true, and within certain limits the Legislature may prescribe the conditions under which homicide may be excusable or justifiable. It cannot, however, deprive a person—at least a person who is not a wrongdoer—of the right of self-defense. The right to defend life is one of the inalienable rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the state. Article 1, § 1. It is plain that if a person without fault is assailed by another and a mortal combat is precipitated, to require the former to attempt to withdraw before killing his adversary is to require the very thing that may prevent him from defending himself at all. The instruction is quite capable of the interpretation that although the defendant was without fault and the deceased was the aggressor, yet, if they were engaged in a mortal combat, it was the duty of the defendant to endeavor to withdraw before killing his adversary, although he had reason to believe and did believe his life was in imminent danger, and that to attempt to decline further struggle would increase his peril and probably enable his adversary to kill him. Such, of course, was not the intention of the learned trial judge in giving the instruction, nor, probably, of the Legislature in enacting the law; but it is capable of such interpretation, and may nave been so interpreted by the jury.

[9] To appreciate the probable prejudicial effect of the instruction we must, of course, view the evidence from appellant's standpoint. We must, in other words, assume that the jury believed his story, since there is nothing inherently improbable about it. We then have this situation: Appellant had been violently and inexcusably beaten in his own home by a man of quarrelsome disposition. He had ordered his antagonist to leave the house, and had told him he would kill him if he attempted to return. Deceased apparently seized a deadly weapon and turned with manner and language plainly indicating his intention to kill or seriously injure defendant. Under those circumstances said instruction would demand the conclusion that it was still the duty of defendant to withdraw or retreat before firing the fatal shot. But if such condition existed defendant, under any proper view of the law, was not required to retreat, even though it would not have increased his peril. He had a right to stand his ground and to slay his adversary if he believed he was in imminent peril.

In People v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 186, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 167, it was held that:

> "The tendency of the American mind is against the enforcement of any rule which requires a person to flee when wrongfully assailed, to avoid chastisement, or even to save human life; and it seems that a true man, who is without fault, is not obliged to flee from an assailant who, by violence or surprise, maliciously seeks to take his life or to do him enormous bodily harm."

And, furthermore:

> "A person assailed in his own house, or upon his own premises, has the right to stand his ground, and is not bound to retreat or escape to avoid the assailant, but may kill him if reasonably necessary for his protection from great bodily danger in the position rightfully occupied by him on his own premises, even though he might avoid the assault by fleeing or withdrawing therefrom."

In that case it was held prejudicially erroneous to instruct the jury in reference to the defendant that "if he could have withdrawn from the danger it was his duty to retreat," and that "between his duty to flee and his right to kill, he must fly, or, as the books have it, 'he must retreat to the wall.'" There are other decisions to the same effect, but they need not be cited. As to whether appellant was engaged in a mortal combat, according to his story, and in view of the tragical ending of the affray, there can be no doubt.

[10] We think, under the peculiar facts of this case, the giving of this instruction should be held to be prejudicially erroneous, and that the evidence of defendant's guilt is not so strong and convincing as to justify us in saying there was no miscarriage of justice. What the Legislature probably intended to provide is that where one as the assailant is engaged in a mortal combat he must endeavor, etc., but the language chosen is not apt for that purpose.

[11] It is true that the jury was also correctly instructed upon the subject, but that simply produced an irreconcilable conflict, and we cannot say which instruction was followed.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

1. Action 🔑57(1)—Consolidation—Foreclosure.

Where one of the parties who claimed to be a tenant in common of land had filed a suit for partition and a lis pendens, such suit may be consolidated by consent of all the parties with the suit by one holding a mortgage on all of the land for foreclosure, it being agreed that the right of partiton should be subordinated to the mortgagee's right of foreclosure.

2. Partition 🔑17(2)—Actions—Jurisdiction.

In a suit to partition land, where the claims of the parties were adverse, the court has jurisdiction to determine title.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑934(2)—Presumption—Conveyances.

In a suit where husband contended that a purchaser from his wife, who was named as grantee in a deed, conveying the land to the husband, and wife took no title, it will be presumed in support of the judgment, findings having been waived, that the court held that the presumption in favor of the wife's title declared by Civ. Code, § 164, was not rebutted, and that the purchaser from the wife was one in good faith for a valuable consideration, so that his title was not subject to attack.

4. Partition 🔑62—Actions—Evidence.

Where a purchaser of the alleged interest of a wife in land conveyed to a husband, and wife sought partition, and the husband introduced the wife's declaration of homestead, the purchaser may, though the declaration was not mentioned in the pleading, show its invalidity, for such declaration if valid would defeat the purchaser's title, the husband not having joined in the conveyance.

5. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑244—Bona Fide Purchaser—Evidence—Sufficiency.

Where land was conveyed to a husband and wife as grantees, and the wife conveyed her interest, held, the husband having attacked the bona fides of the purchaser from the wife, that the evidence warranted a finding that such purchaser was one in good faith for value.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1058(1)—Review—Harmless Error.

The exclusion of evidence subsequently admitted was not error.

7. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑243—Bona Fide Purchaser—Evidence.

Where respondent claimed to be a bona fide purchaser from appellant's wife for value without notice of any defect in her title, questions whether respondent knew that the wife was contemplating a divorce at the time of executing the conveyance were properly excluded as immaterial.

8. Appeal and Error 🔑760(2)—Review—Briefs.

An exception to the admission of testimony referred to in the brief without comment need not be considered by the appellate court.

9. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑243—Bona Fide Purchaser—Evidence.

Respondent purchased from appellant's wife her interest in land, which had been granted to appellant and his wife. Appellant contended that the deed by mistake had named his wife as a grantee, and asserted that respondent was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Held, that respondent was entitled to testify as to what appellant's wife told him about the transaction, and how she came to sign a purchase-money mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Kuns against George M. Dias, Emma F. Dias, and Joe G. Coelha, who filed a cross-complaint. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from a judgment on the cross-complaint directing partition, and an order denying new trial, George M. Dias appeals. Affirmed.

Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for appellant. Griffin & Carlson and J. W. Hawkins, all of Modesto, for defendants respondents. E. J. Fleming, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The complaint in the action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed December 20, 1909, by George M. and Emma F. Dias to secure the payment of a certain promissory note, of the above date, made and delivered to plaintiff. The note was made payable six years after date, but the word "years" was omitted by clerical error. In the description of the real property mortgaged, section 31 was by like error made to read 30. The complaint seeks to have these mistakes corrected. Defendant Joe G. Coelha is alleged "to have some right, title, or interest or lien in or to said premises described in said mortgage or some part thereof, which interest and claim were subsequent to and subject to the lien of said mortgage."

Defendant Emma F. Dias in her answer alleged that at the time the mortgage was executed she was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the mortgaged premises, but since said date she granted and sold said interest to defendant Coelha, who is now the owner thereof.

Defendant Coelha, in his answer, alleges that he is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the mortgaged premises, and that defendant Emma F. Dias conveyed to him said interest on January 11, 1913; that he is a purchaser in good faith and for value of said interest in said premises. By way of cross-complaint, alleges that he and defendant George M. Dias are tenants in common of the said premises, each owning an undivided one-half interest therein; that plaintiff claims to be the owner and holder of a mortgage on said land given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $8,816, "which he claims to be a valid and subsisting lien against said land"; that "ever since this defendant became an owner of an undivided one-half interest in said land, defendant George M. Dias has collected the rents, issues, and profits from said land, and has failed and refused to account therefor to this defendant"; that "there are no liens or incumbrances on said land and premises appearing of record other than those hereinbefore mentioned, and that no person other than this defendant and the said defendant George M. Dias are interested in the said premises as owner or otherwise, except as hereinbefore alleged; that this defendant has been compelled to employ Messrs. Griffin & Carlton and J. W. Hawkins as his attorneys to defend this action and to prosecute the action set forth in this cross-complaint, and $500 is a reasonable attorney's fee for such attorneys."

The prayer of the cross-complaint is "for a partition of said real property according to the respective rights of the parties hereto"; or, if a partition cannot be had, for a sale of the premises and a division of the proceeds; for the allowance of attorney's fees; that if it be adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, Henry L. Kuns, is the owner and holder of a promissory note and mortgage upon said premises, that the amount thereof be ascertained and determined, and that the same be paid from the proceeds of the sale of said property, and that the residue received from the sale of said property after payment of all costs and expenses incurred in said action be partitioned between this defendant and defendant George M. Dias; and that said Dias be compelled to account for all rents, issues, and profits from said land since January 11, 1913, and such further order as shall be just and equitable.

Defendant George M. Dias, answering the cross-complaint of defendant Coelha, denied that Coelha or any other person is the owner as tenant in common or otherwise with this defendant in said land, or is the owner of any interest therein "except as hereinafter set forth"; denied that this defendant, since January 1, 1913, has collected any rent, issue, or profit from said land, or has refused to account to said Coelha, and alleged that said Coelha is not and never was entitled to any of the rents, issues, or profits of said land; denied that said Coelha had been compelled to employ attorneys, as by him alleged, or at all; alleged that the whole of said tract of land "is the community property of the defendant George M. Dias and the defendant Emma F. Dias"; that said land was acquired by this defendant after his marriage with said Emma, by contract of purchase with plaintiff, and that thereafter, about December 20, 1909, "said Kuns, on the request of the defendant George M. Dias, and on the payment to said Kuns of a large part of the purchase price of said land by the said George M. Dias to said Kuns, made and executed a deed of grant, bargain, and sale of said land and delivered the same to said George M. Dias; that said deed so executed and delivered conveyed said land, on its face, to said George M. Dias and to said Emma F. Dias, his wife"; that this defendant, when said deed was delivered and for many months thereafter, believed that he was the sole grantee therein named; that said Emma took no part in any of the agreements in relation to the transfer of said land, with said Kuns, except to sign and execute a mortgage and note for the unpaid purchase price of said land, and that the name of said Emma was inserted in said deed "without the knowledge, request, or consent of the defendant George M. Dias"; that this defendant is "a foreigner and not educated in the English language, and did not read or otherwise acquaint himself with the contents of the said deed, at or before its delivery, and relied solely on the good faith of said Kuns and in the confidence existing between himself and said Kuns, as to the proper wording and execution of said deed, according to their agreements theretofore made"; that this defendant had not, prior to the execution of said deed, promised or agreed with his said wife that he would convey or cause to be conveyed to her an undivided interest in said land, nor has he since so promised; that his said wife did not have any knowledge that she was named as grantee in said deed or claim any ownership in said land, except as the wife of this defendant, until on or about the 7th day of January, 1913, on which date she sold an undivided one-half interest in said land to said Coelha and conveyed the same to him; that said deed was made without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, and "said Coelha still holds said deed against the will and without the consent of defendant George M. Dias"; on information and belief, alleges that said deed to said Coelha "was made and delivered by her without consideration, and to unlawfully and fraudulently deprive said defendant George M. Dias of his interest therein"; that said Coelha well knew at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed by said Emma to him of the interest of this defendant in said land "and said Coelha took said deed with such knowledge and conspired with said Emma F. Dias, then and there, to defraud said defendant George M. Dias of his interest and the interest of the community in and to said land, so conveyed to him, the said Coelha"; that unless a reconveyance of said interest in said land so conveyed to said Coelha can be had, this defendant has been and will be damaged in the sum of $10,000.

The prayer is that Coelha take nothing by his cross-complaint; that the deed from defendant Emma F. Dias to Coelha be canceled, and that a reconveyance of said property by said Emma be ordered; that this defendant recover damages against said Coelha in the sum of $10,000, and that this defendant have his costs and such further relief as may seem meet in equity.

Plaintiff, answering Coelha's cross-complaint, denied most of the averments thereof, generally on information and belief; alleged the material averments of the complaint and alleged that plaintiff's security "will be greatly impaired and lessened if partition be made of said mortgaged premises."

Findings were waived. It was adjudged that Coelha's interest in the premises was acquired subsequent to and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage and with full knowledge thereof; the corrections prayed for in the note and mortgage were made, as also the usual provisions for the sale of the property and payment of the amount found to be due; also the usual provision for a deficiency judgment. Among the provisions of the decree are the following:

> "It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendant Joe Goncalves Coelha and defendant George M. Dias are the owners in common of that certain real property [the land in suit]. It further appearing to the court that all the parties to said action have consented that only one referee be appointed to partition the land and premises hereinbefore described between the defendant Joe Goncalves Coelha and the defendant George M. Dias, subject, however, to the foreclosure and sale thereunder of the mortgage hereinbefore mentioned, Wherefore, it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that that certain declaration of homestead filed by Emma F. Dias upon the land and premises hereinbefore described and dated the 5th day of December, 1912, and recorded, * * * is null and void."

The decree appoints J. E. Russell referee to make partition, "and that the said referee be and he hereby is vested with all the powers necessary to perform all the duties required or created by this interlocutory decree so far as the same affects the partition of the lands and premises hereinbefore described." The decree proceeds to order partition, etc., "provided, however, that if the said J. E. Russell, referee in partition, finds and ascertains that said property cannot be so partitioned, quality and quantity relatively considered, then he shall thereupon report the same to the court, specifying the manner in which he shall have executed his trust."

It is further decreed that if the premises cannot be partitioned, "in that case and after the referee has so reported the premises be sold as required by law, subject to the payment of the mortgage aforesaid and subject to the judgment of foreclosure and order of sale herein, and sale thereunder, and that the proceeds from such sale, after payment of all costs of partition and attorney's fees be divided and one-half thereof paid to the said Joe Goncalves Coelha and one-half thereof to said George M. Dias."

Defendant George M. Dias appeals from the portions of the judgment decreeing that defendant Coelha and defendant George M. Dias are owners in common of the premises; that the homestead declared by defendant Emma Dias is void; that a referee in partition be appointed and from other portions of the judgment relating to the partition of said premises. Said defendant also appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial. In his brief appellant states that his appeal "is urged only to that portion of the judgment based upon the cross-complaint of Coelha, viz. the partition of the property decreeing that Coelha is the owner of an undivided one-half interest therein. We make no objection to the decree and judgment of foreclosure of mortgage."

The points discussed in appellant's brief are: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction in foreclosure proceedings to try title to property or to partition the property to be foreclosed. (2) That the court had no authority or jurisdiction to determine the homestead to be null and void. (3) That it appears from the record that the property was the community property of appellant, and that Coelha purchased with knowledge sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to the true status of the property, and had knowledge of the homestead declared by Mrs. Dias in which she claimed the property to be community property.

[1] When the cause was called for trial it appeared that an action had been commenced by Coelha against George M. Dias, H. L. Kuns, and John Doe, No. 2916, prior to the foreclosure action, for partition of the premises. Some discussion arose as to whether the question of partition should be tried on Coelha's cross-complaint or on the pleadings in the action No. 2916. It was finally stipulated and the court made an order that the present case, No. 2923, and No. 2916, be consolidated and tried together. There was no objection by any of the parties to the trial of the issues for partition. We must presume that upon the consolidation of the cases the pleadings in No. 2916 were before the court, although they do not appear in the record, and we must presume further that these pleadings were sufficient to present the issues neccessary in an action for partition. No objection was made by appellant to the testimony on such issues. A lis pendens filed in action No. 2916 was introduced without objection, and its recitals show that the purpose of the action "is for the partition of the real estate hereinafter described (the premises here involved), and to have it ordered, adjudged and decreed that if partition of said real estate cannot be had, that the said real estate be sold and the proceeds distributed in partition among the parties to this action in accordance with their respective interests therein." It is perhaps unusual for partition to be sought in a foreclosure proceeding, and, probably, had there been objection the court would not have made the order. But as all parties agreed that whatever was done in the matter of partition should be subordinated to plaintiff's right first to foreclose and sell the land under the foreclosure proceeding, we can see no legal objection to the course taken at the trial. In Towle Bros. Co. v. Quinn, 141 Cal. 382, 385, 74 Pac. 1046, cited by appellant, the action was foreclosure of mortgage. Over defendant Hanlon's objection, the complaint was amended by setting up the proceedings in an action in partition, previously commenced, and praying for an order that in effect took over the action in partition and carrying out its object in the foreclosure action. The sale under the partition proceeding had not yet taken place. On the appeal of Hanlon in the foreclosure action the court said:

> "The plaintiff in the partition suit was not called upon to make the respondent (Towle Bros. Co.) herein a party defendant, for he had no lien of record when that suit was commenced. See Code Civ. Proc. §§ 752-801. Indeed, when the suit was commenced respondent had no mortgage at all; and the one which was afterwards executed to it was not recorded until after the interlocutory decree, but respondent undoubtedly had the right and it was its duty to intervene in that suit and set up its mortgage lien, and have it adjudicated in the partition decree as provided by the Code. At least it could not afterwards, in its separate action to foreclose the mortgage, rightfully ask the court to cross over and take charge of the partition suit. This is not a bill to vacate a judgment on the ground of fraud," etc.

In the present case Coelha's interest in the land was acquired after the execution and recordation of the mortgage, and he was properly made a party to the foreclosure action in order to have his interest adjudged to be subsequent and subordinate to the mortgage. Had he objected to the consolidation of the partition suit with the foreclosure action, his position would have been that of Hanlon in the Towle Bros. Case. But he and all other of the parties, plaintiff and defendants, stipulated that the partition and foreclosure cases should be heard and determined in the foreclosure case, and as both were of equitable cognizance, the power of the court so to proceed cannot now be questioned.

[2] That the court had the right to try questions of title we think well settled. In Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 29, 77 Pac. 712, 716, objection was made that the rights of defendants, as adverse occupants, could not be determined in that case. The court said:

> "It is settled in this state that the rights of adverse occupants of land sought to be partitioned 'may be put in issue, tried, and determined in such action' "—citing De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 335 [87 Am. Dec. 81]; Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 577 [95 Am. Dec. 139]; Martin v. Walker, 58 Cal. 597; Jameson v. Hayward, 106 Cal. 689 [39 Pac. 1078, 46 Am. St. Rep. 268].

In Morenhout v. Higuera, 32 Cal. 290, 295, the court said:

> "The interest of each, or all, may be put in issue by the others; and if so, such issues are to be first tried and determined, and no partition can be made until the respective interests of all the parties have been ascertained and settled by a trial."

See Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 531.

It is contended that the averments in the pleadings are insufficient in partition, and that the decree of partition is not supported by any testimony, the point being, as we understand appellant, that no title was shown in Coelha. It was alleged in the cross-complaint of Coelha that he is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property, and defendant George M. Dias is the owner of the remaining one-half, and that there were no liens or incumbrances on the land appearing of record other than those mentioned, "and that no persons other than this defendant and the said defendant George M. Dias are interested in the said premises, as owner or otherwise." What allegations upon this question were in the pleadings on the partition suit does not appear. All the pleadings seem to proceed upon the assumption that the interests involved were only those of Coelha and appellant. Dias in his answer denied that Coelha, "one of the defendants herein, or any other person is the owner, as tenant in common or otherwise, with the said defendant George M. Dias in the tract of land described in said cross-complaint of said Coelha, or any tract of land described herein or at all, except as hereinafter alleged." And the pleading then alleges that the land is the community property of Dias, and that his wife Emma had no interest in it. In its decree the court declared that the property belonged to Coelha and Dias as cotenants in equal shares, and thus disposed of all the property and all of the interests therein of all persons known or unknown.

Coelha's title was based upon a grant deed of the premises in question, dated January 11, 1913, by Emma F. Dias, granting to Joe Goncalves Coelha, grantee, which said deed recited that it was "made subject to a mortgage upon said premises," plaintiff's mortgage, and purported to convey "all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate," etc., describing the mortgaged premises. Coelha also introduced and there was admitted in evidence without objection a grant, bargain and sale deed, of date December 20, 1909, reading:

> "Henry L. Kuns and Mary E. Kuns, husband and wife, of Lordsburg, California, in consideration of ten dollars, and other good and valuable considerations, to them in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby grant to George M. Dias and Emma F. Dias, husband and wife, of the county of Merced, state of California, all that real property," etc.

—particularly described by metes and bounds and being the mortgaged premises here involved.

[3] Section 164 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

> "All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, is community property; but whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property. And in case the conveyance be to such married woman and to her husband, or to her and any other person, the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her, as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument, and the presumption in this section mentioned is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration. * * *"

Under this section two presumptions arise from the terms of the Kuns' deed: First, a disputable presumption that title to an undivided one-half interest, as tenant in common, in the property described in the deed vested in Mrs. Dias "as her separate property"; second, this presumption is conclusive in favor of Coelha if he was a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration. We are authorized to assume, in support of the judgment, findings having been waived, that the court held that the presumption in favor of Mrs. Dias' title was not overcome by evidence and, whether overcome or not, that Coelha was a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration.

The Supreme Court said, in Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 649, 77 Pac. 657, 658:

> "The law will not allow idle presumptions to be indulged in against a deed delivered and recorded. Facts must be proven from which it is clearly made to appear that the property, in such case, is community property, or the deed will be given effect according to its terms."

Appellant sought to establish his right to the property as against Coelha's right by introducing a declaration of homestead by his wife recorded prior to her deed to Coelha; also by appellant's testimony, by the testimony of Kuns, grantor of the deed to appellant, and by the testimony of Coelha, both of whom were introduced as appellant's witnesses.

[4, 5] The homestead interest of Emma F. Dias was not mentioned in any of the pleadings. The declaration of homestead was introduced by appellant apparently to support his claim that the property was community property because she so stated in her declaration. Furthermore, appellant would have been advantaged, had the homestead proven to be valid, for it would have annulled the deed made subsequently to Coelha by Mrs. Dias for the reason that her husband did not join in its execution. The declaration of homestead having been introduced by appellant, it was competent for Coelha to show its invalidity, which he did by undisputed evidence that Mrs. Dias was not living on the property at the time the homestead was declared. Mrs. Dias testified:

> "Q. Had you lived on that ranch for one year before that time? A. No. Q. And you have not lived on the ranch since? A. No, sir. Q. You never filed any other homestead on the premises except that one? A. No, sir; I never did."

She had in fact been living apart from her husband. He testified that she left him in October, 1911, as we understand the evidence, and never came back to the ranch. The homestead was recorded December 5, 1912. Appellant testified, "She never did live on this part of the ranch in controversy either before or after she left me or at all." All that is now claimed by appellant is, as stated in appellant's brief, that "the portion of the decree which declared the homestead null and void 'is superfluous and nugatory.'" It is urged, however, that Coelha had knowledge of this homestead or of facts putting him on inquiry that it existed, and that he is charged with knowledge of the statement in the declaration "that the land and premises hereinafter described is the community property of myself and my said husband, George M. Dias." Coelha testified that he knew Mrs. Dias had declared a homestead on the premises, but he was advised by his attorney that it was invalid for the reason that the statement made therein that she was at the time residing on the property was not true; that he purchased the property in good faith, paying her $1,500 for her interest and assumed the payment of the mortgage; that he made the payment by a check on a Modesto bank where he kept his account and "she cashed the check." On his redirect examination by appellant's attorney Coelha testified:

"Mr. Whitby: Q. From what Mrs. Dias told you, did you know that she was contemplating another action for divorce at that time? A. She came over to me and she said that she was getting no support for the children, and she came there to see Mr. Griffin, and Mr. Griffin was not there, and Mrs. Dias told me that Crow from the west side advised her to go to see Hawkins, so I took her over to Mr. Hawkins; she told all of her troubles to Mr. Hawkins, that George Dias offered her $500 if she signed all the rights back to George Dias to the property. She said to Hawkins that George Dias offered her $500 if she would turn all the property back to George Dias and signed away the rights, and Mr. Hawkins asked her if she could sell it that way, and she said she would like to get more, and Mr. Hawkins asked her if it was separate property, and she said that it was because she signed the deed and mortgage, so at that time Mr. Hawkins asked me why I did not want to buy the property, and I told him if she would give me a good title, I would buy it, and he said, 'I will write to the county clerk and find out.' In the meantime, I went to see the property, and when I came back Hawkins got a letter from the county clerk of Merced, and he told me that she could give me a good title, and I told her I would give her $1,500, and I would pay the mortgage, that is it. She told me that Dias had offered to give her $500 if she would sign her rights back to him; she showed the letter to Hawkins, and I think the letter was $500. Q. Before you bought that property, did you know that she had put a homestead on it? A. Well, she told me it was a homestead, but she could release the homestead, just a tract which she told me the homestead was on. Q. She did not release it, did she? A. Mr. Hawkins told me it is not valid; he said that homestead did not amount to anything, and they found out she did not live on the place, what my lawyer told me. * * * I did not know, prior to the purchase of this land from Mrs. Dias, that the title was in question; I know that my lawyer told me it was good; that she could give me a good title, and that's what I did. I bought it; she told me that her husband had offered her $500 to deed back the land to him; when George Dias wanted to give $500 and she to sign all her rights back to him, I thought she could give it to me as long as she could give it to George."

He was examined at considerable length by appellant's counsel in an effort to show that he was present in court when the divorce proceedings between appellant and his wife were in progress, and thus became aware that the title to this land was in dispute; but there was no evidence that the pleadings were read in his hearing, or that he knew of any dispute as to the title, or that the question was discussed in his presence or hearing. The pleadings were introduced, but are not made part of the bill of exceptions.

Assuming that Coelha was put upon inquiry as to the title, what were the sources of information to which he was called upon to resort? The deed from Kuns on its face showed that Mrs. Dias owned a half interest in the property which she could convey. The statement in the homestead declaration that the property was the community property of herself and husband was not conclusive, nor did it necessarily cast any doubt upon the language of the deed, and for the purposes of the homestead it was immaterial whether the property was community or separate. Besides, she claimed and so told Coelha that it was her separate property, and she exhibited a letter in which her husband had offered her $500 for her interest. Furthermore, Coelha had the advice of an attorney that Mrs. Dias could convey a good title. Coelha testified that Mrs. Dias made the following statement to him, at the time of the sale to him, in explanation of how she came to sign the note and mortgage, and why the property was conveyed to her and her husband:

"Mrs. Dias told me she is in a family way, and a few months before she had her baby she lived with her father, her mother and father; and Dias came home and said 'Mrs. Kuns is in town and wants you to go with me and sign that deed, the note and mortgage,' and Mrs. Dias told him, 'What is the matter? Can't you do that alone without I go?' and she said, 'I don't feel well,' and George Dias said, 'Well, it is better for you because suppose if you die and the child lives, the child would get one-half of the property,' and he said, 'If everything be in my name, I will get everything,' and he said, 'If you go and sign everything, one-half of the property belongs to you,' and she went with George Dias and signed the deed and note. Q. Did she tell you that Mr. Dias has told her that he had the deed made in her name? A. The property belonged to the two of them, and in case of death if she died and if the child was born alive, she would get one-half of it. Q. She told you that? A. She told me that George Dias told her that. * * *

"Mr. Carlson: Q. What was said at that time about the homestead? A. I think Mr. Hawkins told her that the homestead is not valid because she don't live on the place, and that she could give me a deed. He said the homestead is not valid; she said the homestead had been filed just so that George could not sell, something like protection and for the support of the children; I considered that the property, I mean that half interest, is mine absolutely; I paid $1,500 for it; this is not the first piece of land that I have bought; I have bought over $40,000 worth of property in a little less than three years; I have bought and sold and I have sold over $30,000 worth of property."

Mr. Kuns testified that so far as he knew Mrs. Dias did not "have anything to do with buying that land," and that personally she did not pay any money. He testified:

"I made an agreement to sell this land to Mr. Dias; I don't remember the exact force of that agreement; I cannot recollect it to mind; I afterwards made a deed to this land; in that deed, the parties or grantees were named as George M. Dias and Emma F. Dias; I certainly did receive directions from Mr. Dias as to who should be made parties and grantees in the deed or I would not have made them grantees; I mean he wanted the deed made to himself and wife, or I should not have put her name in; it is possible that that may have occurred in relation to the mortgage, but I don't think so; I think it was with relation to the transfers. Q. Did he ask and request you to put his wife's name in the deed as well as in the mortgage? A. That is my recollection, but of course I would not undertake to say that is exactly true, because it is awful hard to recollect these things, but I always act on these things according to instructions, because I have no authority whatever to put her name in the deed without its having been at his request; no authority whatever. Q. Well, you did want Mrs. Dias' name in the mortgage? A. Certainly, if her name was in the deed. Q. Whether her name was in the deed or not, you would want her name in the mortgage? A. Well, as a general rule, I think that is customary. Q. Well, you have not any independent recollection, though, that Mr. Dias asked you to do that? A. Not from memory, no, sir; not exactly from memory. I cannot state because I am getting old, and I cannot remember those things as I used to, but I certainly had instructions, or I would not have done what I did do."

Appellant testified that he paid for the property with his own money, and bought it for himself; that he never told his wife that he bought the land for her or that he wanted to make her a gift of one-half of the property. He testified:

> "I never knew she signed any deed, only Mr. Kuns told her to sign on the mortgage, and that is all I know; I never knew her name was on the deed until she left; another thing, she never had been in the family way at the time I made that sale."

It appeared that appellant and Mrs. Dias were married April 24, 1909; their first child was born June 15, 1910.

> "The Court: It was born in June, 1910, and the deed was made in December, 1909. Was she in the family way at that time? A. She never knew it because the baby was born just about 11 months after we get married."

It thus appears that the child was born a little less than 6 months after the deed was made. The period of gestation for the human animal is given at 40 weeks. It is therefore quite probable that Mrs. Dias knew she was in an "interesting situation" on December 20, 1909.

We have given the evidence somewhat at length rather than a statement of what we deemed to be its import, because it is but fair to the trial judge that it be made to appear upon what evidence the court based its conclusions and whether or not its conclusions were well founded.

Appellant cites In re Carlin, 19 Cal. App. 168, 124 Pac. 868, claiming that "the facts disclosed by the opinion are almost identical with the facts of the case at issue." The opinion is by Mr. Justice Shaw of the second appellate district, and the Supreme Court denied a hearing of the case in that court. The principles of law governing this class of cases are succinctly, clearly, and, we think, in the case cited, correctly stated. It will be seen upon an examination of the opinion that the evidence was meager, and, such as it was, all one way. "Moreover," said the learned justice, "as in the case of Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279 [104 Pac. 308], he [the husband] testified positively that in having the property deeded to his wife it was not his intention to give it to her. (Italics the court's.) In the absence of evidence of the existence of any circumstances inconsistent with his testimony, received without objection and conceded to be competent, we are constrained to hold the conclusion of the trial court should not be disturbed."

It is true that in the present case the husband testified that in purchasing the property he did not intend to make a gift to his wife of an interest in the property or that she should share in the title at all. But the trial court evidently did not nor was it bound to accept the testimony of the husband as true, for it was controverted by many and cogent facts and circumstances inconsistent with its verity. Furthermore, there is a feature of this case not present in the Carlin Case, namely, the transfer of the wife's interest to a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, which manifestly the trial court found was supported by the evidence. Whether or not the deed to Mrs. Dias was intended as a gift, and whether or not Coelha was a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, were questions of fact, as was said in the Carlin Case, "to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence adduced at the trial, and its conclusion, unless manifestly without sufficient support, should not be disturbed by an appellate court." We cannot say that the conclusions of the learned trial court were without support.

Some alleged erroneous rulings will be briefly noticed.

[6] When appellant was called as a witness, questions were propounded to him as to how he became possessed of the land in question—how he first became so possessed. (Exceptions numbered 1 and 2.) The objection to the questions was that it was immaterial how he became possessed of the land, and that it was not the best evidence, and that the issues related to the present title. The court ruled that, "if it is in writing, it seems to me they would have the right to make the objection, but if it was not in writing, then he can testify. It is the present title." Counsel for appellant stated that it was his right "to show title from the beginning of the transaction down to the present time." Later the witness was permitted to testify how he came to buy the land, as we have shown by his testimony. His grantor also testified to the circumstances attending the purchase. We cannot see that appellant was prejudiced by the ruling.

[7] The court sustained an objection to a question put to Coelha whether or not Mrs. Dias was considering commencing a second action for divorce at the time the witness was negotiating for the purchase of the property. The question seems to have called for the conclusion of the witness. He stated, "I could explain the way it was, and you could understand it better." An answer yes or no was demanded, and the court sustained the objection. We cannot discover that the witness' knowledge of Mrs. Dias' intentions had any relevancy to the case.

[8, 9] The witness was asked to tell the court what Mrs. Dias told him about this transaction, how she came to sign the note and mortgage. The question was objected to as hearsay, and the objection overruled, and counsel moved to strike out the testimony after it was given on the same ground, which motion was denied. The matter is referred to in appellant's brief as "Exception No. 6, page 101, fol. 302-3," without comment. We would be justified in treating it likewise. The matter was part of the conversation brought out by appellant and occurred at the time Coelha was seeking information about the title and was deciding whether or not to make the purchase. We discover no error in the ruling. It is to be remembered Coelha claimed to be a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, which appellant denied. As tending to show good faith the testimony was admissible.

Appellant concludes his brief by the following statement:

> "The appeal, however, is urged only to that portion of the judgment based upon the cross-complaint of Coelha, viz. the partition of the property decreeing that Coelha is the owner of an undivided one-half interest therein."

We think the evidence was sufficient to support such findings as were necessary to support the judgment. The decree simply means that the property shall first be sold to satisfy the mortgage, and if a surplus remains such surplus shall be dealt with upon the assumption that Coelha and Dias are tenants in common owning equal shares thereof.

In re JEPSON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 5055, 5056.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION 🔑34—PERSONS ENTITLED—NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

Under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 2, providing that the issue of deceased brothers and sisters take by descent in certain cases, and subdivision 4, giving the entire estate to the surviving spouse if decedent does not leave certain enumerated relatives including, as now amended, the issue of deceased brothers and sisters, such issue now take by descent, although it was otherwise before the amendment of subdivision 4.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 97–101.]

Lorigan, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Frederick E. Jepson, deceased. From orders setting apart a homestead to the widow and dismissing contests, deceased's nephews and nieces appeal. Motions to dismiss denied.

Fred N. Arnoldy and Stewart & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Frank Stewart and J. W. Howell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Frederick E. Jepson, upon his death, intestate, left surviving him a widow, but neither issue, nor father, nor mother, nor brother, nor sister. He did, however, leave nephews and nieces, children of deceased brothers and sisters. The widow made application to the court in probate to have set apart to her a homestead. These nephews and nieces filed a contest. Their contest was dismissed by the court in probate, upon the ground that they were not parties in interest. The court made its order setting aside a homestead to the widow. The nephews and nieces have appealed from both of these orders, and their appeals are met with this motion to dismiss upon the ground indicated, namely, that they are not parties in interest.

The question then is this: If these nephews and nieces under our law of succession have no inheritable interest in the estate of the deceased, they are not interested in the widow's application for a homestead, and these appeals should be dismissed. The argument that they have no inheritable interest and are, therefore, not parties in interest, is founded upon the construction which this court gave to subdivisions 5 and 2 of section 1386 of the Civil Code as those subdivisions read before their amendment in 1905, the further contention being advanced that the amendments of 1905 have not changed the law so as to give such nephews and nieces an inheritable interest which before the amendments was not theirs. The cases referred to are Estate of Ingram, 78 Cal. 586, 21 Pac. 435, 12 Am. St. Rep. 80, Estate of Carmody, 88 Cal. 616, 26 Pac. 373, and Estate of Nigro, 149 Cal. 702, 87 Pac. 384. In each of those cases this court was construing, as it was compelled to do, subdivision 2 of section 1386, under the limitations upon that subdivision imposed by the language of subdivision 5 of the same section. By the amendments of 1905 subdivision 5 has become subdivision 4, and for convenience in exposition we will here deal with subdivision 4, it always to be borne in mind that in the cases above cited it was, and was called, subdivision 5.

What, then, were these cases? The first of them, the Estate of Ingram, is the only one calling for analysis, since the other two simply follow the construction placed on the law in the Estate of Ingram. The Estate of Ingram presented precisely the situation that exists in the present case. There was no surviving father or mother; there was no surviving brother or sister, but there were surviving children of a deceased sister. At that time subdivision 4 (then subdivision 5) declared in effect that the whole estate of a spouse dying intestate went to the surviving spouse, unless the deceased spouse left either issue, or a father or a mother, or a brother or a sister. It stopped there. Therefore by this unequivocal language, if no one of these persons was in being, the right of the surviving spouse to take all of the estate was absolutely fixed. To determine the disposition which the law made of an estate under these circumstances when there were not such survivors, the judge in probate primarily, and this court in review, turned to the language of subdivision 2. Subdivision 1 made provision for the case where a deceased spouse left issue as well as a surviving spouse. Subdivision 2 treated of the disposition of the estate in the other contingencies contemplated by subdivision 4, and it declared that if the deceased spouse left father and mother or father or mother, one-half of the estate should go to them or the survivor of them. If there was neither father, nor mother, then the one-half of the estate, which otherwise would have gone to them, went to the living brothers and sisters "and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation." What, then, was the inevitable and necessary construction of these laws forced upon this court? It was simply this: Subdivision 4 had placed no limitation upon the right of the surviving spouse to take all of the estate merely because there might have been living children of a deceased brother or sister, but, to the contrary, had said that unless there were living brothers or sisters, the whole estate should go to the widow. Turning, then, to subdivision 2, which contemplates that in the event that there is a living brother or sister and children of a deceased brother or sister, the children of such deceased brother or sister shall take the parent's share, the construction was inevitable that such children of a deceased brother or sister could take only upon contingency, and that contingency was the existence of a living brother or sister. This construction, we have said, was forced upon this court. We mean forced in the sense that it was an inevitable and unescapable conclusion. The unreasonableness of it—even the injustice of it—was apparent and was recognized. No sound reason could be or ever was attempted to be adduced to support a law which said, as then did ours, that children of a deceased brother or sister could share in the estate if there was another living brother or sister, but could not share if there were none. All that this court could say was: Ita scripta lex. In time the anomaly of the situation came to be recognized by the Legislature and it amended subdivision 4 in a most important particular. It also amended subdivision 2, that it might read harmoniously with the amended subdivision 4. That amendment for the first time added to the classes, the existence of which would forbid the surviving spouse from taking all of the estate "the children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister." Or, to make our meaning plain, paraphrasing the language of subdivision 4, while still maintaining its meaning, originally it declared that all of the estate shall go to the surviving spouse unless the deceased spouse left issue, husband, wife, father, mother, brother, or sister, in which event the estate should go as provided in the previous subdivisions 1 and 2; or, again paraphrasing its meaning, the subdivision declared that the surviving spouse should not take all of the estate if any of these enumerated relations of the deceased spouse survive. By the amendment to subdivision 4 it declared that the surviving spouse should not take all of the estate if, as well as those first enumerated, children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister survived. As a limitation upon the right of the wife to take all of the estate, these children and grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister were placed in the same list and category as a surviving parent or a surviving brother or sister. We now have the law reading as it never read before. We have the law declaring that the surviving spouse shall not take all if the deceased spouse left a surviving father, or mother, or, failing these, left a surviving brother or sister, or, failing these, left children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister. It still becomes necessary to turn to subdivision 2 to learn what disposition the law makes of the estate when any of the contingencies or limitations contemplated by section 4 upon the surviving spouse's right to take all of the estate have arisen, and we do this now with the fixed declaration of the law that the surviving spouse shall not take all of the estate if there be surviving children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister of the deceased spouse. When we turn to the consideration of subdivision 2, with this new light and law before us, we now find a law rationally and justly framed to enable children of a deceased brother or sister to inherit, whether or not there be a surviving brother or sister. If there be a surviving brother or sister, then the children of each deceased brother or sister take collectively their parent's share "by right of representation." If there be no surviving brother or sister, and there be children of more than one deceased brother or sister, each group of such children takes the parent's share by right of representation. Such is the manifest meaning of the amended law; such is the meaning that would have been given to this law from the first—a meaning which this court was unable to give it because of the original limitation in subdivision 4, so often referred to.

And, finally, let it be said, if the amendment to subdivision 4, aptly phrased to accomplish this thing, does not mean this it means nothing, and the Legislature was but beating the air.

The precise question here under consideration has never been directly presented to this court under these amendments to section 1386 of the Civil Code. But upon the other hand there is no decision of the court given since those amendments which follows the views of the Estate of Ingram—the law of which case happily fell to the ground with the existence of the amendments. To the contrary, while the question was not directly presented in them, the opinions in such cases as Estate of Claiborne, 158 Cal. 646, 112 Pac. 278, could only have been written under the recognized concession of the litigants that the law had been changed as indicated—a concession which the court accepted. Estate of Nigro, 172 Cal. 474, 156 Pac. 1019, contains nothing in opposition to what has been here said. In the Estate of Nigro this court simply laid down the unimpeachable proposition that children and grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister were not grouped in the law as forming together one class but as forming two distinct classes, so that grandchildren were entitled to the inheritance only in the event that there were no living children.

The motions to dismiss are therefore denied.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOSS, J.; SHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; LAWLOR, J.

LORIGAN, J. I dissent. As subdivisions 2 and 4 of section 1386 of the Civil Code now stand they provide—subdivision 2—that:

> "If the decedent leaves no issue, the estate goes one half to the surviving husband or wife, and the other half to the decedent's father and mother in equal shares, and if either is dead the whole of said half goes to the other. If there is no father or mother, then one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of decedent and to the children or grandchildren of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation."

I have italicized that portion of the section more particularly involved in the consideration of this matter. Subdivision 4 provides that:

> "If the decedent leaves a surviving husband or wife, and neither issue, father, mother, brother, sister, nor the children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife."

These are the only subdivisions of the section requiring attention. Appellants base their claim as heirs to a portion of the estate of decedent under subdivision 2 of the section.

When the Ingram Case, referred to in the prevailing opinion, was decided in 1889, subdivision 2 of section 1386 read just as it does now except that in 1905—many years after it was decided—it was amended so as to add the words "or grandchildren" after the word "children." The other subdivision quoted above—subdivision 4—is the same now as it was when the Ingram Case was decided, except that it was then marked subdivision 5, and except, further, that it also was amended in 1905 to add "nor the children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister" after the word "sister." These amendments do not affect the situation here as far as grandchildren are concerned because there are none.

Now, as to the Ingram Case, 78 Cal. 586, 21 Pac. 435, 12 Am. St. Rep. 80. It appears therefrom that Mrs. Ingram, deceased, left a surviving husband, but no issue and no surviving father, mother, brother, or sister. There were, however, left by her certain children and grandchildren of a deceased sister, who, on distribution of the estate, claimed that they were entitled to one-half of it. The trial court having ignored their claim entirely and having distributed all the estate to the assignee of the surviving husband, the said children and grandchildren of the said deceased sister appealed. They asserted, as do the appellants here, that they were entitled to one-half of the estate under said subdivision 2 of section 1386. This court, however, held to the contrary, and in construing both subdivisions 2 and 5 (now 4 as amended) said:

> "It is entirely beyond doubt that the whole of the estate should have been distributed to the surviving husband. Paragraph 5 of section 1386 of the Civil Code is too clear to present any difficulty of construction whatever. It is as follows: 'If the decedent leave a surviving husband or wife, and neither issue, father, mother, brother, nor sister, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife.' Paragraph 2 of said section refers to the case where there is a surviving brother or sister, and provides that in such case, if there be also children of the deceased brother or sister, they shall take their parents' share by right of representation. It is vain to argue against the injustice of the rule, or to contend that in a case like the one at bar the children of a deceased sister ought to have a share in the estate when there is not any surviving brother or sister, as well as when there is. Succession to estates is purely a matter of statutory regulation, which cannot be changed by courts."

While this was a department decision, the construction put on these subdivisions was subsequently affirmed in bank in Re Carmody, 88 Cal. 616, 26 Pac. 373, and Estate of Fabricio Nigro, 149 Cal. 702, 87 Pac. 384, in which latter case it was declared, while not questioning the construction of the subdivisions as made in the Ingram Case, that such interpretation of the law had theretofore become a rule of property which should be and is adhered to. These two decisions were made under the subdivisions as they stood prior to the said amendments of 1905, and they are confirmatory of the construction in the Ingram Case of the subdivisions as they then stood, and such construction should be adhered to not only as a proper one, but as having become a long-established rule of property, unless the amendment of 1905 to subdivision 4 compels a different construction. The prevailing opinion decides that it does. I am unable to agree with it. Certainly, the amendment of 1905 of subdivision 2 itself worked no change in the construction as given in the Ingram Case. That amendment amounted only to the insertion of the word "grandchildren" therein which obviously operated solely as an enlargement of the class who might take if the class of "children or grandchildren" could take at all. No one claims that this subdivision alone, as amended, called for any different construction than it received in the Ingram Case. And appellants do not. So it must be taken that as far as subdivision 2 is concerned it means, taken by itself, just what it has always meant and as the Ingram Case declared it meant, namely, that the issue of a brother or sister of a deceased spouse could not inherit unless there were also a brother or sister left surviving the decedent. It is claimed, however, that a change in subdivision 2 was wrought through the amendment of subdivision 4 in 1905. If this is not so, then it has not been wrought at all. If the amendment did have this effect, where is the language in it which declares it? The insertion in subdivision 4 of the words "nor the children or grandchildren" is not language potent or positive of itself to give them the right to inherit at all. These words were simply inserted in subdivision 4 to have it conform to subdivision 2 and make it consistent and harmonious with it. What the amendment to both these subdivisions amounted to is as to subdivision 2—that grandchildren and children of a deceased sister or brother may with a surviving brother or sister of a decedent inherit one-half the estate of a decedent with the surviving spouse, but only where there is a surviving brother or sister of the decedent who is entitled to do so. As to subdivision 4—that the surviving spouse shall inherit the whole estate when the decedent leaves "neither * * * brother, sister, nor the children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister." In other words, when the decedent spouse leaves none of those who, as enumerated therein, would be entitled to inherit one-half of it under subdivision 2, then the whole estate goes to the surviving spouse. It will be observed also that the only subdivision which gives brothers or sisters, children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister, in plain and direct language any right to inherit with a surviving spouse at all is this subdivision 2. Subdivision 4 does not pretend to confer any right of inheritance on any one save the surviving spouse, and then gives the whole estate to such survivor when none of the parties exist who under subdivision 2, re-enumerated in subdivision 4, would be entitled to take. It is necessarily understood when subdivision 4 declares that on the nonexistence of any of the different classes enumerated therein, the surviving spouse takes the whole estate, that what is meant is that none of the classes exist who, if left, would be capable of inheriting under subdivision 2. Anderson v. Potter, 5 Cal. 63. If the Legislature did not agree with the interpretation in the Ingram Case it took it many years—some 17—to enact something different with the result that instead of a clear and positive enactment as to inheritable rights, if that was the intended subject, we are still left to indulge in more construction and interpretation as to what was meant. Certainly, if it was intended to change the Ingram rule and establish a different rule of succession, it was not difficult for the Legislature to do so and do it in plain certain language in the proper place. If children and grandchildren were to inherit one-half with the surviving spouse, though no brothers or sisters survived the decedent, it could have easily and clearly said so in subdivision 2, where the inheritable rights of said persons are declared, and not left it to be construed through the use of negative, indirect, and obscure language inserted in subdivision 4, and which does not refer to succession or inheritance at all, and particularly where the only inheriting language used in said section is that conferring a positive inheritable right on the surviving spouse. I am satisfied that the enumeration in subdivision 4 of any of those who might not be entitled to take with the surviving spouse the one-half of the estate under subdivision 2 was made simply as a reason for granting or vesting the whole estate in such surviving spouse and as not affecting the change in the rules of succession declared in subdivision 2 and as construed in the Ingram Case.

The Estate of Claiborne, 158 Cal. 646, 112 Pac. 278, is not to be taken as authority questioning the rule of the Ingram Case. That case is not mentioned or discussed there, nor was the construction of subdivisions 2 and 4, or either of them, involved in that appeal. It could not be, as the question there was not one of succession on intestacy, but the construction of peculiar terms in a will. As far as the Estate of Ellen Nigro, 172 Cal. 474, 156 Pac. 1019, is concerned, while it did not involve the same question as here—the construction of subdivisions 2 and 4—it did involve the construction of subdivisions 2 and 3. In that construction the reasoning in the Ingram Case was applied and approved, and I do not perceive that the two cases present any radical difference between them in the language used as to inheritable rights.

I think the trial court was correct in holding that the appellants had no interest in the estate which entitled them to appear therein or to be heard on appeal to this court, and that the motions to dismiss their appeals should be granted.

REALTY DOCK & IMPROVEMENT CORP. v. ANDERSON et al. (S. F. 6833.)

1. Fixtures 🔑27(2) — Trade Fixtures — Rights of Lessor — Removal of Improvements—Statute.

Where a lease provided that all alterations, additions, and improvements to the premises by the lessee should become the property of the lessor, it is not material in determining the rights of the parties to a safety deposit vault constructed in the basement whether such vault was a trade fixture within Civ. Code, § 1019, giving the tenant the right to remove a trade fixture at any time before the termination of his lease if the removal could be effected without injury to the premises, unless the thing had by the manner in which it was affixed became an integral part of the premises, or whether the removal could be effected in the manner prescribed in that section, but the rights of the parties are to be governed solely by the provisions of the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fixtures, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 22, 44, 45, 54.]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑157(2, 3) — LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—"IMPROVEMENT."

Within the provisions of a lease that no alterations, repairs, or changes should be made by the tenant except with consent of the lessor, and that all alterations, additions, and improvements made by the tenant should be the property of the lessor, a safety deposit vault built in accordance with the terms of the lease by the lessee, a bank, which consisted of a large room erected on the basement floor having substantial brick walls and a steel and concrete roof, all lined on both sides with steel plates, and having a steel door, became the property of the lessor, whether or not it was a trade fixture, since the term "improvement" is much more comprehensive than "fixture," and the bank commissioner was therefore liable to the lessor for removing the steel lining and the door from the vault.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Realty Dock & Improvement Corporation against Alden Anderson and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. R. Sweasey, F. A. Cutler, and Gillett & Cutler, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. In June, 1908, the Union State Bank, a banking corporation, leased and went into the occupancy of a portion of the Monadnock Building in San Francisco, under a ten-year lease from Herbert C. Law, its owner. In October, 1908, Law sold the property and assigned his interest in the lease given to him by the Union State Bank to the plaintiff. In July, 1909, the defendant Alden Anderson, as superintendent of banks of this state, declared the Union State Bank to be insolvent, took charge of its property, business, and banking premises, and with the assistance of his codefendant, S. P. Young, his deputy, removed all the personal property of the bank from the building as expeditiously as possible, at that time, among other things, removing, over the protest of the plaintiff, a steel door and the exterior and interior steel plate linings of a large safe deposit vault which, under the terms of its lease, the bank had constructed in the basement of the leased banking premises.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for the removal of said steel door and said exterior and interior steel lining of said vault, which it alleged were wrongfully removed. The court made findings and entered a judgment in favor of defendants, from which, and a denial of its motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The court found that by the terms of the lease made between the plaintiff and the Union State Bank the bank was leased a certain amount of space on the ground floor of the Monadnock Building for ordinary banking business, and also a large room in the basement immediately below the ground floor space; said basement room to be used for safe deposit vaults to be constructed in said basement for the customers of the bank; that the premises leased should not be used "for any other purposes than that of banking and safe deposit business without the written consent of the lessor." The lease further provided:

> "That said premises should not be altered, repaired, or changed without the written consent of the lessor, and that unless otherwise provided by written agreement all alterations, improvements, and changes should be done either by or under the direction of the lessor, but at the cost of the said lessee; that all alterations, additions, and improvements made in and to said premises should, unless otherwise provided by a written agreement, be the property of the lessor and should remain upon and be surrendered with the premises."

As to the construction of the brick vault: The court found that the bank upon entering into possession of the premises constructed a safe deposit vault in said basement; that said vault rested on the floor of said basement and was not connected with the walls of the basement or with the ceiling, and was approximately 20 feet wide by 30 feet long and between 8 and 9 feet high; the walls of said vault were 2 feet thick, made of brick, and lined inside and out with sheets of steel; the vault was provided with a steel door and steel paneling surrounding the door; within this vault the said Union State Bank placed safe deposit boxes for the use of its customers; that neither said vault, door, or paneling in it was imbedded or affixed to said building owned by plaintiff, nor attached or affixed to its walls or connected therewith, and formed no integral part of said building, and was not placed in the basement of said building or in said building as an "alteration, addition, or improvement" thereto, but was placed there for the purpose of trade as aforesaid, and not otherwise, and the same could be removed from said building and from said basement without causing any injury or damage thereto.

These matters are taken from the findings. But in addition to said findings, and showing more in detail all about the construction of said vault and the removal thereof, the following undisputed facts taken from the record are referred to: The safe deposit vault was constructed by the bank under the provisions of the lease and as an essential aid to the proper conduct of its banking business, and was of such substantial character and strength and permanency of construction as to render safe and secure protection for the valuables of the depositors and of sufficient size to be convenient and commodious for them. This vault was built in a corner of the basement room, and one side and one end were set against said basement walls. These were not connected by cement or mortar with such basement walls, but were built up against and parallel therewith. The vault room was built up from the floor of said basement to the width, breadth and height as found by the court. The walls were 2 feet thick, built of brick; they were constructed from the cement floor of the basement, the brick being laid on the basement floor and affixed thereto by means of mortar mixed with cement. The roof of the vault did not reach the ceiling of the basement, but was constructed of 9-inch steel I beams, 18 feet long, laid close together across the vault walls and filled in with brick and cement. The reasonable cost of the construction of the vault brickwork was $800. The vault was lined inside and out with burnished steel casing; the outer steel casing being placed there solely for ornamental purposes. The steel of the ceiling of the vault was secured to the steel beams entering into its construction, and the inner and outside steel linings were screwed to the brick walls of the vault. The steel door and vestibule (one piece) was set in mortar and secured by flanges to the vault walls to hold it in place. This door and the inner and outer linings of the vault were of the reasonable value of $2,550. The defendants in dismantling the vault unscrewed the steel linings, inner and outer, from the walls of the ceiling, and broke away the plaster from around the steel door and vestibule and took them out. The taking out of the door left the brick walls about the door somewhat jagged and ragged on one side, but otherwise the brickwork of the walls was not injured. No attempt was made to remove any of the walls or ceilings of the vault save as we have indicated. In fact, the only portions taken were the door and vestibule and the inner and exterior steel linings. Otherwise the vault room was left intact. As to the vault room itself, as originally constructed and equipped and used by the bank, it was provided with safe deposit boxes on three sides, and with chairs, tables, and other accommodations for the patrons of the safe deposit department. When these defendants dismantled the vault in the manner described and took away the property in question they did so by breaking the sidewalk in front of the building and taking it out through the opening so made. This was the only way in which the articles could be removed.

It is insisted by the appellant that the finding of the trial court that neither the vault, nor door, nor panelings, when constructed, were affixed to the building owned by plaintiff and formed no integral part of the building leased, and were not placed in the basement of said building, or in said building, as an "alteration, addition, or improvement" thereto, is not sustained by the evidence. While this finding, as a whole, embraces several particular findings, we do not think it necessary to consider the attack of appellant upon all of them, because we are satisfied that its contention is correct as to the particular finding that this vault was not placed in said building as an "alteration, addition, or improvement" thereto, and it is upon the fact as to whether the construction of the vault did or did not constitute an "alteration, addition, or improvement" to the building that the rights of the parties in this action are to be determined.

[1] The theory of the respondents appears to be, and was doubtless that adopted by the trial court, that the construction of this vault in the manner and style described in the evidence constituted it simply a trade fixture which, under section 1019 of the Civil Code, the tenant had a right to remove at any time before the termination of his lease if the removal could be effected without injury to the premises unless the thing had by the manner in which it was affixed become an integral part of the premises. We do not think, however, as we have just said, that the finding of the court in as far as it determines that the vault is a trade fixture, and that it could be removed from the building without causing any injury thereto, is of any consequence. Nor do we think it of any moment in the consideration of this appeal whether the vault was imbedded in or affixed to the main building and had become an integral part thereof, except in so far as these matters may bear on what we consider the determinative question in the case, namely, whether its construction constituted an "alteration, addition, or improvement" in the premises which under the terms of the lease inured to the lessor. It is not a matter of controlling importance whether the vault as constructed was a permanent or a movable fixture. We are not here considering the rights arising by operation of law only between landlord and tenant as to the articles placed upon the leased premises by the latter. On the contrary, these rights are to be determined from the terms of the lease under which the parties undertook to fix them. The lease provided that no "alterations, repairs, or changes" should be made by the tenant except with the consent of the lessor, and that, as to them, provided that all "alterations, additions, and improvements" should be the property of the lessor. This vault was built under the terms of the lease and with the consent of the lessor. Hence, the only question is, Did this construction of the vault result in an "alteration, addition, or improvement" to the premises leased? If it did not, the defendants, as representing the lessee, had a right to remove it as they did. If it did, then it belonged to the plaintiff and the defendants had no right to interfere with it.

[2] It appears to us as assuming rather an idle task if we were to discuss at length the question whether the character of this vault built by the bank did or did not constitute "an alteration, addition, and improvement" in the premises. It is, of course, quite apparent that the term "improvement" is comprehensive enough to embrace all additions or alterations which may be made by a tenant for the convenience of his business upon the premises. It is much more comprehensive than the word "fixture," and, while including these, includes also many things that may not be classed as fixtures. In fact, if force is to be given to a provision in a lease which provides that all "improvements" made in premises shall inure to the lessor, it is difficult to conceive of any subsequent addition, alteration, or repair to the premises during the tenancy which would not be embraced within the term "improvement." That the construction of this vault was intended to and did amount to all of these—an addition, alteration, and improvement—and was embraced within the terms of the lease, we think is evident. Certainly, a room covering a floor space of 20 feet wide by 30 feet long, with walls 8 feet high, made of solid brick 2 feet thick set in cement and mortar, and having a steel beam roof, sheathing inside and out with steel sheeting screwed in place, having a steel door and vestibule and the whole erected and adapted as a safety vault at an expense of over $3,000, is in the nature of things an alteration in the premises on which it is built, and in its solidity, permanency, and utility is certainly an addition and improvement to the premises. It certainly altered the basement of the premises to build it there, and was an addition and improvement in aid of the use of the premises for banking purposes for which they were rented and in aid of which use the building of the vault was contemplated and accomplished. This safety vault was not like an ordinary movable safe or a machine which might be temporarily housed in or which is constructed or fixed together in parts readily separable so as to permit of removal and reassembling at some other place. This vault as constructed had no removable identity. It lost its character as a safety vault as soon as it was taken apart. With the removal of the steel casings and the door the structure remained but brick and mortar, which, as one of the defendants testified, was of no use or value to the lessee, and in its then condition it could not be of particular value to the lessor. That as constructed in the manner and form described in the evidence it did constitute an "alteration, addition, and improvement" which passed to the owner of the leased premises when it was made is sustained by the authorities. French v. Mayor, etc., of the City of New York, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 363; Parker v. Wulstein, 48 N. J. Eq. 94, 21 Atl. 623; Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59; Harris v. Kelly (Pa.) 13 Atl. 523; Wright v. La May, 155 Mich. 119, 118 N. W. 964; In re Rahls Ice Cream & Baking Co. (D. C.) 195 Fed. 986; Levin v. Improved Property Holding Co., 141 App. Div. 106, 125 N. Y. Supp. 963. In the French Case, supra, the court said:

> "The question in this case is not, what are fixtures which a tenant is at liberty to remove on the expiration of his lease, but, what did the lessees covenant with the lessors they would surrender and suffer to remain on the demised premises on the termination of the lease? The covenants of the lease are that on the last day of the term the lessees will surrender the demised premises, 'and all the improvements that may have been placed thereon by the said parties of the second part [the lessees], and which improvements are to belong to said parties of the first part [the lessors], and all of which are to be surrendered up in as good a state and condition as reasonable use and wear thereof will permit, damages by the elements excepted.' * * *
> "The covenant is to surrender all the improvements that may have been placed thereon. Improvements clearly," in the lease here used, "embrace every addition, alteration, erection, or annexation made by the lessees during the demised term, to render the premises more available and profitable, or useful and convenient to them. It is a more comprehensive word than 'fixtures,' and necessarily includes it, and such additions as the law might not regard as fixtures. It would be difficult to select a more comprehensive word; and where the parties say all which may be placed upon the premises shall belong to the lessors, it is difficult to say what, if anything, would be excluded."

While the other authorities cited are to the same effect, attention is specially directed to Parker v. Wulstein, supra, for a more particular discussion of the subject.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

SHAW, J. (dissenting). I dissent. Under the terms of the lease and upon the facts as stated by Justice LORIGAN I am of the opinion that the safe deposit vaults, having been put in the basement solely to facilitate the banking business carried on by the tenant in the leased premises, and not forming any part of the premises leased, should not be deemed to be a part of the premises, or an "improvement" thereto within the meaning of the clause that all "improvements made in and to said premises" should go to the lessor. That clause should be held to refer to improvements to the premises as leased, not to a trade structure in no way affixed, except that it was set upon the floor of the basement. Neither the fact that it was not all removed nor the fact that it was a massive structure alters its character in law.

ROUSE v. MATHEWS.

GUARDIAN AND WARD 🔑10—RIGHT OF PARENT—"COMPETENT"—STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, declaring that the parent of a child under age of 14, if found competent to discharge the duties of guardianship, is entitled in preference to any other person to be appointed guardian, controls Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 1, providing that in appointing a guardian the court is to be guided by what appears to be for the child's best interest in respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare, and if it is of age to form an intelligent preference, the court may consider that preference; so that the parent being "competent," that is, having the mental and moral qualifications, though lacking means, so that she may be compelled to seek state aid in the child's maintenance, must be appointed, irrespective of the child's intelligent preference, unless the parent has by abandonment, or act or omission enumerated in subdivision 4 forfeited right of guardianship.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Application for appointment of a guardian of Gerald Mathews, a minor. From decree denying petition of Warren A. Rouse, and appointing the minor's mother, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Rinehart, of Oakland (Charles M. Shortridge, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant. James L. Nagle and Louis H. Ward, both of San Francisco (P. B. Nagle, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a second appeal in the matter of the guardianship of Gerald Mathews, a minor. The decision on the former appeal will be found reported in 169 Cal. at page 26, 145 Pac. 503. Upon that appeal this court, with the evidence before it, was called upon to review a finding of the trial court that the mother "is an unfit, incompetent, and improper person to have the care, custody, or control of her minor child." The holding was that the evidence so presented did not support this finding. Upon this present appeal there are tendered for our consideration findings in many respects different from the single finding which was under review in the previous appeal. The appellant rests his case upon these new findings, and insists that under them his petition for guardianship should have been granted and that of the mother denied. It becomes necessary then to set forth these findings, and it will be done as succinctly as possible.

Warren A. Rouse, the petitioner, is married, and is and for many years has been living with his wife, Carrie E. Rouse. To them and into their custody was given the minor when he was but 8 months of age. This was in October, 1906. The child is therefore now about 11 years of age. The father is and for many years has been dead. Ever since its reception into the home of the Rouses it has been treated by them in all respects as their child. There was no agreement entered into between the Rouses and the mother of the child at the time the former received it nor thereafter going to either its care or support, to the mother's contribution thereto, or to the duty of the Rouses to restore the child to the mother upon demand. But to the contrary, the mother has neither supported nor maintained the child during all of these years, nor has she provided for its support and maintenance, and she never has been "and is not now able to support and maintain her child." The Rouses have great affection for the child, and are in all respects fit, proper, and competent persons to have its care, custody, and control, and "it is for the best interest of said minor child, with respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare that he remain" in their custody. Upon examination the court finds: That the child is of sufficient age to form an intelligent preference in the matter of his custody, and that his preference is to remain in the care, custody, and control of the Rouses. During the time that they have had the child the mother has made small voluntary contributions toward its support, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $150. The mother "is not the proper person, in the judgment of this court, to have the care, custody, or control of said minor Gerald Mathews, but she is not incompetent, but is competent, to discharge the duties of guardianship." "That while said Annie Mathews, respondent, is not incompetent to discharge the duties of guardianship, yet considering her condition, her surroundings, and ability to care for said minor child, the court finds that the best interests of said minor child in respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare is that said child remain in the custody of the petitioner; and the affections of said minor child and its relationship to the petitioner have become fixed to the extent that said minor child has come to regard the petitioner and said Carrie E. Rouse as his parents, and that said Annie Mathews, the respondent, to that extent is practically a stranger to him."

No controlling law of the case was declared upon the former appeal. All that the court was there called upon to do and did was to review the evidence addressed to the finding of the incompetency of the mother to discharge the duties of guardianship, and the holding of this court, after a review of the evidence, was that the finding was not sustained. Upon the second trial the court made its findings with elaboration, which findings covered numerous probative matters, and together present, as they are designed to present, a survey of the whole situation. Also it is quite apparent that notwithstanding the influence and effect which the findings thus made may have upon the determination of the ultimate question of the competency of the mother, the court felt constrained by virtue of our former decision to find in terms that she was competent, while also finding that she was not the proper person to be appointed guardian.

We are now called upon, in the light of all of these other findings, to determine whether the denial of guardianship letters to the Rouses was made compulsory upon the court (as the court unquestionably deemed that it was made compulsory) by the finding of competency of the parent, coupled with the force of section 1751 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that the father or the mother of a minor child under the age of 14 years, if found by the court "competent to discharge the duties of guardianship," is entitled to be appointed a guardian in preference to any other person. Elsewhere (Civ. Code, § 246) the law declares that the primary consideration by which the court is to be guided in the appointment of a general guardian is "what appears to be for the best interests of the child in respect to its temporal and its mental and its moral welfare; and if the child is of sufficient age to form an intelligent preference, the court may consider that preference in determining the question" (Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 1). If the language just quoted from section 1751 of the Code of Civil Procedure were not upon our books, it would leave as the controlling consideration the language from section 246 of the Civil Code just quoted, and as the findings distinctly and repeatedly declare not only that the best interests of the child demand its continued control under the Rouses, but as the child itself has expressed that preference, as furthermore the court has found that the mother, while competent, is not the proper person, while the Rouses are in all respects not only competent but fit and proper persons, no difficulty would be presented over the determination.

The difficulty arises from the declaration of section 1751 of the Code of Civil Procedure touching the parent's right, which declaration of necessity must be read and construed with the language of section 246 of the Civil Code.

In its last analysis, then, our question is, what is the meaning of the phrase "competent to discharge the duties of guardianship" as that language is employed in section 1751? "Competency" is a word of broad and varied application. Within the legitimate scope of its meaning as employed in the law, it embraces many attributes. Wealth alone does not establish competency any more than poverty alone establishes incompetency. Wealth and mental capacity together do not always establish competency, though, upon the other hand, lack of means and lack of mental capacity would clearly render a petitioner for guardianship letters incompetent. Wealth and ability may be found in a dissolute and even in a criminal life, and no court would award guardianship over a minor to such a dissolute or criminal person, even if he were found to be abundantly possessed of mental ability and financial means. Poverty alone of itself no more establishes incompetency than wealth alone establishes competency. No one would say that the state would or should deprive the natural parent of the custody of its child because dire poverty, which may strike any of us, had stricken that parent. To the contrary, the state, in recognition that poverty shall not be a ground for the severance of the relation of parent and child, has made provision itself to aid in the support of the children of the poor, the parents being expected to contribute only in accordance with their limited means. It is only when a parent has abandoned the child, or has been found disqualified for other reasons than poverty alone, that under our law the parental rights of guardianship are terminated and destroyed. Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 4.

The finding of competency in this case is a full finding of competency in all mental and moral respects. No question is presented of the unfitness of the mother for dissoluteness, immorality, unwillingness to labor, or for any other reason, saving as that competency so found is affected by her poverty. But touching this, as we have said, poverty itself, unless accompanied by an abandonment, or some other disqualification as above suggested, no one of which is here found, is not sufficient to justify the denial by a court of the preferential parental right declared in section 1751. Being competent, the mother is still entitled to the legal custody of this child which she has not abandoned, and to whose support she has contributed as her limited means would permit. Upon taking such custody she may still be compelled to seek state aid in its maintenance. But this is only a part of the cruel lot which too frequently falls on the very poor.

It is argued with great force that the trend of modern decisions is to regard as of primary importance the welfare of the minor himself. This is most true. The decisions to this effect are made either under the permission of the law, which contains no such restriction as that found in our section 1751, or else are given under the command of the law which, in effect, declares that over and above all else the controlling consideration shall be the welfare of the child. If we were thus at liberty to act, it might well be that the custody of this child, under the findings of the court, would be given to the Rouses. This is the injunction declared in our own law by subdivision 1 of section 246 of the Civil Code. But, as we have pointed out, unless the parent has for some reason (and no such reason is here found) forfeited his preferential right to the guardianship of his offspring, all considerations of the welfare of the child must, under our law, be regarded as subordinate to that right.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by W. W. Colquhoun against H. C. Fursman and others. Judgment for defendants, and order denying motion for new trial, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter Slack and Joseph K. Hutchinson, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Clayberg & Whitmore, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action, brought by the plaintiff as assignee of a certain firm, to recover the sum of $750 as the reasonable value of certain goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered by said firm to said defendants as a copartnership and individually, and for which they had refused to pay.

The four defendants who were served with process and appeared herein denied that they were copartners, or that as such or individually they or either of them had purchased any wares or merchandise from plaintiff's assignor; and they also averred affirmatively that plaintiff had already recovered judgment against certain other persons on account of the sale to them of such goods. Upon the issues thus framed the cause went to trial, at the conclusion of which the trial court gave judgment in favor of the defendants. The court also denied the plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, and from such judgment and order the plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] We find no merit in the first contention of the appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings and judgment in defendant's favor. The evidence educed at the trial showed the following state of facts: In the month of October, 1910, one Henry E. Lee caused to be located 175 placer mining claims at Searles Lake in San Bernardino county. In so doing he used the names of the defendants in this action without their knowledge or authority. Subsequently, according to the testimony of said Lee, he procured from these defendants a ratification of his acts in using their names in making said locations, but upon the condition and understanding that none of said defendants should assume or be charged with any personal liability because of such locations, but that said Lee should care for the property, perfect the title, sell or work the said locations, and provide all funds necessary for such purposes without any personal liability on the part of the defendants. Subsequently, when certain assessment work was required to be done upon these locations, said Lee, in co-operation with Thomas W. Pack and T. O. Toland, proceeded to employ men and incur expense in doing such work, and in so doing purchased the goods, wares, and merchandise from the assignor of the plaintiff, for the value of which this suit was brought.

Upon the trial of the action Lee was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and testified circumstantially to the foregoing state of facts. The evidence further disclosed that the assignor of plaintiff had no direct connection or communication with any of these defendants in respect of such transaction; but, on the contrary, showed that the goods were purchased by said Thomas W. Pack and were charged to him on the sellers' books. This evidence, if believed by the trial court, was sufficient to overthrow whatever inference the plaintiff sought to have drawn from the acts and conduct of the defendants in ratifying the action of said Lee and the use of their names in the making of the locations, and also in continuing to recognize said Lee as their agent in the doing of later acts and things in respect to such lands. The utmost that may be said with regard to the testimony in the case and to the inferences to be drawn therefrom is that a substantial conflict exists, which the trial court was justified in resolving in defendants' favor. Its discretion in that regard will not be reviewed upon this appeal.

The appellant criticizes the conclusions of the trial court as based upon an alleged implied finding that Lee was not the agent of the defendants in procuring the assessment work to be done upon these locations in the course of which these goods were bought, and which implied finding the appellant claims to be contrary to the undisputed evidence in the case. But we see no room or need for any implied finding in the premises, since the court expressly finds that the goods in question were never sold and delivered to the defendants herein. For the same reason a finding as to the reasonable value of the goods was unnecessary.

[3] The appellant further contends that the trial court erred in directing the judgment in favor of the defendants upon their affirmative plea that the plaintiff had recovered a prior judgment against said Pack and Lee. But the record does not show that the judgment of the court was based upon this plea as a plea in bar, but only discloses that the court found the fact of such prior judgment in response to the issue as to its existence raised by the pleadings. It was not, however, pleaded as a plea in bar, and was not found or declared to be such by the trial court. It thus appears that the court properly admitted evidence in support of such issue, and that its finding was correct, and that its judgment in the defendants' favor was not predicated upon such finding as a bar to the present action.

[4, 5] As to the other alleged errors of the court upon the admission or rejection of evidence during the trial, we have examined the voluminous record in the case, and are of the opinion that there is no prejudicial error in any of these rulings; that the court did not err in excluding the evidence of Lee, a witness for plaintiff, as to the scope and details of his agency for the defendants some considerable time after the alleged purchases were made; nor in refusing to admit in evidence as a whole the record and papers in certain actions commenced by said Lee on behalf of the defendants long after the transaction in question, and which record and papers the defendants personally never saw, and of which much was irrelevant and immaterial matter; nor in its other rulings not deserving of special mention; nor do we think that the court erred in refusing to grant the continuance sought by the plaintiff in order to allow certain depositions to be taken, no abuse of its discretion in that regard having been shown; nor was the action of the court in signing its findings and judgment after the death of one of the defendants, said judgment being in his favor, an irregularity by which the plaintiff would be injured or of which he would have the right upon this appeal to complain. We are also of the opinion that there is no manifest abuse of the large discretion with which the trial court was invested in the granting or refusing a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence which is cumulative in its character and effect.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by O. P. Gideon against P. A. Howard and another, partners as the Howard Bros. Construction Company. From an order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Miller & Miller and E. B. Drake, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Flint, Gray & Barker, Gray, Barker & Bowen, and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendants as copartners. At the close of the evidence, defendants offering none, the court, at their request, instructed the jury to render a verdict for defendants, which being done, judgment followed in accordance therewith. The appeal is from an order of court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The question presented is one of law as to whether or not there was any substantial evidence as to facts determinative of the case upon which the jury could have properly found for plaintiff.

The evidence tends to establish the following facts: Plaintiff was an employé of defendants, who were contractors engaged in the erection of a bridge, in the construction of which wooden molds or forms were made, into which concrete was deposited, and after it set and hardened these molds or forms were detached therefrom. As such employé, plaintiff, with others, not only worked as a carpenter in making and installing these forms, but in detaching them from the hardened concrete walls by various means, among which was that of attaching thereto ropes provided by defendants and pulling them loose by hand. At the time in question, when plaintiff sustained the injuries of which he complains, two men had thus, for the purpose of removing one of the molds, attached a rope thereto, and, being unsuccessful in breaking it away, called upon plaintiff and another, who were at work on the bridge, to aid them in pulling it away. They responded, and their united strength applied in pulling upon the rope caused it to break, as a result of which plaintiff, with the others, all of whom were at the time on the ground, was precipitated backwards into a depression some 18 inches deep to a point 10 or 12 feet distant, where he fell upon a stump, the others falling upon him, and, in some way undisclosed by the record, was injured. The rope was five-eighths or three-fourths inch in size and about 45 feet in length. Some three or four days prior to the accident, plaintiff, while using this rope on a scaffold some 40 feet from the ground, discovered that it was badly worn, weakened and cut, for which reason he removed it from the swing he was working on, came down and informed Mr. Crump, the superintendent in charge of construction, of its condition, telling him that the rope was "not fit to work on," and threw it upon the ground under an abutment of the bridge, from which place his coemployé, when requiring a rope for use in detaching the mold, secured and used it for the purposes aforesaid, which fact, however, was unknown to plaintiff until after the accident.

[1-3] At the time in question a statute then in force (Stats. 1911, p. 796) provided that in actions by employés to recover for personal injuries based upon want of reasonable care of the employer, contributory negligence of the employé should not bar a recovery where such negligence was slight, and that of the employer, by comparison, gross; nor, as provided by the same statute, did the fact that the employé assumed the risk, or that the injury was due to the negligence of a coemployé, constitute a bar to his recovery. Since, therefore, negligence on the part of the plaintiff or that of a fellow servant is not involved, the sole question presented by the record is whether or not there was any substantial evidence introduced from which the jury might have found that defendants were guilty of negligence in furnishing a defective rope for plaintiff's use in pulling away the concrete mold. Not only did the evidence tend to show that the rope was supplied by defendants, but such fact is admitted by the answer, which denied only that they negligently furnished the same. The proximate cause of the injury was the breaking of the rope used by plaintiff, which use was within the scope of his employment. It was the duty of defendants to exercise reasonable care to provide their employés with safe appliances in the performance of the work required of them, and under the facts here presented the rope was an appliance which the evidence tends to show was, with defendants' knowledge, worn and weakened to an extent that rendered it unsafe for the purpose.

There is no merit in respondents' contention that the stump upon which plaintiff fell, and not the breaking of the rope, was the proximate cause of the injury. It is reasonably certain that but for the breaking of the rope plaintiff would not have fallen backward upon the stump, and his coemployés would not have fallen upon him. But it may be that falling upon the stump contributed nothing toward his injuries; the record is silent upon that point. It might with equal logic be claimed that where a defective cable, used in hoisting one to the top of a building, breaks, precipitating him upon a pile of stone underneath, the pile of stone, and not the breaking of the cable, was the proximate cause of his injury.

It is further claimed that the circumstances were such that the defendants could not reasonably have anticipated an injury resulting from the breaking of the rope. This and the question as to whether or not the injury sustained by plaintiff was due to causes which men in defendants' position could in the exercise of ordinary prudence reasonably have foreseen and guarded against, are matters which, in our opinion, should, upon the record presented, have been submitted to the jury.

The order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is reversed.

PEOPLE v. PRIETZ. (Cr. 656.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 7, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1168(2)—Appeal and Error—Admission of Evidence—Harmless Error.

In prosecution for rape, where the prosecuting witness' story lay near the border line of incredibility, any error in admitting or rejecting material evidence will amount to prejudicial error, particularly where such evidence had a direct bearing upon the main issue and upon the degree of credit to be accorded to the prosecuting witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3124, 3124½, 3129–3136.]

2. Rape 🔑48(1)—Admission of Evidence—Complainant's Statement to Third Persons.

Permitting prosecuting witness, in a prosecution for rape, to testify to statements made by her to a third party as to treatment she had suffered was reversible error, where her story was close to the border line of incredibility, and where the prosecuting attorney had called the jury's attention to such statements in his opening.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 67.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Robert Prietz was convicted of rape, and appeals. Reversed.

A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, and J. Leonard Rose, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon a charge of rape alleged to have been committed upon his daughter at the time of the age of 15 years.

The record is voluminous, and presents a state of facts which it would subserve no worthy or useful purpose to reproduce in their disgusting and sordid details here. The appellant's first contention is that the story of the prosecuting witness as recited upon the trial of the cause is so inherently improbable as to require a reversal of the verdict and judgment of conviction based upon it. While there is much force in this suggestion, and while there was also much in the prosecution of the case as disclosed by the record which does not commend itself to us, we are unable to say from a careful consideration of the entire record that the testimony educed on behalf of the people is on the whole insufficient to support the verdict by reason of its inherent improbability.

[1] While, however, this is our conclusion as to the facts of the case, we are of the opinion that this is one of those cases wherein any error of the trial court in the admission or rejection of material evidence would amount to prejudicial error, particularly where the evidence thus erroneously admitted or excluded had a direct bearing upon the main issue in the case and upon the degree of credit to be accorded to the prosecuting witness therein.

[2] This brings us to the appellant's second contention, which is that the trial court erred in its rulings upon the admission of certain statements made by the prosecuting witness to another of the principal witnesses for the prosecution respecting complaints which the prosecuting witness claimed to have made with regard to her father's treatment of her. While upon the witness stand the prosecuting witness was asked the following question:

> "Q. You stated to Miss Delmar that your father had committed many acts of sexual intercourse upon you, did you not?"

Aside from the leading and improper form of this question, to which the defendant did not urge this specific objection, his other proper objections to it were overruled by the court, and the witness was permitted to answer the question affirmatively. The question and answer thus permitted responded to the proffer of proof made by the prosecuting attorney in his opening statement to the jury, wherein he said, "She finally confessed to Mrs. Margaret Delmar what had been done to her all this time," and would thus be given an added impression and influence upon the jurors' minds. We are unable to distinguish the foregoing question and ruling from the question and ruling which led to the reversal of the case of People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103–107, 72 Pac. 838, wherein the obnoxious question was in the following form:

> "Q. Did she say whether or not this defendant had had sexual intercourse with her?"

The trial court permitted this question to be answered, and the Supreme Court reversed the case upon that sole ground, holding that the testimony elicited was clearly incompetent, and that it must have substantially affected the defendant's case.

In a case lying as close to the border line of incredibility as does the present one we think the error of the trial court in permitting the foregoing question to be answered was prejudicial to a degree which requires a reversal of the case.

Judgment and order reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Lucie E. Ellsworth against the National Home and Town Builders. Judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Flint, Gray & Barker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. S. L. Carpenter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action to recover damages for conversion is based upon defendant's refusal to transfer to plaintiff certain shares of its capital stock, evidenced by a duly indorsed certificate, No. 167, which the latter had acquired from one J. F. Clark, to whom the defendant corporation had theretofore issued the stock. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] As grounds for reversal, appellant claims: (1) That the stock was issued without consideration; (2) that the issuance thereof was unauthorized by the corporation; (3) that at the time when plaintiff demanded the making of the transfer, another party, with defendant's knowledge, held an option from plaintiff's assignor for the purchase of the stock, which fact was also known to plaintiff; (4) that a transfer of the stock would be in violation of a pooling agreement to which appellant was a party, the existence of which was known to plaintiff; and (5) that plaintiff paid no consideration for the stock.

First. There is no merit in the first contention, since the uncontradicted record shows that the stock was issued by the corporation to Clark in consideration of valuable services rendered and labor performed by him for and on behalf of the corporation.

[2] Second. The contention that the issuance of the stock to Clark was illegal is based chiefly upon the fact that defendant was a corporation created under the laws of the state of Arizona; that the by-laws of the company provided that all meetings of stockholders, whether regular or special, should, upon notice as therein prescribed, be held in Phœnix, Ariz., whereas the board of directors which authorized the issuance of the stock to Clark was elected at a special meeting of the stockholders held, without notice given as provided in the by-laws, in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.—all of which facts appear to be true. But it is likewise true that the holders of all of the outstanding stock, in writing consented to the holding of such meeting in the city of Los Angeles, and waived notice thereof, and that at the meeting so convened pursuant to such written consent, all of the stock of said corporation then issued was represented at said meeting and participated in the election of members of the board, each and all of whom received the unanimous vote of all the stock so represented. The board of directors so elected organized by electing officers, and in transacting the business of the corporation, assumed to and did act as the duly constituted board of directors of the company. Appellant insists that, by reason of the stockholders' meeting being held outside of Arizona, contrary to the by-laws of the company, such meeting and all proceedings there had were without right or authority, and hence wholly void. We cannot assent to this contention. It may be conceded that in a proper proceeding the members of the board so elected might have been ousted from office (State v. Cronan, 23 Nev. 437, 49 Pac. 41) but they were nevertheless, so long as they continued to act as the duly constituted board, de facto officers (San Joaquin L. & W. Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 70, 35 Pac. 349; Barrell v. Lake View Land Co., 122 Cal. 129, 54 Pac. 594), the validity of whose acts is not subject to attack in an action of the character of that here involved (San Jose Sav. Bank v. Sierra Lumber Co., 63 Cal. 179; 2 Cook on Corporations [6th Ed.] § 623). Meetings held in violation of charter provisions have been held void. Mr. Cook in his work on Corporations (6th Ed.) § 589, in discussing such authorities, says:

"It is the sounder view to regard the votes and proceedings at such a meeting as voidable rather than void. The corporation itself cannot allege that such proceedings are void. It is estopped from so doing. So, also, are the stockholders who participated in the meeting."

To the same effect see Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 11 Sup. Ct. 530, 35 L. Ed. 227; Heath v. Silverthorn Lead, etc., Co., 39 Wis. 146; Thompson on Corporations, § 814. The stockholders' meeting in question, so far as disclosed by the record, was not in violation of any provision of the charter, but contrary to the by-laws which had been adopted by the stockholders. Neither the corporation nor the stockholders all of whom, as stated, were present and united in the election of this board of directors by unanimous vote of all the outstanding stock, as against plaintiff, who acquired the certificate in usual course, are in any position to assert as void the act of the board in issuing the stock to her vendor.

Third. Appellant offered in evidence a document signed by J. F. Clark, E. E. Ragsdale and one Joseph P. Smith, whereby Clark and Ragsdale agreed that Smith should have an option for a period of 12 months from August 5, 1911, to purchase from said Clark and Ragsdale 200,000 shares of the capital stock of appellant corporation for the sum of $2,000, to the introduction of which plaintiff's objection was sustained. No error is predicated upon this ruling. Waiving such omission, we perceive no error in the ruling for the reasons: First, that the agreement appears to have been made without any consideration therefor; and, second, there is nothing in the agreement showing that it had reference to the stock evidenced by certificate No. 167, issued to Clark long after the making of said agreement. We cannot assume that the 50,000 shares of stock so purchased by plaintiff was in violation of this agreement made by Ragsdale and Clark, or if Smith exercised the option they would not deliver to him the stock as agreed. There was no error in the ruling of the court in excluding from evidence this document.

[3] Fourth. It is next claimed that the stock in question so owned by Clark was subject to a pooling agreement signed by Clark. It is true a document was offered in evidence to which the signature of Clark was attached, providing that the stock and the certificates evidencing the same, owned by the signers thereof, should be deposited with ———, as trustee. Such pooling agreement, however, was never consummated, and the evidence clearly shows that certificate No. 167 was at all times, up to the time when he delivered same to the plaintiff herein, in the control and custody of Clark. There is no evidence of any circumstance that justified or excused the corporation for refusing to transfer the stock on demand of the plaintiff, and hence the cases of Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. 852, 5 L. R. A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep. 145, and Young v. New Standard, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 306, 83 Pac. 28, have no application to the facts here presented.

[4] Fifth. It must follow from what has been here said that whether or not plaintiff paid any consideration for the stock was no concern of appellant, and hence it was not error for the court to exclude any evidence as to the consideration paid therefor.

REDMOND v. McLEAN et al. (Civ. 2207.)

1. Quieting Title 🔑44(3) — Evidence — Prima Facie Case.

In an action to quiet title, evidence, consisting of plaintiff's testimony that at the commencement of the action he was and for a long time prior thereto had been in possession of the lot described in the complaint as delineated upon a map under and by virtue of a deed referred to conveying the lot described in the complaint to him, was sufficient as a prima facie showing to establish plaintiff's right as against defendant to a decree quieting his title to the lot so described.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 91.]

2. Quieting Title 🔑44(5) — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held to justify a finding that plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of the trial in possession of the lot described in the complaint, and was the owner thereof and entitled to a decree quieting his title thereto.

3. Quieting Title 🔑47(2)—Findings—Conformity to Issues.

As no issue as to the location of the boundary lines and dimensions of the lot was tendered by the complaint, and there was nothing in the answer enlarging the scope of the complaint, a finding of the court which purports to locate the lot upon the ground and fix the dimensions thereof should be disregarded as a finding of fact not in issue or presented by the pleadings, and, being so disregarded, that part of the decree based upon such finding should be stricken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action to quiet title by John E. Redmond against Mrs. Della McLean and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the named defendant appeals. Judgment modified, as modified affirmed, and order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Edward Dietrich, Dietrich & Kidder, and Smith, Miller & Phelps, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title, the complaint being in the usual form and alleging that plaintiff was the owner and in possession of lot 31, block 2, of the Golden Bay tract, as per map recorded in book 2, page 15, of maps, Los Angeles county, Cal.; that defendant, without right, claimed an estate or interest therein adverse to plaintiff. Defendant Della McLean, the appellant, answered, denying that the plaintiff was the owner or in possession of the lot described in the complaint; and, as a further defense, asserted that she was the owner in fee simple of the easterly 4 feet of said lot 31, but asked no affirmative relief. At the trial, judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant McLean appeals.

[1, 2] The sole question at issue upon the pleadings was whether plaintiff was at the time of commencing the action the owner and in possession of all or any part of the lot described in his complaint as lot 31, block 2, as delineated upon the map referred to. At the trial plaintiff, in support of his claim, testified that at the commencement of the action he was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, in possession of said lot 31, as delineated upon said map, under and by virtue of a deed whereby the grantors therein, describing the lot as in the complaint, conveyed the same to him. This evidence, uncontradicted, was sufficient as a prima facie showing to establish plaintiff's right as against defendant to a decree quieting his title to the lot so described. Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 Pac. 294; De Noon v. Morrison, 83 Cal. 163, 23 Pac. 374. In opposition to the case so made by plaintiff, defendant conceded that plaintiff, under the deed, was in possession of all of said lot, except a strip of 4 feet on the easterly side thereof, which defendant claimed to be in possession of by virtue of an agreement fixing the boundary line between the lots. Aside from any conflict in the testimony touching the question of possession, the evidence offered by defendant was wholly insufficient to establish any agreement fixing the boundary line. While both parties had caused surveys to be made and the surveyors had agreed upon a line, there is no evidence that plaintiff ever acquiesced in the line so established by these surveyors. There is some meager evidence as to a fence, erected by somebody undisclosed by the record; but it is not made to appear that the fence was erected in accordance with any agreement between plaintiff and defendant, nor is it shown at what time the fence was erected; indeed, from aught that appears to the contrary, it may have been erected the day before the trial. Upon the state of the record here presented, the court was fully justified in finding that plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of the trial in possession of the lot described in the complaint, and was the owner thereof and entitled to a decree quieting his title thereto.

[3] Had the court contented itself with such finding and decreed in accordance therewith, no just cause for complaint would have existed. As stated, the action was one to quiet title. Notwithstanding this fact, the court, over objections of defendant that such question was not in issue, permitted evidence to be introduced under which it not only quieted plaintiff's title, but fixed the location of the boundary lines, and dimension of the lot. No issue was tendered by the complaint under which, had defendant suffered default or filed a disclaimer, the court would be justified in making a decree establishing the size and boundary lines of the lot; nor is there anything in the answer that enlarged the scope of the complaint. Nevertheless, by its judgment, the court found and decreed that said lot so described in the complaint as lot 31, block 2, of the Golden Bay tract, as delineated upon the map therein referred to, was located at a point—

> "beginning at a point 460 feet east from the center line of an alley known as the Speedway on the southerly line of Ozone street, continuing thence along said southerly line of Ozone street a distance of 30 feet east, continuing thence in a southerly direction to a point distant 490 feet from the center of said Speedway along the northerly line of an alley between Ozone and Rose streets, and continuing along said northerly line in a westerly direction a distance of 30 feet to a point distant 460 feet from the center line of aforesaid Speedway along the northerly line of said alley, thence in a northerly direction to a point in the southerly line of Ozone street 460 feet from the center line of Speedway, being the point and beginning."

Not only was the question of the dimensions and location of the lot not involved, but we are unable to find any evidence in the confused and jumbled record presented which sustains the finding of the court as to the location of the boundary lines of the lot.

That part of the finding which purports to locate the lot upon the ground and fix the dimensions thereof should be disregarded as a finding of fact not in issue or presented by the pleadings. Thus disregarded, that part of the decree herein quoted and following the language of said finding is without support, and hence should be stricken from the decree.

The judgment is therefore modified by striking therefrom that portion commencing with the words, "beginning at a point 460 feet," and ending with the words, "being the point of beginning." As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed, and hence no reason exists for granting appellant's motion for a new trial, and the order denying said motion is likewise affirmed; appellant to recover her costs on this appeal.

EGAN v. DODD. (Civ. 1872.)

1. Landlord and Tenant ⟹152(4) — Repairs—Lessee's Duty.

A lease providing that the lessee will not call upon the lessor for repairs and will surrender premises in good order less reasonable use casts upon the lessee the burden of making repairs necessary to make the building safe.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314, 315.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by J. H. Egan against Fred Dodd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. Cosgrave, of Fresno, for appellant. Short & Sutherland, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The plaintiff commenced this suit to recover from the defendant a balance alleged to be due for laundry work. The defendant answered, and also set up a counterclaim, in which he alleged that the plaintiff was indebted to him for the rent of premises situate in the city of Fresno, and held by plaintiff under two leases from the defendant. The judgment of the court was in favor of the plaintiff and that the defendant take nothing by his counterclaim. Defendant appeals.

The question presented for determination is as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled under the circumstances of the case to abandon the premises held under said leases, and thereby terminate them, and calls for a construction of the provisions of the leases relating to the obligation to keep the premises in repair.

Concerning the lessee's obligation to repair, the lease of what is called the main building provides:

> "The lessee also agrees that the lessor shall not be called upon to make any repairs or improvements whatever in said leased premises during the term of this lease, or any renewal thereof, and that he will at all times and at his own cost and expense keep said premises in good order, repair and condition, provided, however, that the lessor agrees to install" (here follows an enumeration of certain improvements agreed to be made by the lessor, and a provision imposing on the lessor the repair of the roof of the building, but which are not involved in the present controversy).

The other lease, covering a portion of the second floor of the building, contains the following covenant on the part of the lessee:

> "That he will not call upon the lessor for any repairs, alterations, or maintenance during said term."

Both leases contain the additional covenant on the part of the lessee to the effect that:

> "He will surrender and yield up possession to the lessor all in good order and repair as the same is received by him, reasonable use and wear thereof and damages by the elements alone excepted."

It appears that in December, 1913, two years before the plaintiff vacated the premises, the city engineer of the city of Fresno served a notice upon the defendant as owner of the leased premises, declaring the building to be dangerous in certain specified particulars, and requiring its demolition within 60 days thereafter. Following the receipt of this notice defendant, under the provisions of the city building ordinance, demanded an arbitration to determine whether or not the building could be repaired and rendered safe under the ordinance. The matter was submitted to arbitration in the manner provided in the ordinance; and in their report made to the city engineer the arbitrators agreed "that there is no necessity whatever for taking down any portion of the building," but reported that certain repairs were necessary and should be made. Upon receipt of a copy of the arbitrators' report defendant at once wrote plaintiff advising him of the requirements of the arbitrators as to repairing the building, and, referring to the covenants of the lease regarding the lessee's obligation to repair, notified him to make at once the repairs required. Those repairs were not made. Subsequently, and during the life of the lease, a portion of one of the walls of the building collapsed owing to an excavation made into the adjoining land in the course of building operations thereon; whereupon and almost immediately the defendant, although insisting that he was under no obligation to do so, commenced to repair the wall, saying that he felt under all of the circumstances of the case that perhaps it would be asking too much of the tenant to make this particular repair. Nevertheless the plaintiff, without notice to the defendant, abandoned the premises, and moved into a building which he had recently caused to be erected.

[1] The covenants to repair above set out bound the tenant, we think, under the general rule adopted in this state, to make the repairs, and he was not entitled because of the condition of the building to vacate the premises. The effect of such covenants is thus stated by Tiffany, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, at section 116 (d):

> "An express covenant by the tenant to repair or keep in repair binds him to repair, although the injury were accidental and in no way caused by his negligence. The express covenant to repair binds the covenanter to make good any injury which human power can remedy, even if caused by storm, flood, fire, inevitable accident, or act of a stranger. * * * There are dicta and perhaps one decision to the effect that the tenant is not bound to rebuild in case of such destruction by the act of God or of destruction by the public enemy. Such a view can be supported only on the theory that the covenant to repair, in view of the circumstances under which it was made, is not in the particular case to be construed as extending to injuries so caused, and the authorities show that such a limited construction is not ordinarily placed upon the covenant. The tenant is liable, under the covenant to repair, in case the premises are injured by third persons, or even if the premises fall on account of defects existing therein at the time of the lease."

To the same effect is Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (9th Ed.) § 364.

Our own Supreme Court, stating the effect of a general covenant to repair in the case of Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 422, 95 Am. Dec. 115, used the following language:

> "If the tenant desires to relieve himself from [damages] resulting from any of the causes above enumerated, or from any other cause whatever, he must take care to except them from the operation of his covenant."

In a Texas case in many respects like the one at bar the lease contained the following covenant:

> "It is expressly agreed and understood that the said Martinez [the tenant] shall himself bear all the expenses of repairing or improving the premises hereby leased him during his occupancy of same."

There also the only exception to the lessee's obligation was a covenant on the part of the lessor to make needed repairs to the roof. The building had been condemned by the municipal authorities of Dallas and ordered demolished. Subsequently a resolution was passed by the city council ordering the building to be repaired under the direction of the city engineer. The tenant refused to make the repairs, and they were made at the expense of the landlord, who brought suit to recover the amount expended by him. The court, holding that the landlord was entitled to recover the cost of the repairs, used the following language:

> "The contract shows that defendant obligated himself to bear all expenses of repairing or improving the property during his occupancy. * * * This would obligate him to bear the expenses of everything falling within the meaning of repairs or improvements necessary during the term, except as by the other provisions of the contract he may have been released from such liability. * * * The work which Thompson caused to be done was for the purpose of restoring the house to a sound state or a safe condition, and this was the repairing, the expense of which the defendant promised to pay." Martinez v. Thompson, 80 Tex. 568, 16 S. W. 334.

To the same effect is Markham v. David Stevenson, etc., Co., 104 App. Div. 420, 93 N. Y. Supp. 684.

In the case in New York the obligation of the tenant was held to extend even to the repair of dilapidations caused by defects in the construction of the building. In that case the lessee covenanted "to make such improvements as he might require, also make all necessary repairs and to keep the same in tenantable order at his own cost." There, as here, the lessee abandoned the premises, claiming that the same had become untenantable because of the settling of the rear wall owing to the original defective construction of the foundation. The court, sustaining the right of the landlord to recover the money expended by him in making certain repairs, held that:

> "As the covenant was absolute to make all necessary repairs and keep the premises in tenantable order, and no fraud on the part of the landlord having been shown, defendant was bound to make the repairs irrespective of the cause of the defect, and defendant having abandoned the premises without making the repairs the landlord had a right to make them and recover the expenses." Lockrow v. Horgan, 58 N. Y. 635.

[2] Section 1932 of the Civil Code has no application to the facts of this case. That section provides:

> "The hirer of a thing may terminate the hiring before the end of the term agreed upon * * * when the greater part of the thing hired, or that part which was and which the latter had at the time of the hiring reason to believe was the material inducement to the hirer to enter into the contract, perishes from any other cause than the want of ordinary care of the hirer."

That section is not applicable to a case where the lease itself expressly provides who shall make the repairs; and even if it could be held that this section does apply, the evidence wholly fails to show that the greater part of the thing hired, or that part which was the material inducement to the hirer, was destroyed. We think, therefore, that from no aspect of the case was the tenant relieved from the obligation to pay the agreed rent.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. GILBRETH. (Cr. 527.)

CRIMINAL LAW ⟹913(1)—TIME FOR ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—RIGHT TO NEW TRIAL—STATUTE.

As the provisions of Pen. Code, § 1191, providing that after a verdict of guilty the court must appoint a time for judgment not more than 2 nor less than 5 days after verdict, and that the court may extend the time not more than 20 days, where the question of probation is concerned, are mandatory, in view of section 1202, requiring judgment to be pronounced on day appointed or to which it is continued under section 1191, and if not rendered within the time fixed the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial, in a prosecution for embezzlement where, after verdict of guilty, plaintiff made oral application for release on probation, and the time for hearing this application and for pronouncing judgment was extended several times, until the court finally denied the application for probation, and entered judgment 33 days after the date of conviction, defendant was entitled to a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

George W. Gilbreth was convicted of embezzlement, and his motion for a new trial denied, and he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

A. A. Sturges and Waldo, Root & Dysert, all of Los Angeles (G. E. Waldo, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. The defendant, by verdict of the jury returned on the 14th day of September, 1916, was found guilty of the crime of embezzlement, a felony. He made oral application for release on probation, and the court, without request or consent of the defendant, fixed the time for hearing of this application and for pronouncing judgment at September 28, 1916. On September 28th, at the request of defendant, time was extended to October 5th. Another extension was made from October 5th to October 10th, at the request of defendant. On October 10th, however, without the request of defendant, time was extended to October 17th, which was 33 days after the date of conviction. The court at the latter time denied the application for probation, and the defendant then made his motion for a new trial, the principal ground being that, under the provisions of sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code, the court had no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment. Sentence being pronounced, this appeal was taken from the judgment and from the order denying the application for a new trial.

The requirement of the provisions of section 1191 of the Penal Code, which limit the time for the pronouncing of judgment after conviction, has been before this court and the District Court of Appeal for the First District heretofore. These provisions have been construed to be mandatory in effect and designed to produce speedy determination of criminal proceedings in the trial court. We refer to the cases of People v. Winner, 160 Pac. 689, and People v. Boling, 161 Pac. 1169. The views of this court as declared in the decision first mentioned are in harmony with those which find place in the opinion in the Boling Case, which was decided in the First District. In the Boling Case there was a petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court, which petition was denied, thereby giving the adjudication final approval. On the authority of the cases cited, defendant, the appellant here, is entitled to a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

ABALAS v. CONSOLIDATED CONST. CO.

(Civ. 2222.)

1. Damages 🔑153—Servant's Injury—Complaint—Allegation of Damage.

Complaint, alleging in general terms injuries suffered by employé while digging a trench for the laying of sewer pipe, concluding with the prayer for a specific amount of damages, was not insufficient for failing to allege in the body of the complaint the specific damage suffered.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑930(2)—Presumption that Jury Followed Instructions.

Where court instructed jury in action for servant's injury that expenses of care and nursing "are subjects of direct proof and are to be determined * * * on the evidence," it will be assumed that the jury followed such instructions, and included no sum for any matter not proved.

3. Damages 🔑160—Servant's Injury—Pleading and Proof—Recovery for Care.

Complaint alleging that plaintiff "expended much for medicines and treatment and employment of physicians," in the absence of demurrer, was sufficient to justify proof of exact amount expended for care and nursing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by M. P. Abalas against the Consolidated Construction Company. Defendant appeals from judgment for plaintiff, and from order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, E. T. Sherer, and Emmet H. Wilson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sam B. Dannis and Walter J. Horgan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying to defendant a new trial.

[1] The plaintiff suffered personal injuries while at work for the defendant in digging a trench for the laying of sewer pipe. He alleged in his complaint that he was employed by the defendant and earning $2.25 per day as a common laborer at the time he suffered his injuries, and that he was at work in the performance of his duty at the bottom of the trench, which was about 55 feet deep, when defendant's foreman negligently caused brick to be placed near the opening and immediately above where the plaintiff was at work; that one of the brick being dislodged fell and struck the plaintiff on the head. This allegation followed:

> "That by reason of the negligence and carelessness of defendant as hereinbefore set out plaintiff was hurt in his health, strength and activity, and received a profound shock to his nervous system, and received a fracture of the skull, and plaintiff is informed and believes and upon such information and belief states that the injury to his head is permanent, and that he will never regain his former health, strength, and activity, and that plaintiff has lost much time and expended much for medicines and treatment and employment of physicians."

The prayer attached to the complaint asked for judgment in the sum of $20,000. The judgment as entered upon the verdict of the jury was for the sum of $2,000. No demurrer was made to the complaint. But two points are presented as ground for the contention that the judgment and order should be reversed, to wit: (1) That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That the court erred in instructing the jury on the matter of the amount of damages which might be assessed. It is contended that as the specific amount of damages suffered is not alleged in the body of the complaint, no cause of action was stated which would entitle plaintiff to any recovery. As already noted, the complaint did contain an allegation describing in general terms the injuries suffered (and there was no special demurrer interposed), and the complaint concluded with a prayer for a specific amount of damages. It has been held that a plaintiff in such a case need not allege particularly the amount of damage he has suffered, and that a complaint which contains a statement of such amount in the prayer only sufficiently states a cause of action. Riser v. Walton, 78 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 362; Tucker v. Cooper, 158 Pac. 181.

[2, 3] The court instructed the jury as to the measure of damages, and stated that the elements entering into damage were, first, "such sum as will compensate him for the expenses he has paid or incurred in caring for and nursing him during the period that he was disabled by the injury, not exceeding the amount alleged in the complaint." After enumerating other elements, such as the value of time and impaired power to earn money in the future and for pain suffered, the court advised the jury as follows:

"The first two of these elements are the subjects of direct proof, and are to be determined by the jury on the evidence they have before them."

It is the contention of appellant that it was neither pleaded nor proved that there had been any expense paid or incurred for care and nursing. We must assume that the jury included in their computation no sum for any matter which had not been proved before them; the court expressly told them that the first two elements defined were the subjects of proof and to be determined upon the evidence before the jury. Had the defendant demurred specially to the complaint, plaintiff would have been required to particularize the amount expended for nursing; but in the absence of such a demurrer and under the authorities which are cited above, the complaint undoubtedly was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to introduce evidence to prove the amount expended or incurred on the several accounts. However, assuming that there was no evidence sufficient to authorize any allowance on account of nursing or medical charges, still, as has been stated, it must be assumed that the jury gave heed to the instruction of the court and included no allowance on any account not fully established by the evidence.

No other errors are pointed to as supporting the case for appellant.

LYNCH v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Civ. 2211.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑137(4)—INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYÉ—NEGLIGENCE.

Defendant electric railway company's failure to furnish sufficient power to move a train, causing a car to back onto an employé, does not establish negligence, especially where employés knew the condition of the power supply.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑973—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—WITHDRAWING CASE FROM JURY.

An order, directing a verdict for defendant after the entire case has been presented, will not be reversed, unless the court abused its discretion.

3. NEGLIGENCE 🔑136(31)—INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYÉ—DIRECTED VERDICT.

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in directing a verdict for defendant electric railway company, where an employé stepped between two cars of a train for some unknown reason and shortage of electricity caused one portion to back against him, although St. 1911, p. 796, allowed recovery where employé's negligence was slight and employer's gross.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Lynch, administratrix of William Edward Lynch, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, William Edward Lynch, prosecutes this action against the defendant to recover damages on account of the death of her husband, which she alleged was caused by negligence of the defendant employer of said Lynch. The charge is that, on the 29th day of April, 1913, "while the defendant was attempting to draw a gravel train of cars over its tracks on a steep upgrade, near Redondo Beach, Cal., the defendant negligently failed to furnish sufficient electricity, the motive power thereof, to pull said train, * * * so that while the said William Edward Lynch was in the act of passing between two cars of said train, the front part of said train slipped back against him and caught him between said two cars, crushing him so that he immediately died therefrom." The complaint also alleged negligent failure of the motorman to put on brakes as a proximate cause of the accident. After the evidence had been received as offered by the respective parties, the court, on motion of the defendant, instructed the jury to find for the defendant. This the jury did, and judgment was rendered accordingly. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

At the commencement of the trial, counsel for plaintiff abandoned his claim of negligence on the part of the motorman, and admitted that at the time in question the motorman did throw on the power as quickly as he could, but that before he could put on the power the car slipped back and caught Mr. Lynch between the two cars, whereby he was killed. The case was tried upon the charge that the defendant negligently failed to furnish power to make it sufficiently safe for him to work. The circumstances were as follows: The defendant was operating a line of electric cars from Los Angeles to and through Redondo and to a place called Clifton, a short distance south of Redondo. Its passenger cars did not run beyond Clifton. At a point a half mile or more beyond Clifton defendant had a gravel pit to which it had extended a track on which a motor and cars were operated for the transportation of gravel. This track ran on an upgrade from the gravel pit toward Clifton. Power was obtained through a trolley wire running over the track down to the gravel pit, which trolley wire was continuous with the wire used by the passenger cars running to Clifton, and carried the same supply of power. The result was that sometimes, when cars were actually running on what was called the Clifton section, their consumption of power reduced the supply of power available for the gravel cars, and there was not always sufficient power to bring the gravel cars upgrade. A cluster of electric lights on the motor car of the gravel train was utilized by the operatives of the gravel train to show them whether at any given time there was or was not power available for their purposes. On the day of the accident Lynch was the foreman in charge of the gravel train, and had under his direction the motorman and two other employés. The cars were started upgrade toward Clifton in the form of a train the parts of which were in the following order: The motorcar was at the north end (toward Clifton); car No. 1 was attached to the motorcar, and car No. 2 was attached to car No. 1, and the train was being pulled upgrade toward Clifton. After they started from the gravel pit the train was stopped two or three times on account of lack of power. When it arrived at a point 100 feet, more or less, from the top of the grade, the train stopped again and Lynch decided that it would be better to detach car No. 2, deliver car No. 1 on a siding at the top of the grade, and go back later for car No. 2. Lynch, while standing on top of car No. 2, set the hand brake and then climbed down and disconnected the air brake between cars Nos. 1 and 2. Next he gave a signal, in response to which the motorman slackened the pull on car No. 2 so that a coupling pin could be drawn. This was accomplished by Lynch by pulling a lever at the side of car No. 2. This he was able to do, and did do, without going between the cars. The signal was received by a man who stood by the side of the motorman and who transmitted the signal to the motorman, the latter not being in position where he could see Lynch's signals. Lynch then signaled for the motorcar and car No. 1 to move ahead, and this was done, car No. 2 remaining stationary on the track. When the two cars had moved about three feet the power went off, and the motorcar with its attached car No. 1 started back toward car No. 2. In the meantime, for some reason or impulse not explained, Lynch had moved into the space between the rails, immediately in front of car No. 2 and between the coupling apparatus of that car and car No. 1, and as the cars came together he was crushed between them. Hearing Lynch's cry of distress, the man opposite the motorman called to the motorman, who as quickly as possible sent his cars forward, the electric power having at that moment returned to the line. Lynch was thereby released, but he had received fatal injuries. There is no direct evidence showing why the power under which the train was moving was lost during the brief interval in which this accident occurred. It does appear, however, that the supply of power available for the use of the gravel train varied on account of the movements of the passenger cars; that the men of the gravel train were in the habit of timing their work according to their knowledge of the arriving and leaving time of the passenger cars on the Clifton section; and that as to whether they had electricity off or on, they judged by the lights on the motor car.

[1] The defendant by its answer denied that it had negligently failed to furnish sufficient electricity to pull the train. This was an admission that the amount of power was not entirely sufficient; the admission being coupled with the denial that such failure was negligent. The evidence showed that this insufficiency was known to Lynch who, for that reason, had caused car No. 2 to be detached. Under all of these circumstances it cannot be that defendant was guilty of negligence causing the injury and death of Lynch, unless it can be maintained that it was the defendant's duty to furnish a supply of power at all times sufficient to move the train, and that it owed this duty to its employés, notwithstanding that they had full information concerning the actual condition of the power supply. This would be a more extreme rule than is necessary to meet the requirement that the employer shall use reasonable care to provide its employés with safe appliances with which to do their work. We have not been referred to any decisions enforcing such extreme rule.

[2, 3] At the time of the accident to William Edward Lynch there was in force an act, approved April 8, 1911, commonly known as the Roseberry Act. Under section 1 thereof it was provided that in any action to recover damages for death resulting from personal injury sustained within this state by an employé while engaged in the line of his duty or the course of his employment as such, in which recovery is sought upon the ground of want of ordinary or reasonable care of the employer, "the fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé." Stats. 1911, p. 796. In addition to its denial of any negligence on its part, the defendant pleaded contributory negligence of the deceased. Appellant contends that by reason of the above-mentioned statute this defense was not available to the respondent, and that it was solely for the jury to determine the amount or degree of negligence of the employer and employé, or of both, so that the terms of the statute might be applied to the facts thus found. Upon the facts of this case, which we have stated very fully, it probably was very difficult for the trial judge to avoid the conclusion that the gross negligence, comparatively speaking, shown by the evidence, was that of the deceased, rather than of the defendant. For reasons which we are about to state, the judge was authorized to take these facts into consideration in determining how he would instruct the jury, or what he would direct the jury to do.

It is true that, as claimed by appellant, usually in actions of this kind the question of negligence of the defendant should be determined by the jury, and that the court may not grant a nonsuit on the evidence introduced by the plaintiff if that evidence tends to establish the fact of negligence. But the court here directed a verdict for the defendant after the entire case had been presented. This being so, the situation is very much the same as where the jury has returned a verdict and the judge has set aside that verdict as not sustained by the evidence. If the trial court has not abused its discretion in making such order, the order will not be reversed. So here, under like circumstances, the court's order directing a verdict for the defendant should be sustained. The condition of the evidence was such that the judge determined that he would not be justified in allowing the verdict to stand if it deprived the defendant of the defense of contributory negligence to which it seemed well entitled in this case, or he determined that there was not sufficient proof of negligence on the part of defendant. In acting upon this determination his discretion was properly exercised, upon either or both of the grounds above stated. "To withhold a case from the jury is no greater interference than to set aside their verdict." Bohn v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 5 Cal. App. 622, 91 Pac. 115, and cases there cited.

PEOPLE v. FODERA. (Cr. 663.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 14, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 16, 1917; Denied by Supreme Court April 13, 1917.)

1. HIGHWAYS 🔑186—COLLISION—FAILURE TO STOP AND ASSIST—PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence on prosecution under Pen. Code, § 367c, of driver of automobile for not stopping and rendering assistance to occupants of vehicle collided with by him, held sufficient to justify conviction as against contention of defendant that he did not, at the time, know of the collision.

2. WITNESSES 🔑274(2)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Asking witnesses who had testified to the reputation for kindness and gentleness of defendant, as bearing on the likelihood that his failure to stop and assist occupants of a motorcycle, struck by his auto, was with knowledge of the accident, whether they had heard that he had been arrested for picking chickens alive, and at another place had run down a boy or man, and had been arrested for unlawfully killing an elk, had a direct bearing on the issue, and in the absence of a showing of bad faith, was within the proper bounds of cross-examination.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1036(2), 1170½(5)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Prejudicial error cannot be predicated on the making and permitting inquiry of character witnesses for defendant, charged with not stopping to assist occupants of a vehicle with which his auto had collided, as to whether they knew of his arrests and pleas of guilty and fines for unlawful speeding on other occasions; in most cases no objection or assignment of misconduct being made to the questions; most of the witnesses stating that they had never heard thereof; no request for admonition or instruction to disregard the evidence being made; and the good faith of the district attorney in making the inquiries at the time not being questioned.

4. Criminal Law 🔑1144(16)—Appeal—Presumption—Heeding Admonition.

It will be presumed that the jury heeded the admonition that offers of testimony which the court refused to admit, and answers stricken out and insinuations against a party in questions, are not evidence, and should be disregarded.

5. Criminal Law 🔑1037(2) — Appeal — Waiver of Error.

Prejudicial misconduct cannot be predicated on the asking by the district attorney whether witness ever heard that on the day of the matter in issue, a violation of the law of the highway, defendant was visiting a person who had been arrested as a member of the Black Hand Society; the defendant allowing the question, and the answer in the negative made before he could object, to stand, and making no request for admonition or instruction to disregard the same, though the court, on objection by him, stated that if he wished it would be stricken out.

6. Highways 🔑186 — Collision — Failure to Stop and Assist—Knowledge as Element.

Aside from Pen. Code, § 20, providing that in every crime there must be a union of act and intent, it is necessarily to be implied from section 367c, declaring the duty of the driver of a vehicle colliding with another to stop and assist the occupants of the vehicle collided with, and making violation thereof an offense, that knowledge by the driver of the collision is essential to the offense.

7. Witnesses 🔑293—Privilege—Testimony Against Himself—Statutes.

Pen. Code, § 367c, requiring the driver of an auto colliding with any vehicle to stop and give aid, and to give information as to the number of his machine and his name and address, and making violation of any provision thereof an offense, does not compel him to give evidence against himself, in violation of Const. art. 1, § 13.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Antone Fodera was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 367, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Foley, and Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Arthur M. Free, Dist. Atty., and Archer Bowden, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Jose, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon the charge of a violation of section 367c of the Penal Code, requiring drivers of automobiles colliding with other vehicles to stop and render assistance to the occupants of the vehicle collided with and who may have been injured by such collision, under penalties which render the act or neglect of such drivers in failing or refusing to comply with such requirements a felony.

[1] The facts of this case immediately preceding, attending, and succeeding the collision are substantially these: On the evening of October 31, 1915, a little after sunset the defendant was proceeding northward along the state highway near the town of Mayfield, in the county of Santa Clara, on his way home to San Francisco from Coyote, in that county, to which place he had made the trip earlier in the day. There were four companions with the defendant in the car which he was driving at a rate estimated as exceeding 40 miles an hour. A closed limousine, in which two ladies—Mrs. Carolan and Miss Shute—were being driven by a chauffeur, was also proceeding northward along the highway at that point at about 25 miles an hour. The defendant undertook to pass the limousine, swerving to the left in order to do so. At the moment of passing, a tandem motorcycle, driven by one Hector Zapata with one Joseph Ottens as his companion, two young students of the University of Santa Clara, was going southward at the rate of 18 to 20 miles an hour, and was also about to pass said limousine, when a collision occurred between the defendant's machine and said motorcycle, in which Zapata was instantly killed and Ottens severely injured. The defendant did not stop or check his speed, but rather increased it until he was overtaken at Mayfield by the Carolan car, when the chauffeur called to the defendant to stop. There is also some evidence that the chauffeur, who spoke English imperfectly, made some remark to the defendant to the effect that he had killed somebody. The defendant stopped momentarily, but did not return to the scene of the collision, but continued rapidly on his way to San Francisco until he was finally halted by the officers at Burlingame. He insisted at all times that he did not know of the collision at the time of its occurrence, and in this he was supported by the testimony of the four other persons who were occupants of the car. The evidence educed at the trial disclosed, however, that the impact of the collision was distinctly heard by the two ladies who were within the closed limousine, and also by a Mr. Van Gordon, who was sitting upon the porch of his residence 100 yards away from the scene of the collision. It also appeared that the body of Zapata had been carried along by the defendant's car for a distance of from 45 to 60 feet before falling from it to the roadside; while from the exhibits produced at the trial and exhibited to this court upon the oral argument of this appeal, consisting of photographs of the defendant's car, and also of articles of clothing worn by one of the occupants thereof sitting on the side nearest to the point of contact, it appeared that the fenders and tool box of the defendant's car had been bent and indented by the impact, while the sides of the machine and the coat of its said occupant were bespattered with the blood and brains of Zapata.

It would thus appear that the evidence before the jury was abundantly ample to justify the defendant's conviction. Notwithstanding this fact the appellant insistently contends that the judgment of conviction herein should be reversed on account of certain alleged acts of prejudicial misconduct on the part of the district attorney occurring during the trial and the argument of the case and claimed to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The specific acts of alleged misconduct relied upon for a reversal, substantially stated, are these:

[2] During the trial of the cause and prior to the time when the defendant himself had taken the stand as a witness in his own behalf his counsel proffered proof that his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was good. The trial court, upon objection made, limited the evidence offered in this regard to proof of the general reputation of the defendant for kindness and gentleness, as being the particular qualities involved in the particular inquiry. The defendant apparently accepted this limitation; and proceeding upon the theory that it would be unlikely that a person of gentle and kindly nature would disregard the promptings of humanity as well as the commands of the law requiring him to stop and render aid to those who might be injured by a collision if he was aware of the fact or likelihood of such injury, the defendant called several witnesses, who testified that the general reputation of the defendant for kindness and gentleness was good. Of the witness George Filmer the district attorney asked upon cross-examination whether he had ever heard it discussed that the defendant, with several other poultry men of San Francisco, had been arrested for picking chickens alive. The same question was asked of each of the other witnesses to the defendant's general reputation for kindness and gentleness. A number of these replied to the question that they had never heard the matter discussed, while others stated that they had heard of it, but had investigated it and found that the rumor had no foundation in fact. The district attorney also asked of most, if not all, of said witnesses if they had not heard that the defendant had run down a boy or a man upon the streets of San Francisco and been arrested, for it, to which most of them replied that they had never heard of it. Of some of said witnesses the district attorney also inquired if they had not heard of the defendant's arrest for unlawfully killing an elk. To this line of questions in most instances no objection or assignment of misconduct was made at the time, nor was the good faith of the district attorney in asking these questions assailed at the trial; and it seems very clear that the questions themselves had a direct bearing upon the issue as to the particular qualities of the defendant to which these several witnesses were called to testify, and that, in the absence of a showing of bad faith on the part of the prosecuting officer, they were within the proper bounds of his cross-examination.

[3] The district attorney also asked of a number of said witnesses whether they had heard that the defendant had on several occasions been arrested for speeding his automobile beyond the legal limit, and in some instances had pleaded guilty and paid fines therefor. In most cases this question was asked and answered negatively without objection or assignment of misconduct. It may be seriously questioned whether a person habituated to reckless driving of an automobile to the extent of being in a number of cases and in several counties arrested therefor is of that kindly and humane disposition which the character witnesses of the defendant herein would have had the jury believe him to be; but however this may be it appears, as above stated, that in most instances no objection or assignment of misconduct was made to these questions, and that also in most cases the witnesses stated that they had never heard of the matter, and in some instances the witnesses admitted that they had heard of these episodes. It further appears from the record that no request was made to the court for an admonition to the jury to disregard this evidence; nor was any instruction to that effect requested; nor was the good faith of the district attorney in making these inquiries at the time brought into question. Under these circumstances no prejudicial error can be predicated upon the action of the district attorney in making, or of the court in permitting, the inquiry as to whether the character witnesses for the defendant knew of his arrests and pleas of guilty and fines for unlawful speeding.

[4] The district attorney is also charged with misconduct in asking several of said witnesses whether they had heard it discussed that the defendant was under investigation by the police department of San Francisco for the selling of several stolen automobiles. The question was improper, and the action of the district attorney in asking it an act of misconduct on his part; but the record shows that the court in each instance sustained the defendant's objections to the question; and further shows that while the defendant's counsel assigned the act of the district attorney as misconduct, no request was made of the court to admonish or instruct the jury to disregard the same. Notwithstanding this, the court of its own motion gave the jury the following instruction:

> "Offers of testimony by either counsel which the court refused to admit in evidence, and answers given by witnesses which may have been stricken out by the court, are not evidence, and should be disregarded by you. It sometimes happens that counsel asks a question of a witness which contains an insinuation against one or other party to the action. The insinuations contained in such questions are not evidence and you must disregard them."

It is to be assumed that the jury heeded this admonition with respect not only to this precise inquiry, but also as to other questions of doubtful propriety respecting which objections were made and sustained by the court. People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435.

[5] The district attorney is also charged with misconduct in having asked of the witness Charles Swanberg the following question: "Q. Did you ever hear it discussed, Mr. Swanberg, that on the day of this affair he [the defendant] was visiting at the home of a person who had been arrested as a member of the Black Hand Society?" Before objection could be made the witness responded, "I never heard it discussed." The defendant then made his objection and assignment of misconduct; whereupon the court stated to the counsel for the defendant, "If you wish, it will be stricken out." No such request was made, however, nor was the court asked to either admonish or instruct the jury, nor was the district attorney charged with bad faith in making the inquiry. It is sufficient to say, therefore, that since the defendant chose to allow the question and answer to stand, and made no request for an admonition or instruction to the jury to disregard it, no prejudicial misconduct sufficient to justify a reversal of the case can be predicated upon the asking of the question.

The appellant further contends that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in producing a justice of the peace of San Mateo with his docket, for the purpose of showing affirmatively that the defendant had in fact been arrested, and pleaded guilty and paid a fine upon the charge of unlawful speeding. It is sufficient to say that the evidence was incompetent, and its proffered introduction improper, but that the court promptly sustained an objection to it, and that the defendant neither assigned the proffer of it as misconduct, nor asked for an instruction to the jury to disregard it. The error and impropriety of its offer in evidence must therefore be held to have been cured by the foregoing voluntary instruction of the court in its final charge to the jury.

With regard to the alleged acts of misconduct on the part of the district attorney during the argument of the case, we do not deem it necessary to deal with these in detail, for the reason that in most instances the court admonished the district attorney to confine himself to the evidence in the case; and for the further reason that upon the whole these imprudent remarks of the district attorney were not in our opinion sufficiently prejudicial to have seriously affected the verdict or to warrant a reversal of the case, particularly in view of the fact that, as above stated, the proof presented to the jury in the form of testimony and exhibits was amply sufficient to justify the verdict of conviction, and to warrant the conclusion that none of the several alleged acts of misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer were sufficiently prejudicial in character or influential in effect as to cause the verdict of conviction in this case to have been a miscarriage of justice.

[6] The final contention of the appellant is that the section of the Penal Code under which the defendant was prosecuted and convicted is unconstitutional, for two alleged reasons: First, that the section does not expressly embody in its phraseology words limiting its application to those persons who knowingly cause their vehicles to collide with those occupied by others. But our reading of the section in question convinces us that the element of knowledge of the fact of the collision is necessarily to be implied from the requirements of the act, to the effect that drivers of such vehicles must stop and render aid to those who may possibly have been injured in the collision. Moreover, section 20 of the Penal Code, which is to be read together with and into the section under review, provides that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." We are of the opinion that the act is not unconstitutional for the first reason assigned.

[7] The appellant urges as the second reason for its alleged invalidity its provision requiring the driver or occupant of a vehicle striking another to give certain information as to the number of the vehicle, the name and address of the driver and of the owner and of its passengers. It is claimed that this requirement, by compelling the persons of whom such information is demanded to be witnesses against themselves, amounts to a violation of section 13 of article 1 of the state Constitution. But the appellant concedes that this point has been decided adversely to his contention in a number of cases from other states which, as respondent shows, have been approved by this court in the case of People v. Diller, 24 Cal. App. 799, 802, 142 Pac. 797. There is, therefore, no merit in this contention.

RAMISH v. WORKMAN et al. (Civ. 2201.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑603—ACTIONS BARRED—ACTION FOR RENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1176, providing that an appeal taken by defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment unless the court so directs, where lessees under a lease which gave a right of re-entry for default in payment of rent continued to occupy the premises, pending the final determination of an appeal in an action for unlawful detainer in which the landlord recovered judgment, and no stay was directed, the lease constituted the measure of the lessees' liability for such time as they remained in possession, and the judgment did not constitute a bar to the maintenance of an action for the rent for such period.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑184(2)—LEASE —CONSTRUCTION.

Where a lease for ten years provided that the lessees "will pay to the lessor as a further consideration for his lease for this lease in addition to the rent hereinabove reserved the sum of $7,200, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged by the lessor," and that, if the lessees should pay the rent reserved when due, and perform the agreements of the lease for first nine years, seven months, and twelve days of the lease, and the lease shall not be terminated by the re-entry of the lessor within said period, etc., he will credit the sum of $7,200 the remainder of the rent due, the $7,200 was in the nature of a bonus or additional consideration for the lease of the premises under the conditions specified, and the lessees did not part with the money, as a penalty or as security, and title to it passed absolutely to the lessor, unaffected by the fact that he agreed upon the performance of certain conditions by defendants to give them credit therefor, and in the absence of such performance by the defendants they have no claim to the fund.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Adolph Ramish against Elmer N. Workman and another, in which the named defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendants, and named defendant, as cross-complainant, appeal. Affirmed.

I. Henry Harris and Williams, Goudge & Chandler, all of Los Angeles (Hunsaker & Harris, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants. Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This controversy grew out of a lease of property made by plaintiff to defendants Workman and Sturm and their assignors, for a term of ten years, for the sum of $180,000, payable in advance in monthly installments of $1,500.

Default was made in the payment of the rent due December 1, 1912, whereupon plaintiff instituted a proceeding in unlawful detainer for restitution of the property and recovery of the rent then due for said month, for which judgment was rendered on January 31, 1913, pursuant to which, notwithstanding an appeal perfected therefrom by defendants, they were evicted from the property on February 10th following.

The present action, filed April 26, 1913, was to recover the rent for the period extending from January 1st to February 10th, during which the premises were held and occupied by defendants, and for which judgment in the sum of $2,000 was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, both Workman and Sturm, as defendants, and the former also as cross-complainant, appeal.

[1] The lease provided, among other things, that upon default in payment of the rent reserved, the lessor, at his option, might enter upon the demised premises and remove all persons therefrom. By another provision it was agreed that the lessees "will pay to the lessor as a further consideration for this lease in addition to the rent hereinabove reserved the sum of $7,200, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged by the lessor," and "that, if the lessees shall pay the rent herein reserved when the same becomes due hereunder, and shall well and truly perform and observe all the covenants and agreements herein contained on their part to be performed and observed, during the first nine years, seven months, and twelve days of this lease, and this lease shall not be terminated by the re-entry of the lessor as hereinafter provided within said period of nine years, seven months and twelve days, he will credit the sum of $7,200 hereinafter provided to be paid to him by the lessees upon the last four months and eighteen days' rent under this lease."

While appellants admit that they occupied the premises during the month of January and up to February 10th, the rent for which period under the terms of the lease was $2,000, they insist their obligation to pay the same was fully adjudicated in the action for unlawful detainer, wherein judgment was rendered for $1,500, which judgment they claim constituted a bar to the maintenance of this action. At the trial it was in substance stipulated that in the unlawful detainer action no claim was made for any damages, nor for rent, other than $1,500 due for the month of December, for which and the restitution of the premises judgment was rendered, but not executed as to restitution until February 10th. The action did not involve the rent for the period extending from January 1st to February 10th, nor was there any judgment therefor rendered. Moreover, this judgment was not final for the reason that an appeal was perfected therefrom, and hence, there being no final determination of the question as to plaintiff's right to forfeit the lease, the question was left as though it had never been tried, even though no stay was directed by the court as provided in section 1176, Code of Civil Procedure. Hence, so long as defendants continued to occupy the premises, pending the final determination of the action for unlawful detainer, the lease constituted the measure of their liability for such time as they remained in possession.

Appellants' chief ground for a reversal, and upon which they devote much of their argument, is based upon the provision of the lease pursuant to which they paid plaintiff $7,200, claim to which is asserted in both the answer and cross-complaint. Notwithstanding the plain language in which the provision is couched, the meaning of which, to our minds, admits of no controversy, they insist that it should be construed as security for the payment of the rent reserved during the time ending with their eviction and any damages sustained by plaintiff; that when the landlord elected to evict defendants from the premises for nonpayment of rent he waived all claim to the $7,200, except in so far as it was necessary to apply it in payment of rent then due or accrued. As stated in Dutton v. Christie, 63 Wash. 373, 115 Pac. 857, where a similar question was involved: "We cannot agree with this contention without in effect writing a new contract for the parties."

[2] Clearly the $7,200 was paid for a ten-year lease of the premises, upon the conditions and terms specified therein. Defendants parted with the money, not as a penalty or as security, but as a payment the consideration for which was the execution of the lease on the part of plaintiff. The title thereto passed absolutely to the lessor, unaffected by the fact that he agreed, upon the performance of certain conditions by defendants, to give them credit therefor. The conditions were never performed by defendants, and hence they could have no claim to the fund. The authorities which appellants cite in support of their contention all appear to have been cases where the deposit was made with the lessor upon the execution of the lease as security for the payment of the rent, and in such cases, upon the lessor evicting the tenants, it is uniformly held that he cannot assert claim to the amount so deposited, over and above rent due, with damages sustained. The cases cited by appellants involve deposits made as "a guaranty," "as indemnity," as "a penalty," "for security," etc., and hence are readily distinguished from the case at bar. This view finds full support in the case of Dutton v. Christie, supra.

The provisions of the lease in question hereinbefore quoted should be interpreted in accordance with the plain import of the language used, and, thus construed, it is clear that the parties intended the $7,200 to be in the nature of a bonus or additional consideration paid the lessor as an inducement to make the lease upon the terms and conditions therein contained; and, as stated, the fact that upon the performance of all the covenants and agreements contained in the lease to be performed by the lessees during the first nine years, seven months, and twelve days of the term thereof he promised in effect to release them from the payment of rent at the rate of $1,500 per month for the last four months and eighteen days of the term so demised furnishes no reason for appellants' contention.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. Replevin 🔑4, 59—Action of Claim and Delivery—Description of Property.

In an action in claim and delivery, it is essential that the specific personal property claimed should be described with a reasonable degree of certainty, and, as a rule, money is not the subject of such an action unless it is marked or designated so as to make it specific as regards its capability of identification.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Hon. Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Curtis Hillyer against Frederick Eggers, Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Tomsky, of San Francisco (J. L. Nagle, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Curtis Hillyer and Thomas W. Forsyth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an adverse judgment in an action for the recovery of $730, claimed to have been unlawfully taken under execution.

In the early part of the year 1914 the Sequoia Motorcar Company gave in payment for legal services rendered to it its promissory note for $300 to its attorney, O. C. Pratt. Prior to its maturity the payee, for a valuable consideration, transferred it to the plaintiff. At its maturity it was unpaid. Subsequently H. J. Small became a judgment creditor of the company in the sum of $3,000. It also appears from the record that Mrs. H. A. Gillis was indebted to the company in the sum of $1,000 upon a stock subscription, the indebtedness being evidenced by her promissory note, given, however, with the understanding that the note was not to be negotiated. Contrary to this agreement it was negotiated; and Mr. Henley C. Booth, attorney for both H. J. Small and Mrs. H. A. Gillis, wishing to find out who had possession of the note, communicated with plaintiff by telephone, telling him that he represented Mrs. Gillis, and asking him if he knew where the note was. Plaintiff replied that he did not, but would try to find out and let Mr. Booth know. Later, having ascertained that the note was held by a Mr. W. W. Allen, plaintiff communicated with Booth, and negotiation ensued, resulting in Booth agreeing to pay plaintiff the sum of $730 for it. The latter then purchased the note from Allen, paying him therefor the sum of $550, hoping apparently through the completion of the transaction with Booth to recoup in part the loss he had sustained by his purchase of the note given by the company to Pratt, the company being now insolvent.

About this time, according to the argument of the respondent, Booth appears to have conceived the idea of acquiring for Mrs. Gillis her note, and that the price to be paid for it should go to his other client, Small. Accordingly, he agreed with the plaintiff that the payment of the $750 for the note should be made in his (Booth's) office, at a certain time, harboring the intention, however, that at the moment of receiving the note from the plaintiff and tendering payment thereof the money should be seized in execution of Small's judgment. This plan was carried out, so that when the plaintiff's agent handed the note to Booth the latter placed $730 in currency on the desk in front of him, and before the messenger of the plaintiff could pick it up, a deputy of the defendant, who was waiting in the room for that purpose, seized the currency and levied upon it pursuant to an execution issued in favor of Small upon a judgment obtained by him against the Sequoia Motorcar Company. Plaintiff immediately demanded of the defendant the return of the money, and filed with him a claim for the same. Defendant refused to comply with his demand, whereupon plaintiff brought this action for its recovery.

The record further shows that the plaintiff, prior to its maturity and without notice of the collateral agreement of the company not to transfer it, paid a valuable consideration for the note; that no fraud was either charged or proven against the plaintiff, and that no fiduciary relation existed between him and any of the parties to the transaction, and that title to the note was vested in him.

[1] Passing now to the only objection seriously urged by the appellant for a reversal of the judgment, it is that the plaintiff has apparently proceeded upon the theory that his remedy was an action in claim and delivery. In such an action it is essential that the specific personal property claimed should be described with a reasonable degree of certainty; and as a rule money is not the subject of such an action unless it be marked or designated in some manner so as to make it specific as regards its capability of identification. Eddings v. Boner, 1 Ind. T. 173, 38 S. W. 1110; Griffith v. Bogardus, 14 Cal. 410, 413; Sharon v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 235; Hawley v. Kocher, 123 Cal. 77, 55 Pac. 696. The description of the money in this case is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to its return is specie.

[2] The complaint, however, irrespective of what the plaintiff has styled it, is sufficient to show him to be entitled to recover from the defendant the amount of money taken from him wrongfully under execution, upon the theory that he has, as required by the Code, stated the facts constituting his cause of action, or facts showing a cause of action, for money had and received. Under the circumstances of this case the judgment of the trial court must be sustained notwithstanding the contention of the appellant, as it is apparent from a decision of our own Supreme Court in Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 62 Pac. 463, where it is said:

> "Courts and law writers have sometimes inadvertently spoken of the Code 'action of claim and delivery' as if there were really here a form of action called by that name—just as there were forms of action at common law, such as 'debt,' 'covenant,' 'replevin,' 'trover,' etc. But we have here no forms of civil actions. We have only one form of action, which has no name; so that an action cannot be here defeated, as it could have been at common law, because not properly named. Sections 509 to 520 of the Code of Civil Procedure are preceded by the heading 'claim and delivery of personal property,' but the sections themselves show the meaning of this heading. They merely provide an auxiliary remedy by which, when a party brings an action to recover personal property, he may 'claim' that the property be immediately delivered to him at the commencement of the action and without waiting the trial. * * * These sections merely give to a plaintiff suing to recover personal property an auxiliary remedy very similar to the auxiliary remedy of 'attachment' given to a plaintiff suing upon a contract for the direct payment of money, and to the auxiliary remedy under the head of 'arrest and bail' and 'injunction during litigation.' But it is no more proper to speak of an action 'of claim and delivery' than to speak of an action 'of attachment.'"

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by E. J. Robinson against the Smith-Booth-Usher Company. From judgment for defendant and order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Randall & Gaines and Shepard & Alm, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Oscar Mueller, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action wherein the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while employed by the defendant in its machine shop; it being alleged that these injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant. The answer denied all negligence on the part of the defendant, and also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant first insists that the evidence proved negligence on the part of the defendant and failed to prove contributory negligence of the plaintiff. There was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon these questions, and the evidence favorable to the defendant, if believed by the jury (as it was), is sufficient to support the verdict.

Appellant directs attention to certain instructions given by the court to the jury at the request of the defendant. It is claimed that by these instructions the jury was told that, if the plaintiff was guilty of a want of ordinary care in the slightest degree contributing directly to his injury, plaintiff could not recover, regardless of the negligence of the defendant or its servant. Reliance is placed upon the fact that at the date of this accident, November 25, 1911, there was in force a statute relating to the liability of employers to their employés (Stats. 1911, p. 796), wherein it was provided that in actions of this class:

> "The fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé." Section 1.

In addition to the instructions complained of by appellant, the court gave to the jury an instruction requested by plaintiff, stating the doctrine of contributory negligence in accordance with said statute.

[1] At the close of his reading of instructions to the jury, the judge suggested that there was an inconsistency in the instructions relating to that issue. He then specially directed the attention of the jury to the instruction which he had given at plaintiff's request and read it to them a second time, with the further direct statement that this was a correct statement of the law. In view of this action by the court, we deem it unnecessary to examine the instructions complained of. Assuming that they were erroneous, the instruction as finally given had the effect of withdrawing those erroneous instructions from the consideration of the jury. That a court may thus correct its own error seems too plain to leave room for argument.

[2] Appellant also complains of defendant's instructions numbered 14 and 24 as given by the court. These instructions related to the question of negligence of the defendant, if from the evidence the jury believed certain stated facts. The criticism upon these instructions is that each of them purported to state a complete defense, but omitted certain facts concerning which evidence had been introduced pertaining to defendant's alleged negligence. Assuming that the omitted evidence should have been stated, the record is not in the condition necessary to enable us to determine that the error was prejudicial to the plaintiff.

> "There shall be no presumption that error is prejudicial, or that injury was done if error is shown." Code of Civ. Proc. § 475.

The statement of the case, as set forth in the transcript, says that:

> The court, "on its own motion and at the request of the plaintiff, instructed the jury in part as follows."

After setting forth certain instructions thus given, it is further said:

> "That thereupon the court instructed the jury in part as follows, at the request of the defendant."

After setting forth those instructions, it is said that:

"Other instructions were given by the court of its own motion and by request of plaintiff and defendant not here set forth."

There is not even a statement that the instructions placed in the record include all of the instructions given with respect to the propositions covered by the instructions put into the record.

"It is said in the transcript that the instruction complained of, 'among others,' was given. The others referred to are not contained in the transcript, and we have no means, therefore, of judging what bearing they may have had upon the one in question. If it should be conceded, therefore, that the instruction complained of should have been qualified or modified in some degree, it may be that the instructions omitted would have qualified or modified the one in question, and the rule is well settled that instructions are to be read and considered as a whole, and the fact that, when taken severally, some of them have failed to enunciate in precise terms and with legal accuracy propositions of law, does not render them erroneous." Hanson v. Stinehoff, 139 Cal. 171, 173, 72 Pac. 913, 915.

"Where numerous instructions are given [as in this case] it may well be that some particular instruction fails to contain a complete or accurate statement of the law. If, however, when the entire charge is examined the omissions or inaccuracies in a particular instruction appear to have been supplied, and the jury fairly and consistently instructed, generally, as to the law, this is sufficient to defeat any claim of error predicated on defects in particular instructions." Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 699, 89 Pac. 976, 980.

PEDREIRA v. PEDREIRA. (Civ. 1632.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑296—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE—EVIDENCE.

In a wife's action for separate maintenance for cruel and inhuman treatment, where the pleadings contained no appropriate allegation with reference to defendant's acts before the marriage, plaintiff's evidence that defendant had had intercourse with her frequently for seven or eight years before their marriage, and at nearly every such occurrence had promised to marry her, was improperly admitted as without the issues, and calculated to prejudice defendant with the jury and court.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑296—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — EVIDENCE — PLEADING.

In an action for separate maintenance on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, allegations of specific cruel treatment did not warrant admission of evidence of specific acts of cruelty other than those presented by the pleadings.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298(1, 2)—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE—INQUIRY INTO WIFE'S NECESSITIES.

The Court should have permitted an inquiry into plaintiff's necessities and her manner of living in order that a suitable award might be made for her maintenance; the discretion of the trial court not being arbitrary, but to be exercised in view of the necessities of the parties, and defendant's financial condition and his earning capacity, together with plaintiff's possessions and her accustomed style of living, being proper elements to be regarded.

4. WITNESSES 🔑275(3) — CROSS-EXAMINATION—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE.

Where plaintiff set up defendant's having had her committed to a hospital for the insane as an act of cruelty, and, on her direct examination, she testified to facts concerning the occurrence that would necessarily create the impression that she was sane at the time, defendant's inquiry on cross-examination, directed to the point that plaintiff did not know she was examined or committed, in other words, that her mind was a blank as to what happened, should have been permitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 969.]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑297—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE.

In a wife's action for separate maintenance on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, the law requires that the jury be convinced of cruelty by a preponderance of evidence to justify finding for plaintiff.

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298½ — ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

The court instructed that if the jury found plaintiff was sane at the time of the marriage, and there was evidence of cruelty, verdict would be for plaintiff in the amount the jury might determine to be adequate, etc., and that, if the jury believed from the testimony that plaintiff was treated in a cruel and inhuman manner, as alleged, and that the general treatment of plaintiff by defendant from the time of marriage to the date of commencement of trial was cruel and inhuman, verdict would be for plaintiff. Held, that the instruction was erroneous as ignoring the consideration of the weight and credibility of the evidence as to the cruelty and the jury's proper function in relation thereto, also in failing to state the elements that should enter into the determination of the amount to be awarded plaintiff.

7. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298½ — ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction as to the general treatment of plaintiff was not justified by the pleadings, there being no allegation of general cruel treatment of plaintiff by defendant.

8. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298½ — ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

In a wife's action for separate maintenance for cruel and inhuman treatment, wherein she alleged, as an act of cruelty, that her husband procured her commitment to a hospital for the insane, the husband had a right to expect that the jury would be instructed along the line suggested by him in requests concerning his theory as to the wife's insanity at the time of the marriage.

9. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298½ — ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

In a wife's action for separate maintenance for cruel treatment, though the jury's verdict was simply advisory, it was nevertheless important that the jury should be clearly instructed, particularly in view of the usual inclination on the part of the judge to adopt its findings, and the fact that they were adopted.

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑298(1, 2) — ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE—ALLOWANCE FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES — BURDEN OF PROOF—STATUTE.

A wife is entitled to an allowance for attorney's fee in her suit for separate maintenance only when it is necessary to enable her properly to maintain her action, and the burden is on her to show that the allowance is necessary; Civ. Code, § 137, governing the matter, contemplating that it shall be made only when necessary to enable the wife to present her case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action for separate maintenance without divorce by Mary Pedreira against A. F. Pedreira. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. W. Henderson and Hugh K. Landram, both of Merced, for appellant. Jack Mahon, of Merced, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action, brought under section 137 of the Civil Code and grounded upon cruel and inhuman treatment, was for separate maintenance without divorce. The specific instances of cruelty alleged were: (1) Defendant absented himself during the birth of a child to plaintiff; (2) defendant did not provide a doctor or nurse for plaintiff during childbirth; (3) said neglect caused plaintiff great physical pain and mental anguish by reason of which the child was born dead; (4) that on April 14, 1914, defendant caused plaintiff to be moved to the Merced sanitarium, and thence to the Merced county jail, whence the plaintiff was committed to the state hospital at Stockton; (5) that, upon her release from said hospital in July 1914, defendant refused to take plaintiff to his home or to live with her as his wife.

In the answer there was a specific denial of the allegations of cruelty, an admission that plaintiff was committed to said hospital, but an explanatory averment that defendant was advised by the medical attendants of plaintiff that it was necessary, for the protection of the plaintiff and those who might come in contact with her, that she be committed to said hospital because she was violently insane, and that she was regularly committed to the state hospital after a hearing in the superior court of the county of Merced. Defendant further alleged that plaintiff had agreed to accept from defendant the sum of $40 per month as and for her separate maintenance. By way of cross-complaint it was further averred that at the time of the marriage of plaintiff and defendant she was of unsound mind and not capable of contracting marital relations; that because of this insanity defendant prayed for an annulment of the marriage.

The action was tried with the assistance of a jury. The jury found that the plaintiff was not insane at the time of the marriage; that defendant had treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner subsequent to said marriage; that plaintiff had not agreed to accept the sum of $40 per month for her separate maintenance; and that $75 per month was a reasonable amount for such purpose. The court adopted said findings and rendered judgment accordingly, and in addition allowed plaintiff $400 for her attorney's fees.

It is claimed by appellant that many prejudicial errors are disclosed by the record, and we proceed to notice some of the assignments.

Over objection, plaintiff was permitted to testify that the defendant had had intercourse with her frequently for seven or eight years prior to their marriage, and that at nearly every such occurrence he promised to marry her. The court declared "it would not be evidence that you could rely upon," but overruled the objection.

[1] The evidence seems to have been entirely outside of the issues made by the pleadings and could hardly assist "in getting at the truth of the facts disputed." The natural effect of such testimony would be to excite sympathy for the plaintiff and hostility toward the defendant. It can be easily imagined how the jury, or the judge of the court, for that matter, would regard with indignation and contempt a man who, under repeated promises of marriage had seduced plaintiff and had actually been guilty of such illicit conduct while his first wife lay upon her deathbed. The prejudice thus aroused would hardly permit of a dispassionate and impartial consideration of the evidence relevant to the issues made by the pleadings.

Respondent contends that:

> "The object of this testimony was, not to prejudice the defendant in the eyes of the jury, but to arrive at facts which would and did throw light on the issues involved. These acts of intercourse bore directly on the attitude of the defendant at the time he married plaintiff, and were the very acts upon which his subsequent treatment of plaintiff was based; they were facts necessary to be before the jury in order to obtain a fair understanding as to the relations of the parties."

As to this we think plaintiff is in error. If it had been supposed that it was important to inquire into the acts of appellant before the marriage, there should have been some appropriate allegation in reference thereto. The fact is, said evidence refers to a time remote from anything referred to in the complaint and to conduct before marriage, whereas the cause of action is entirely based upon treatment of plaintiff by defendant after the marriage took place. Of course, the general rule is as stated in Jones on Evidence, vol. 1, par. 140a, that:

> "Evidence of other acts of the parties, outside of the acts in record and unconnected with it, are not generally admitted in evidence."
> "The rule excludes," as stated in People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 379, 34 Pac. 856, "all evidence of collateral facts, or those which are incapable of affording a reasonable presumption or logical inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute; and evidence of another offense cannot be given unless there is some clear connection between the two offenses by which it may be logically inferred that if guilty of the one the defendant is also guilty of the other."

The statement was made in a criminal case, but the same principal would manifestly apply here. We can see no logical connection between said conduct before marriage and the acts after marriage which are set out in the complaint.

[2] Objection was also made to evidence of other specific acts of cruelty than those presented by the pleadings. If important enough to be shown, they were certainly important enough to be alleged. It may be permissible to show a general course of conduct as supplementing specific acts of cruelty where only the specific acts are set out, but the rulings complained of could hardly be justified except upon the erroneous theory that it is not necessary to allege any specific act but that a general allegation of cruel treatment is sufficient.

[3] We think, also, that the court should have permitted an inquiry into the necessities of the plaintiff and her manner of living in order that a suitable award might be made for her maintenance. Manifestly, much discretion in this matter must be confided to the trial court, but the discretion is not an arbitrary one and must be exercised in view of the circumstances of the parties. The financial condition of the defendant and his earning capacity, together with the possessions of the plaintiff and her accustomed style of living, were proper elements to be regarded in the consideration. In Kusel v. Kusel, 147 Cal. 60, 81 Pac. 295, there is an interesting discussion of the difference between an allowance to the wife on divorce and the separate maintenance that is contemplated by the Code. Referring to the latter, it is said:

> "The action does not contemplate a divorce, but, on the contrary, that the parties shall continue to remain as they were before, husband and wife. The rights of the wife in the remaining property of the husband are not destroyed or affected in the least by the decree or judgment. The necessity for the separate maintenance may terminate at any time by reconciliation of the parties, or by the death of one of them. The law favors the reconciliation of the parties, and it should not be construed so as to afford a temptation for the wife to press an action for maintenance rather than to seek restoration to her marital rights."

This view of the spirit of the law emphasizes the importance of confining the allowance to the necessary maintenance of the wife in comfort and decency according to her accustomed standard of living.

[4] We think the cross-examination of plaintiff in reference to her commitment to the hospital for the insane was improperly curtailed. On her direct examination she had testified to facts concerning said occurrence that would necessarily create the impression that she was sane at the time. It would be argued from this that the husband had knowledge of her condition and was therefore chargeable with cruelty in having her committed. To rebut this unfavorable inference several questions were asked of the witness directed to the point that she did not know even that she was examined or committed; in other words, that her mind was a blank as to what happened. The inquiry was addressed to the same matter involved in the direct examination and should have been permitted. It may be added that counsel for appellant, at the time of the direct examination, sought to have respondent declare whether she claimed to have been sane at the time she was committed, and her counsel answered: "Yes, you bet she was." It is true that a moment after he said:

> "I don't claim she was railroaded. The jury can draw their own conclusion. I don't claim that she was sane or insane."

However, the effect of her testimony was as we have indicated, and appellant had the legal right to subject it to the test of cross-examination. The gravity of the inquiry is quite apparent, as it involved the most serious charge of cruelty in the case.

After stating to the jury that they must first find whether plaintiff was sane or insane at the time of her marriage, the court, on request of plaintiff, gave this instruction:

> "If you find that the plaintiff was sane at the time of the marriage and there is evidence of cruelty, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff, in the amount that you may determine to be adequate, and for her attorney's fees and for her costs of suit.
> "I instruct you that if you believe from the testimony introduced in this case that the plaintiff was treated in a cruel and inhuman manner as alleged in the complaint, and you believe that the general treatment of the plaintiff by the defendant from the time of the marriage to the date of the commencement of this trial was cruel and inhuman, your verdict will be for the plaintiff."

[5, 6] Probably the most serious objection to the instruction is that it authorized the jury to find for plaintiff if there was any evidence of cruelty. The law, of course required that they be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence in order to justify such finding. The instruction as given also ignored the consideration of the weight and credibility of such evidence and the proper function of the jury in relation thereto. It is subject, also, to criticism in failing to state the elements that should enter into the determination of the amount to be awarded plaintiff.

[7] The instruction as to the general treatment of plaintiff by defendant was not justified by the pleadings. There was no such allegation, and therefore it was not within the issues. Following the instruction, the jury might have believed that none of the specific allegations of cruelty was supported, and yet have found in favor of plaintiff upon this sweeping direction as to general treatment. This would be contrary to the established rules of practice.

[8] Appellant complains also of the action of the court in refusing certain instructions proposed by him concerning his theory as to the insanity of plaintiff at the time of the marriage. They seem to embody a correct principle of law, and it is not shown that they were inapplicable to the evidence. Appellant had a right to expect that the jury would be instructed along the line suggested.

[9] In considering the instructions, we are mindful of the fact that the verdict of the jury was simply advisory, and that the erroneous action of the court thereon must be regarded in a somewhat different light from the case where a jury may be demanded as of right. However, in view of the natural and usual inclination on the part of the judge to adopt the findings of the jury and the fact that they were adopted in this case, it seems quite important that the jury should have been correctly instructed.

[10] There is apparent justification for appellant's complaint as to the allowance of $400 for an attorney's fee. As we understand it, the law is settled that a wife is entitled to an allowance of this kind only when it is necessary to enable her properly to maintain her action and the burden is upon her to show that such allowance is necessary. Respondent is challenged by appellant to point out any evidence showing such necessity. It is declared that plaintiff made no attempt of any kind to prove that it was necessary, that the record is absolutely silent upon the point, and that there are no findings of fact upon which such an order could be based. The only reply is that the contention is absurd, but it can hardly be so easily answered. The statute itself, section 137 of the Civil Code, contemplates that the order shall be made only when it is necessary to enable the wife to present her case, and, in commenting upon this provision of the law, the Supreme Court, in Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 494, 35 Pac. 87, said:

> "The plain object of this statute was to empower the court, * * * upon a proper showing made by the wife for that purpose, to compel the husband to provide her with the means necessary to enable her to prosecute or defend the action."

Other errors are claimed by appellant, but it is deemed unnecessary to notice them specifically. It is earnestly contended that the evidence is utterly insufficient to support the findings of cruelty. There is force in the contention, but we are not prepared to say that there is an entire failure in that respect. The evidence, however, bearing upon and lending support to the allegations of the complaint, seems quite meager, and we think in fairness to appellant that there should be a new trial. If the evidence were strong and convincing, it might be held that the errors committed were without prejudice; but, as the case appears so doubtful upon the merits, in view of the record we think the judgment should not be permitted to stand.

It is therefore reversed.

PORTER v. STOCKDALE et al. (Civ. 1628.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 12, 1917.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⚿119—ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for specific performance of a contract to convey placer mining land, the contract itself does not afford any evidence of the adequacy of the consideration, though, the contract being in writing, the presumption is that it was for a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 382, 383.]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⚿123—PROOF OF ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 3391, providing that specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract if he has not received an adequate consideration, where plaintiff, in an action for specific performance of an agreement to convey placer mining land, failed to prove that the consideration was adequate, though the point was put in issue by the pleadings and his attention was called to it on the motion for nonsuit, when, if requested, the court would have permitted him to supply the evidence, judgment of nonsuit was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 397, 399.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Porter against Lien Ellen Stockdale and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, and an order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

H. H. Eaton, of San Francisco, for appellant. Hennessy & Peterson, of Grass Valley, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action is for specific performance of an agreement to convey certain placer mining land in Nevada county. After plaintiff had introduced his evidence at the trial a motion for nonsuit was made upon the grounds that the complaint failed to state a cause of action; that the plaintiff was barred by his laches in making tender of payment more than 3 years and 5 months after the third payment in his contract became due, and more than 2 years and 5 months after the fourth payment became due; that time was of the essence of the contract, and therefore plaintiff could not recover; that the delay in making his tender constituted laches from the very nature of the land, it being mining property; that plaintiff had failed to prove the value of the land, and that he had not shown that the sum of $700, as set forth and mentioned in the contract sued upon, was and is a fair and adequate consideration and price for the land therein described. The court held that time is an essential feature in contracts relating to the sale and purchase of mining property, and that, since the tender of payments was made long after they became due, the plaintiff was barred by his laches, and, furthermore, that plaintiff had failed to prove an adequate consideration or whether it was fair and equitable. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the appeal is from that order and the judgment of nonsuit.

It is to be observed that appellant seems to have been rather indifferent to the view of the trial court as to the adequacy of the consideration, it appearing that in his assignment of his reasons for excepting to the ruling there is no allusion whatever to this ground, although the court had made it very emphatic, stating:

> "Further than that, it seems to me, even if the court should hold against the defendant upon the ground of inexcusable delay and laches, there is no showing before the court which would enable the court to say what is the value of the land, or whether the compensation agreed upon is fair and equitable. * * * It is an action in equity, and that is one of the essential factors that the compensation is fair and reasonable."

We notice, also, that in the assignments of error there is the same omission and the opening brief of appellant is entirely silent on the subject. Nevertheless, the question is of vital importance in this state. The statute itself is clear and the decisions applying and enforcing it numerous and conclusive. We may notice a few of these.

In Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 115, 19 Pac. 190, it is said:

> "Before the Code, the preponderance of authority was, that mere inadequacy of consideration, not amounting to evidence of fraud, was not ground for refusing specific performance. Pomeroy on Specific Performance, § 194. But the Civil Code contains the following provision: 'Sec. 3391. Specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract in any of the following cases: (1) If he has not received an adequate consideration for the contract; (2) if it is not as to him just and reasonable.' Here the inadequacy of consideration seems to be mentioned as a distinct ground from the injustice and unreasonableness; and the provision seems to be explicit and absolute. We do not doubt that the point of time to which the question of adequacy must relate is the time of the formation of the contract."

In Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 57 Pac. 386, the appeal was from an order denying the motion for nonsuit, and, in reversing it, the court said:

> "Specific performance is an equitable remedy, and it is incumbent upon the plaintiff in an action of this character to show both in the averments of his pleading and in the evidence at the trial that he is entitled to the equitable relief which he seeks. In the absence of any averment or evidence as to the value of the land involved in the controversy, either as to the whole of it or as to any portion of it, with nothing stated upon which to base any estimate of the value or worth of the option and privilege to purchase, how is the court to determine whether defendants have received an adequate consideration or whether the contract is as to them just and reasonable? * * * It may be that this land is worth $500 an acre; if so, $100 per acre is not an adequate consideration for it. * * * The allegations and evidence as to improvements being placed upon the land by plaintiff do not tend to obviate or cure the defects in plaintiff's case already pointed out."

In White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 616, 87 Pac. 193, after citing various prior decisions of the Supreme Court, it is said:

> "The effect of these decisions is that the mere statement of the price agreed to be paid, as in this case, will not suffice. There must be a showing of the value, at least, so that the court can determine whether or not it was in reasonable proportion to the price to be paid, or of other facts which are sufficient to satisfy the court that the contract is just and reasonable to the buyer in all its material elements."

So in Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 788, 96 Pac. 806, it was declared that:

> "Specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land cannot be had by a vendee where it is neither alleged nor proved that the vendor had received an adequate consideration for the contract, and that as to him it was just and reasonable, nor that facts exist which would justify the inference that such conditions existed."

Finally, in Haddock v. Knapp, 171 Cal. 59, 151 Pac. 1140, it is said:

> "Whatever may be the rule in the absence of statute—and on this point the authorities in other jurisdictions are not in harmony—section 3391 of the Civil Code and the decisions of this court establish beyond the possibility of question the proposition that inadequacy of consideration is, under the law of California, an independent and distinct ground for denying specific performance. * * * The burden of alleging and proving the adequacy of the consideration is upon the party seeking the relief."

Coming to the facts here, we find that plaintiff alleged in his complaint:

> "That the sum of $700 as set forth and mentioned in said instrument was and is a just, fair and adequate consideration and price for the land therein described."

Defendants' answer to this was full and specific in denying that the sum of $700 was or is adequate or fair or just, and no evidence whatever was even offered as to the value of the property at the time the contract was executed, nor do any circumstances appear tending to show that said consideration was adequate or fair or just.

[1] The contract was not denied, but in this class of cases the contract itself does not afford any evidence of the adequacy of the consideration. Being in writing, the presumption is that it was for a valuable consideration, but, as we have seen, the adequacy is a distinct and independent ground in an action for specific performance, and it must be proved, or else equity will afford the plaintiff no relief.

[2] If the proof was available plaintiff can blame only himself for the condition of the record. The issue was made by the pleadings, and he should have been placed on his guard. His attention was also called to it on the motion for nonsuit, and, no doubt, if requested the court, would have permitted him even then to supply the evidence. He chose, however, to ignore that feature, probably for a good reason. At any rate, it seems decisive of the controversy, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

ALTPETER et al. v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. (Civ. 1588.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑663(3), 691—STREETS—NUISANCES—TREES ALONG SIDEWALKS.

Trees may be lawfully grown and maintained along the sidewalks in the streets of cities and towns and in front of premises of abutting property owners, and trees so grown are not nuisances.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑663(3) — STREETS—INJURING TREES—RIGHT OF ACTION.

While the owner of property in front of which trees are grown and standing has only a qualified or limited interest in them, an interest subject and subordinate to the rights of the city to trim and remove the trees whenever the public interests require such action, if a person injures such trees without lawful right or authority, the owner can recover such damages as he may be able to show he has suffered by reason of any depreciation in the value of his property occasioned by the injury to the trees.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑680, 681(1)—POWER TO GRANT FRANCHISE TO PUBLIC UTILITIES.

Cities and towns are empowered, as agents of the state, to grant to public utility corporations, such as those engaged in the distribution of water, gas, electricity, or the transmission of telegrams, etc., the right to use the streets in a reasonable manner.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑663(3) — STREETS — INJURIES TO TREES — RIGHT OF TELEGRAPH COMPANY TO CLEAR WIRES OF BRANCHES OF TREES.

A telegraph company did not subject itself to an action for damages when it cut the branches of trees growing in front of city property along a sidewalk to clear its wires to prevent interference with their proper operation.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑663(3) — STREETS — INJURIES TO TREES — RIGHT OF TELEGRAPH COMPANY TO CLEAR WIRES FROM BRANCHES.

A telegraph or telephone corporation, in trimming or severing the branches of trees to prevent contact of wires therewith, can do no more than is necessary for the proper and efficient working of wires, without subjecting itself to civil liability for damages.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑671(4) — STREETS — INJURIES TO TREES — REMOVING BRANCHES FROM WIRES.

In an action by property owners against a telegraph company for damages caused by the company's cutting off the branches of trees in front of plaintiffs' property to clear its wires, the burden was on plaintiffs to show either that it was entirely unnecessary to remove any branches from the trees, or that the company removed more branches than the situation with respect to its wires called for.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Catherine Altpeter and another against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 25 Cal. App. 255, 143 Pac. 93; 26 Cal. App. 705, 148 Pac. 241.

Willard P. Smith and B. B. Blake, both of San Francisco, for appellant. E. E. Gaddis, of Woodland, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for the alleged injury of certain walnut trees standing and growing in and on Court street, in the city of Woodland, in front of the plaintiffs' houses, situated on lots 8, 9, and 10 of block 4 of said city, said lots being the property of the plaintiffs.

The complaint alleges a wrongful and unauthorized cutting of the limbs of the trees, the charge so alleged being that the defendant without lawful or any authority knowingly and willfully cut down, chopped, mangled, mutilated, disfigured, and destroyed four of said trees, and prays for a judgment for $500 and treble any sum at which damages may be assessed. Code Civ. Proc. § 733.

The answer denies the allegations of the complaint, and as an affirmative defense describes the character of the defendant's business, alleges the necessity of clearing its wires from the branches of the said trees, through the branches of which said wires pass, alleges that the lines of the defendant have been maintained on the street in question and through said trees for a long period of time prior to the acquisition by the plaintiffs of the premises in front of which said trees stand.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $450, and costs. This appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is prosecuted by the defendant from said judgment.

The action is founded on section 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, which reads:

> "Any person who cuts down or carries off any wood or underwood, tree or timber, or girdles or otherwise injures any tree or timber on the land of another person, or on the street or highway in front of any person's house, village, or city lot, or cultivated grounds; or on the commons or public grounds of any city or town, or on the street or highway in front thereof, without lawful authority, is liable to the owner of such land, or to such city or town, for treble the amount of damages which may be assessed therefor, in a civil action, in any court having jurisdiction."

Section 3346 of the Civil Code prescribes the measure of damages for the wrongful injuries to timber, trees, or underwood "upon the land of another, or removal thereof." The general contention of the defendant is that the findings derive no support from the evidence.

The particular proposition urged by the defendant, however, is whether or not a telegraph company which maintains its lines in the public streets of a town or city may, as against an abutting property owner, lawfully trim trees growing and standing in a street, and through which its wires pass, for the purpose of preventing branches of such trees from interfering with the proper operation of the wires as transmitters of telegraph messages.

[1-3] These propositions will not be controverted: (1) That trees may lawfully be grown and maintained along the sidewalks in the streets of cities and towns and in front of the premises of abutting property owners, that is to say, that trees so grown are not nuisances as would be a purpresture of any character which would ordinarily have the effect of obstructing or materially interfering with traffic in and over the street; (2) that, while the owner of property in front of which trees are grown and standing has only a qualified or limited interest in the trees—an interest which, in other words, is subject and subordinate to the rights of the city to trim or remove them whenever the public interests require such action—if a person injures such trees without lawful right or authority, such owner may maintain an action for damages for the injury so inflicted and recover such damages as he may be able to show that he has suffered by reason of any depreciation in the value of his property which has been occasioned by such injury; (3) that, where trees so grown are cut, trimmed, or removed by the city or town for the purpose of facilitating the use of the street in a legal manner by the public, then the damage resulting from such cutting or removal to the owner of the property in front of which such trees are standing is damnum absque injuria; (4) that cities and towns are generally empowered, as agents of the state, to grant to public utility corporations such as are engaged in the distribution of water, gas, electricity, or the transmission by electric currents of telegrams or messages the right to use, in a reasonable manner, or so as not to interfere with common traffic, their streets for the purpose of installing and maintaining in such streets the equipments essential to the carrying on of the business of such corporations, and that, when such right or privilege or franchise is so granted, such corporations are authorized, upon such conditions or under such restrictions as may have reasonably been imposed, to remove from the streets so used any object or thing which will, if permitted to exist, prevent proper and efficient service by them as such corporations to the public.

[4] The last stated of the foregoing propositions is peculiarly applicable to telegraph and telephone corporations maintaining their wires over and along the streets of cities and other urban communities.

> "The telegraph company," well say counsel for the defendant in their opening brief filed herein, "exercises its franchise in the street as a public agency, and not as a private individual. It is charged with a public duty which it can neither shirk nor avoid. It must maintain its lines at all times in a safe and workable condition, so that the messages of the public may be transmitted over them without delay and without error. In this respect it exercises the same functions over its wires that the public authorities exercise over the streets and highways themselves. The latter are endowed with the right and charged with the duty of removing trees whenever they become an obstruction to travel by foot or vehicle over the surface of the highway. The same reasoning which supports this right requires that the owners of the telegraph lines dedicated to public use should be endowed with a similar right and charged with a similar duty whenever the free transmission of telegrams over their wires is obstructed by the growth of the branches of trees among the wires or from any other cause. And just as the street and highway authorities are given a wide latitude of discretion in performing their duties, so the telegraph company should be given a broad latitude in removing limbs of trees so long as the removal is not done carelessly or in bad faith. Furthermore, the telegraph company having been granted the right by the state to construct its lines on the public highways, such incidental powers as are necessary to make the principal grant effective naturally follow it. If it were otherwise the principal grant would exist only in name and would be absolutely of no value or effect for practical purposes. Recognizing the soundness of this reasoning, the courts have uniformly held that the power and right to trim trees interfering with telegraph wires exists in the telegraph company owning the wires."

[5] Of course, a telegraph or telephone corporation, in trimming or severing the branches of trees to prevent contact of their wires therewith, will not be permitted to do more in that respect than is necessary for the proper and efficient working of their wires. If it goes beyond this or wantonly and unnecessarily cuts or mutilates the trees —that is, if such corporation removes branches or limbs which do not, and from their situation with respect to the wires cannot, interfere with or impair the proper and efficient use of such wires—then it is liable for any damages thereby caused to the owner of the premises in front of which the trees stand.

The principles stated above are elementary, and, applying them to the facts of the instant case as the evidence presented before us discloses them, we cannot perceive how the findings may be upheld.

The facts are: That the predecessor in interest of the defendant installed a telegraph line in the city of Woodland and erected the wires over and along Court street in said city and through the trees in question in the year 1886, and have ever since so maintained said wires. From time to time during the period from 1886–87 down to the date of the trimming of said trees in August, 1911, the defendant and its predecessor in interest have, when the exigency of the case required it, trimmed and severed from the trees certain of the branches and limbs thereof. That such cutting and trimming are absolutely necessary whenever the branches and limbs have so grown and spread out as to bring them in contact with the defendant's wires is so obvious a proposition that it will not be disputed. But a clearer understanding of this proposition may be obtained from the testimony of Mr. Blake, president and general superintendent of the defendant. For over 40 years, as an operator, a chief operator, an inspector of lines, and as manager, Blake has been identified with the telegraph business. His testimony stands in the record uncontradicted, as indeed it could not in its general aspect be contradicted, since it involves a lucid explanation of the philosophy of telegraphy, the method of its operation, and the effect of the contact of telegraph wires with foreign substances under certain conditions upon messages transmitted over the wires, all of which propositions are nowadays quite obvious to the average understanding. He explained:

> "Telegrams are transmitted over wires by the electromagnetic system of telegraph invented by Prof. Morse. The electricity flows on the wire and the messages are made by dots and dashes. Certain combinations of dots and dashes produce letters, and the dots and dashes are made by closing and breaking the circuit, then completing the circuit, allowing the electricity to flow through the wire and back through the ground by interrupting it, and a dot is really a short dash. In the different capacities in which I have been employed it has been my duty to ascertain matters interfering with the working of lines of telegraph. The limbs of a green tree growing from the ground up into and among the wires affect the transmission of messages by diverting a certain amount of current from the wire to the ground. A dry tree will do the same thing when wet by rain, and when a green tree is wet by rain it causes a greater escape, as we call it. That is very similar to putting a hole in a water pipe that you are putting water through. A small hole has very little effect. The larger the hole the more water escapes and the less the force at the end of the pipe. The same thing applies to electricity; if it leaks off the line, you lose the strength, and that strength is required to operate the telegraph instrument. Where the telegraph is employed for business purposes, you can't work the wires safely where trees are among them. Sometimes you can't work them at all, but never safely if there are any limbs touching the wires. If a limb were lying against the wire solidly, it would interrupt the signal on the wire so that the current would not pass through to the far end of the wire and produce a signal. If the wind was blowing the limb against the wire, making an intermittent escape, it would mutilate the signals. We have had cases where telegrams were sent from San Francisco to New York where a very plain word appears on the tape in San Francisco and a totally different word appears in New York. Something hit the wire and mutilated the signals and made a complete change. We have three claims for damages we have traced to that very thing."

As to the cutting of the trees, the plaintiff called as a witness E. P. Heller, the line repairer and "trouble man" of the defendant in Woodland in August, 1911. Heller did the cutting and trimming complained of by the plaintiffs. After testifying on direct examination that he trimmed the trees and severed therefrom a certain number of branches, he was turned over for cross-examination, and testified:

> "I trimmed out the new growth that had been formed on the trees since they had been trimmed the last time; that is, the suckers and the new growth that had formed on these limbs since the previous trimming. This new growth was merely limbs that had grown out from the stubs where they had been cut off previously; in other words, it is what is commonly known as suckers that sprang out from around the top of the old stubs. I don't think these stubs would exceed two or three inches in diameter. The suckers had formed around where the limbs had been cut off previously, forming a little bush at the top and just immediately under that edge and probably two or three or four inches down. We cut it off like that (indicating) and let it down to make a clean job of it. With reference to the wires of the telegraph company, we trimmed the trees just enough to clear them well under the wires and to get them away from the wires enough not to cause trouble. [Italics ours.] I did not use an axe. I never trim a tree with an axe."

The witness Hutchinson, testifying for the plaintiff, declared that he saw Heller and his assistants cutting the branches, and that the work was, he thought, done with a hatchet, although he subsequently stated that he looked at the severed branches or limbs the morning following the day they were removed from the trees, and that the larger limbs had the appearance of having been "sawed off." This same witness further testified that:

> "The size of the big limbs sawed off were from as big as my thumb up to three inches. * * * There was a place cut out through the trees that looked four or five feet wide. That left the big limbs coming up on either side."

The witness Keehn stated:

> That he was "called in by Mr. Altpeter after the cutting of these trees. I measured up the size of the limbs that were cut. They averaged all the way from 1 to 1½ inches. The stubs are still on the trees and can be measured up if desired. I couldn't tell exactly how many limbs were cut. I should judge all the way from five to six branches on each tree, mostly out of the center of the tree. The brush on the ground after it was cut would make a good sized wagonload, I should judge. The trees were black walnut, about 18 or 20 years old. Some of these cuttings were on an average of about 10 or 12 feet below the cross-arm."

The witness Murray, for the plaintiffs, testified that:

> "The tops were cut out of the trees, leaving the wires six or eight feet from the points where the limbs were taken from the trees."

Mrs. Altpeter, one of the plaintiffs, testified:

> That the trees were in the month of August, 1911, "terribly disfigured by cutting them off right straight at the top. They have no shade at the top. * * * We had no trees trimmed at that time and gave no permission to any one to trim them. * * * I did not see any of the branches that were cut off. The main limbs of the trees were cut. I don't know how big the limbs were that were cut off, but they were the main limbs, the center limbs, I would call it."

[6] The foregoing comprehends substantially a statement of all the testimony presented by the plaintiffs upon the question as to the cutting or trimming of the trees. The burden was upon the plaintiffs to show that either it was entirely unnecessary to remove any branches or limbs from the trees for the purpose claimed by the defendant or that the latter removed more limbs and branches than the situation with respect to its wires called for.

[7] This burden they wholly failed to sustain. Heller was the only witness who gave any testimony upon this question, and he declared, as will be observed, that only so much and such parts of the trees were trimmed and cut as were necessary to prevent collision between the wires and the branches —a collision or contact which would have caused such interference with the transmission of messages over the wires as would necessarily have destroyed that efficient service which the defendant, as a telegraph corporation, owes to the public, and the failure to furnish which may subject it to the severest penalties in one form or another. This was one of the vital questions of fact in the case. Indeed, it constituted the very foundation of plaintiffs' right to a recovery; for obviously, since the defendant, as a public service corporation, is, as above explained, charged with the duty of so maintaining its wires as to facilitate the proper and efficient performance of its obligations to the public, it is necessarily its duty to remove from any point along the route over which it has been granted the right, either by the public authorities or by judgments in condemnation or by agreements with private individuals, to run and maintain its lines, any obstruction interfering with the safe and proper transmission of messages. As has been shown, it had the lawful authority (Code Civ. Proc. § 733) to cut or trim limbs and branches from the trees in question, if necessary for a safe and proper transmission of messages over its wires passing through and in said trees. Therefore the number of the branches or limbs removed, whether large or small, or the size of the limbs or branches so removed, whether large or small, or what influence and to what extent, if any, the severance of the limbs and branches from the trees exerted in depreciating the value of the property in front of which the trees stand and grow, constitute facts which become wholly immaterial and unimportant unless it be shown that the defendant unnecessarily stripped the trees of certain of their branches and limbs or destroyed more branches and limbs than the necessities of the situation actually required. In this case, whatever may be the extent and effect of the damage the cutting and trimming of the limbs and branches of the trees might have had on the property of the plaintiffs, it having been shown by the evidence without conflict that such cutting and trimming were necessary to the safe and proper operation of the defendant's wires as transmitters of messages, the damage so inflicted is damnum absque injuria, and therefore can form no basis for a recovery by the plaintiffs.

The defendant has presented and argued other points in impeachment of the judgment, but, in view of the conclusion above announced, they need not be considered.

For the reasons above explained, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Nellie Turton and another against C. G. Shinn and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Shinn appeals. Affirmed.

Shinn & Shinn, of Sacramento, for appellant. White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is against defendants as guarantors of a certain lease executed by plaintiffs as lessors and the Morgan Shoe Company, a corporation, as lessees, the premises being situated at No. 801 K street, in the city of Sacramento. The guaranty reads as follows:

"In consideration of the foregoing lease or agreement, and one dollar to me paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, we do hereby covenant, promise and agree, to and with the said Nellie Turton and Kate Turton that the said Morgan Shoe Company, a corporation, shall well and truly pay all rents and perform and execute all the covenants therein contained on its part, and that on its failure to do so in any particular will on demand pay unto said Nellie Turton and Kate Turton all rents or damages that may happen or occur by reason of such failure, not exceeding the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and immediate notice of default is hereby expressly waived.

"Dated and signed on this 29th day of September, 1913. C. G. Shinn.
"H. S. Baxter-Hooper.
"Dave Ahern.

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of A. L. Shinn, A. B. Erway, H. F. De Back."

The complaint is verified.

Answering the complaint, defendant Shinn denied that he, together with the other alleged guarantors, "subscribed or delivered to the plaintiffs an agreement guaranteeing the payment of all or any rents or damages that might happen or occur by reason of the failure of the Morgan Shoe Company to pay the said rent," etc.; averred that defendant affixed his signature to said instrument, and it "was thereupon presented by the Morgan Shoe Company to plaintiff for acceptance"; that plaintiff refused to accept defendant as guarantor, and defendant was forthwith notified by said company of said refusal; that said company "thereafter obtained the signatures of said Hooper and Ahern to said instrument as the guarantors of the rents and damages as aforesaid; that plaintiffs accepted the said Hooper and Ahern as the only guarantors of said rents and damages, and plaintiffs ever since said acceptance have treated with the said Hooper and Ahern as the only guarantors of the said rents and damages"; denied that plaintiffs ever notified him of the company's default in the payment of said rents, or ever demanded from defendant the payment thereof. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiffs had judgment for $1,500 and costs of suit, taxes at $20. Defendant Shinn appeals.

It is not necessary to state the terms of the lease, as no question arises concerning its purport. The lessee, Morgan Shoe Company, became insolvent and defaulted in payment of rentals in an amount in excess of $1,500. Hence the action against the guarantors.

Appellant specifies the following particulars wherein he claims the evidence to be insufficient to justify the decision of the court:

"(1) The evidence is insufficient to justify the portion of finding No. V, viz.: 'That proof of such demand upon defendant, C. G. Shinn, was neither required nor necessary.' The contract of guaranty expressly provides that demand must be made. (2) There is no evidence to justify that portion of finding VII, viz.: 'That the averments in the answer of defendant C. G. Shinn, and each of them, is not true.' He avers that his offer to guarantee was not accepted by plaintiffs. The evidence of plaintiffs' agent, Frank Hickman, shows that the offer was conditionally accepted, and that defendant never assented to the condition thus imposed."

The lease was prepared by Frank Hickman, a real estate and insurance agent, acting in the matter as plaintiffs' agent. He testified:

That he secured the Morgan Shoe Company as tenant of the premises; that the Morgan Shoe Company obtained the signatures of the guarantors and as executed by that company with the guaranty signed by the three parties the lease was presented to him and signed by plaintiffs. "Q. State the circumstances concerning the signatures of the guarantors. A. The best of my recollection, they brought the lease in with the name of Shinn. I told them that was not sufficient; then followed with Mr. Hooper—I did not know Hooper—and made the same objections. They finally brought in Mr. Ahern's name, then I told him I thought the three of them would be satisfactory. We accepted the lease."

He testified to the occupancy by the Morgan Shoe Company; its bankruptcy later; the amount of rentals paid and still unpaid, etc., as to which no question arises. On cross-examination he testified:

"By Mr. Carl Shinn: Q. Do you recall who presented the lease wth the signature of C. G. Shinn attached? A. One of the men of the Morgan Shoe Company. Q. That was Mr. Tom Finlayson, was it not? A. I think so. Q. What did you tell him? A. I told him that I did not know Shinn. I would like to have additional bondsmen—additional security on the lease. Q. Did you ever communicate with Mr. Shinn in reference to obtaining other signatures? A. No, sir. Q. You never communicated with him in any respects regarding the guaranty? A. No, sir. Q. All your dealings occurred with the Morgan Shoe Company? A. Yes, sir. Q. He never expressed his assent to that arrangement stated by you for other signatures? A. I do not think I had any conversation with Mr. Shinn whatever. Q. All you know is you objected to his signature for the reason that it was not sufficient? A. I simply asked for additional security on the lease. I did not object to the signatures; no, sir. Q. You refused to accept that signature, however? A. No, sir; I did not refuse to accept any signature on the lease—merely asked for additional security, in addition to Mr. Shinn and Mr. Hooper. Q. You made a conditional acceptance at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Plaintiffs had nothing to do with the execution of the lease or the guarantors on it; you attended to all that entirely? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did Mr. Finlayson say to you when he returned with the lease signed by the three parties? A. I could not tell you. Q. There has never been any understanding between you and Mr. C. G. Shinn in reference to that guaranty? A. No, sir. Q. Of any kind? A. No, sir. Mr. Shinn: That is all."

Defendant Shinn testified as follows:

> "Q. State briefly what connection you had with the lease. A. I had acknowledged the signatures of the Morgan Shoe Company. Mr. Finlayson asked me if I would go on the bond. I told him yes, if it would help him; so he took it away.
> "The Court: Was Mr. Finlayson one of the firm? A. One of the members of the Morgan Shoe Company.
> "Mr. Carl Shinn: Q. You say Mr. Tom Finlayson was negotiating the lease and guaranty in behalf of the Morgan Shoe Company? A. Yes. Q. Is Mr. Tom Finlayson now living? A. No, sir; he died about three months ago."

The remaining questions put to this witness called for conversations later between Finlayson and the witness and were objected to and not answered.

The foregoing is substantially all of the evidence bearing upon the findings objected to.

[1] Appellant's defense is that plaintiffs refused to accept him as a guarantor and accepted Hooper and Ahern as the only guarantors. Niles v. Hancock, 14 Cal. 161, and other like cases are cited, in which it was held that:

> "Where an offer has once been rejected, the party rejecting cannot afterwards, at his option, accept the rejected offer, and thus convert the same into an agreement by acceptance."

The evidence does not warrant the application of this principle. The case here is quite different from the cases cited. Appellant signed the guaranty, as he testified, at the request of the Morgan Shoe Company—not at plaintiffs' request. He testified:

> "Mr. Finlayson asked me if I would go on the bond. I told him yes, if it would help him; so he took it away."

He did not testify, and there was no evidence, that appellant attached any condition to his guaranty, nor was any conditional offer communicated to plaintiffs. Neither was there any evidence that plaintiffs refused to accept him as a guarantor, nor that plaintiffs offered to accept him as a surety on terms different from those found in the written instrument executed by appellant. The instrument seems to have been drawn in contemplation of being signed by more than one person, for its language is, "We do hereby covenant," etc. There is an entire failure of proof in support of appellant's answer, and hence the finding that its "averments are not true" was justified.

The court made the following findings:

> "That no proof of service of demands of said rentals upon defendants C. G. Shinn and H. S. Baxter-Hooper was offered; that it appears from the verified answers of said defendants last named that such demand would have been idle, needless, and useless; that defendant C. G. Shinn in his answer denied the execution and delivery to plaintiffs of said hereinbefore mentioned agreement, and alleged that plaintiffs refused to accept him as guarantor of the rents or damages, and that plaintiffs accepted the said Hooper and Ahern as the only guarantors of said rents and damages; * * * that said last-named defendants denied the relationship existing between them and plaintiffs by reason of the execution and delivery by them of said contract and the liabilities and consequences arising therefrom; that proof of such demand upon defendants Shinn and Hooper was neither required nor necessary."

[2] It is contended that:

> "It is within the power of a guarantor to make his obligation dependent upon notice, demand, or any other condition he deems proper for his own protection and safety"; that his liability cannot be extended beyond the terms of his contract.

This view of the law may not be questioned. But "the law neither does nor requires idle acts" (section 3532, Civ. Code); and the courts frequently resort to this maxim in dealing with the contractual relations of men. A failure to observe a precedent condition is not always and under all circumstances fatal to recovery. This is very well shown in Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 614, 622:

> "It is a familiar rule that where the relations between the parties are such that a demand and refusal is a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, a denial in the answer of the relation on which the action is founded will dispense with the necessity of an averment in the complaint of a previous demand and refusal. In an action by a landlord against his tenant, or by a vendor against his vendee for the possession, or by a cestui que trust against the trustees to enforce the trust, if a demand and refusal were otherwise necessary, a denial in the answer that the alleged relation exists between the parties will dispense with the necessity of averring or proving a prior demand and refusal. The law does not require a useless act to be performed; and, when it is plain from the answer that if a demand had been made it would have been refused, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to object that no demand was made."

This case has been many times cited and with approval. In his verified answer appellant not only denied any liability, but denied the relationship in which he placed himself towards plaintiffs by the instrument sued upon. It seems to us quite apparent that a demand of payment before commencing the action would have been fruitless and unavailing, and hence was unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

In an action by the State Reclamation Board to abate as a nuisance diversion of waters into San Joaquin river, under St. 1913, p. 252, § 12, declaring that diversion of waters that will increase the flow of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers is a public nuisance which may be prevented or abated by the reclamation board, where the allegations in the complaint are comprehensive enough and injunctive relief is asked for, it may be awarded where it accomplishes purposes of abatement.

An action to abate as a public nuisance diversion of water contrary to St. 1913, p. 252, § 12, declaring diversion of water that will increase flow of Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers a public nuisance, where it involves injuries to real property, must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by V. S. McClatchy and others, as members of the State Reclamation Board, against the Laguna Lands, Limited, L. A. Nares, Summit Lake Investment Company, and others. From an order denying a motion of the defendants named for a change of place of trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Short & Sutherland and H. P. Brown, all of Fresno, for appellants. C. H. Oatman and Geo. O. Perry, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying appellants' motion for a change of the place of trial from San Joaquin county to Fresno county.

The action is for the abatement of an alleged public nuisance and for an order restraining the defendants from doing any of the acts mentioned in the complaint, and is brought under the provisions of an act of the Legislature in effect August 10, 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 252. The act provides for the creation of a drainage district to be known as Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage District, describing its boundaries, the appointing of a reclamation board for the management and control of said district, defining the powers and duties of the reclamation board, and for the prevention of the diversion of the waters of any stream into the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. Section 12 of the act declares that the board shall have power "to maintain actions to restrain the diversion of the waters of any stream that will increase the flow of water in said Sacramento or San Joaquin rivers or their tributaries, and such diversion of the waters of any stream into the said rivers or any of their tributaries is hereby declared to be a public nuisance which may be prevented or abated by the reclamation board." Section 7 of the act of 1913 declares that:

> "The state of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest in having erected, maintained and protected on the banks of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and the by-passes and overflow channels mentioned herein, good and sufficient levees and embankments or other works of reclamation, adequately protecting the lands overflowed by said streams, and confining the waters of said rivers * * * within their respective channels" —and it is made the duty of the reclamation board to enforce the erection, maintenance and protection of such levees, etc.

It appears from the verified complaint that Kings river and the San Joaquin river have their source on the easterly slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, the San Joaquin river rising near the northeasterly portion of Fresno county, taking a westerly course and generally parallel with Kings river, which latter river is about 35 miles distant and south from San Joaquin river; that these rivers reach a designated point somewhere near the boundary line dividing Kings county from Fresno county, where, when unobstructed, the natural flow of Kings river diverges to the south, and has not naturally flowed into or become a part of the San Joaquin, and empties into Tulare Lake, while the San Joaquin river turns northerly, passing through the San Joaquin Valley in the counties of Fresno, Madera, Merced, Stanislaus, San Joaquin and Contra Costa, where it empties into Suisun Bay, an arm of San Francisco Bay. The complaint sets forth with much particularity that the defendants are engaged in efforts to turn the waters of Kings river in a northerly direction in the vicinity where the two rivers take opposite directions naturally, and have been engaged in the construction of artificial works for the purpose of forcing the water out of the natural channel of Kings river in a northerly direction and towards the San Joaquin river; that by these works defendants turned out said Kings river water to a point whence it could readily be turned into the San Joaquin river, and that defendants then constructed what is designated "the new channel," which furnished the means for the water to force its way to the San Joaquin river. The character of the soil through which this new channel is constructed is described as easily eroded, widened, and deepened by the action of the water, and has been since its construction so widened and deepened as to increase its carrying capacity until it is now capable of carrying from the watershed and slope of Kings river and into the watershed and slope of said San Joaquin river nearly all the high waters of said Kings river, and by such processes of erosion and enlarging, if it shall be permitted to continue to carry such waters of Kings river, within one or two years, it will be so enlarged as to divert all of the high and flood waters of Kings river and pass the entire flow thereof into said San Joaquin river; that the natural course of the San Joaquin river, as it continues to flow from the point where the waters of said Kings river are so mingled with it, is through the central portion of San Joaquin Valley in a northwest direction until it mingles with the water of Suisun Bay, and is through a low-lying country; that the natural floods of the San Joaquin river and its tributaries have, from time to time, flowed out over the banks of the river and over said low-lying lands, and inundated, within the natural flood planes of the river, upwards of 623,356 acres of such lands; that of these lands 300,000 acres have been sufficiently reclaimed by artificial works to be cultivated to crops and occupied for farms and homes, and approximately 300,000 acres additional are capable of being reclaimed by the erection of works within the jurisdiction of the plaintiff in this action; that the waters of Kings river which have been diverted therefrom by reason of said dams and other obstructions heretofore described as having been erected and maintained by defendants, "added to the natural high-water plane of said San Joaquin river, have so increased, and will, unless said works are abated, continue to increase, the water plane of said San Joaquin river at high water, that it has impaired, and, unless said works and diversions are abated, will continue to impair and destroy, a great portion of the reclamation work along said San Joaquin river, and has made, and will continue to make, it more difficult and expensive to reclaim the unreclaimed portions of land along said San Joaquin river, as hereinbefore described"; that if said dams, embankments, and channels mentioned in the complaint are not abated, all of the flood or high waters of said Kings river will be diverted and turned into the San Joaquin river to the extent of 25,000 cubic second feet to 35,000 cubic second feet of water; that with the average velocity of said San Joaquin river between the point where said waters have been and will be commingled and the outlet of said San Joaquin river at four feet per second, and the average width of the San Joaquin river of from 500 to 750 feet, if the added waters of Kings river are permitted to flow through the San Joaquin river and confined to the width of the natural channel of the river, it will result in raising the water surface of San Joaquin river from 8 to 15 feet in elevation.

The prayer of the complaint is for judgment that "said dams, obstructions, embankments, and channels so erected, constructed, and maintained by said defendants be decreed to be and constitute a public nuisance, or public nuisances," and that defendants be required to abate the same, "and that said defendants, and each of them, be enjoined and restrained from the doing of any act or thing that may be injurious to any of the works necessary to control the flood waters of said San Joaquin river, or interfere with the successful execution of any plan of said state reclamation board which may be adopted for the control of such flood waters, and that they, and each of them, be forever enjoined and restrained from the diversion of any of the waters of said Kings river that will increase the flow of said San Joaquin river, * * * and for such other and further relief as may be conformable to equity."

At the hearing defendants submitted two affidavits in support of the motion. L. A. Nares deposed that he is familiar with the obstructions mentioned in the complaint, and also with the water measurements of the San Joaquin river and the various reports of the general government covering a period of years commencing prior to the construction of said obstructions; that the said reports "show that the flood waters of Kings river * * * have not, even during periods of highest known water on said Kings river, increased the water plane of the San Joaquin river at high water on said San Joaquin river"; that said reports show that the natural period of high water on the San Joaquin river at or near the southerly boundary of San Joaquin county, caused by water in said river from streams other than Kings river, "occurs much earlier in point of time than the natural period of high water at said point caused by water from said Kings river, and that in each season for many years last past, when the crest of the flood waters from the Kings river has reached the southerly boundary of said San Joaquin county, the flood waters reaching said point from streams other than the Kings river have already passed down said San Joaquin river, and the water plane of said San Joaquin river at said point has invariably fallen so far below high-water mark at said point that the flood waters from said Kings river, diverted as set forth in said complaint, have never raised the water plane of the said San Joaquin river to the high-water mark of said river at said point"; that all the said obstructions are situated in Kings county. Affiant appends to his affidavit an excerpt from a report made by the engineer of the reclamation board concerning the unusually high flood of 1914, which, it is contended, corroborates affiant's statement as to the San Joaquin river clearing itself before the flood waters of the Kings river reach the southern boundary of San Joaquin county.

I. Teilman deposed that he is familiar with said obstructions, and that they are situated in Kings county near the southerly boundary of Fresno county; "that the waters of the Kings river, which flow north and empty into the San Joaquin river flow in natural channels, known as Fish slough, sometimes called Fresno slough; that said natural channels flow in a general westerly and northwesterly direction in said Fresno county, and empty into said San Joaquin river in said county; that such water of the Kings river as is diverted, if any, by the dams, obstructions, embankments, excavations, and channels described in the complaint on file herein passes immediately into Fresno county and into the slough above described, and that if any damage is caused by the flood waters of Kings river passing into said slough, it is caused solely and only to real property situated in the said county of Fresno."

[1-3] While the gravamen of the action may be for the abatement of the obstructions referred to in the complaint, the averments therein are comprehensive enough to involve the question of plaintiffs' right to an injunction to prevent the threatened injury, and the prayer of the complaint seeks injunctive relief as well as the abatement of the alleged nuisance. The court said, in People v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co., 163 Cal. 84, 90, 124 Pac. 692, 695 [Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267]:

> "While it is undoubtedly true that, strictly considered, the words 'abate' and 'enjoin' have technically different meanings (Ruff v. Phillips, 50 Ga. 133) in California, the rule is well established that in proper cases injunctive relief, which accomplishes the purposes of abatement without its harsh features, is permissible."

We do not think the merits of the action can be tried on affidavits. For the purposes of the motion defendants concede "that the allegations of the complaint are true." However, in whatever aspect the action be viewed, it involves injuries to real property, and must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated. Code Civ. Proc. § 392; People v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co., 163 Cal. 84, 124 Pac. 692, 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267. Where the erection of a dam in one county which when complete would cause damage to real property in another county, because of the diversion of waters, the action should be tried in the latter county (Drinkhouse v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 80 Cal. 309, 22 Pac. 252; Last Chance Water Ditch Co. v. Emigrant Ditch Co., 129 Cal. 277, 61 Pac. 960); and the rule applies to threatened injuries. It was held, in City of Marysville v. North Bloomfield Gravel M. Co., 66 Cal. 343, 5 Pac. 507, that actions to enjoin hydraulic mining in this state could be maintained in any county along the river carrying the mines' tailings, where the damage accrued. The question is discussed in Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Fatjo, 9 Cal. App. 318, 99 Pac. 393, and the cases cited.

The purport of Mr. Nares' affidavit is that past observation has shown that the flood crest on Kings river has not reached the San Joaquin river when the flood crest was on the latter river. Whether the alleged dams, channels, and obstructions erected by defendants to turn the flood waters into the San Joaquin river will have the effect alleged in the complaint is one of the vital issues in the case, and neither Mr. Nares nor Mr. Teilman deposed to that question. Neither of these affiants showed that there was any injury to real property in Fresno county. Mr. Teilman's statement was that the waters that are caused to flow north "and empty into San Joaquin river" flow through Fish or Fresno slough, and that if any damage is caused by the water "passing into said slough," it is caused solely and only to real property in Fresno county. Mr. Teilman is silent as to the effect of the water after it has passed through Fresno slough into the San Joaquin river.

Appellants claim that:

> "There is no allegation in the complaint as to the location of any particular lands which might be injured because of the increased flow of water in the San Joaquin river caused by such diversion. Although the action was brought in the county of San Joaquin, the complaint is silent as to whether or not any of the lands affected or to be affected by such diversion are situated in San Joaquin county."

It is urged also that there is nothing in the complaint to show that there is at the present time, by reason of the maintenance of said obstruction, any present interference with the rights or enjoyment of property situated in San Joaquin county.

> "Within reasonable limits," there is no question, says Mr. Wood, "but that the Legislature has the power to declare certain uses of property a nuisance and such use thereupon becomes a nuisance per se." 2 Wood on Nuisance, § 763.

The Legislature has, within its undoubted power, declared the acts complained of to be a public nuisance, and such acts constitute a nuisance per se. Nuisances per se are so regarded because no proof is required, beyond the actual fact of their existence, to establish the nuisance. No ill effects need be proved. 2 Wood on Nuisance, § 569. And all parties to a nuisance per se, he who creates it and he who maintains it, are responsible for its effect, without limitations of condition or time. Thornton v. Dow, 60 Wash. 622, 111 Pac. 899, 903, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 968.

Equity will interfere by injunction to prevent threatened injury, where acts which create a public nuisance are about to be committed, causing also an inevitable private and special injury to the complainant (Walker v. Shepardson, 2 Wis. 384, 60 Am. Dec. 423); and the rule applies equally where the threatened injury is to the public and the people are the complainants.

[4] We do not think it was necessary to allege that some specific subdivision or tract of land situated in San Joaquin county was injured, nor that the alleged injury was immediately present, for relief will be awarded when the danger is apparent or the mischief already done.

We think the averments of the complaint are sufficient to warrant the inference that the "low-lying lands" referred to as situated along the shores of the San Joaquin river throughout its length where it passes through the counties mentioned, including San Joaquin county, are directly threatened with the injury complained of, and that these lands are within the jurisdiction of the board of reclamation, and are made the subject of its care and protection. The scheme of reclamation contemplated by the act is of state-wide concern as well as of great importance to the territory immediately interested. The effect of the dams, channels, and other means of diversion of the water of Kings river is distinctly pointed out, and it is shown that such diversion will raise the water plane of the San Joaquin river throughout its course in the San Joaquin Valley; that from 25,000 to 30,000 cubic second feet of water will be added to the channel of the San Joaquin river, raising its water surface from 8 to 15 feet in elevation; that said obstructions have impaired, and will continue to impair and destroy, a great portion of the reclamation works along said river and have made, and will continue to make, it more difficult and expensive to reclaim portions of land along said river as in the complaint fully described.

[5] Inasmuch as the affidavits submitted with the motion fail to show injury to any lands in Fresno county, and inasmuch as we think it fairly appears that lands situated in San Joaquin county have been injured and are threatened with further injury, we think the motion was rightly denied. If, however, the complaint, or the affidavits, show injury also in Fresno county the trial may be had in either county where injury has resulted or will result. "Where the real property is situated partly in one county and partly in another, the plaintiff may select either of the counties, and the county so selected is the proper county for the trial of such action." Code Civ. Proc., sec. 392.

The order is affirmed.

DIESTELHORST v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 1604.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 10, 1917.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"SERIOUS AND WILLFUL MISCONDUCT."

"Serious and willful" misconduct means the same as willful misconduct, since any willful misconduct that leads to death or great bodily injury must necessarily be serious.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑380—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—"WILLFUL MISCONDUCT"—MINOR EMPLOYÉS.

Where a minor employed about machinery had been instructed not to oil it while in motion, but thoughtlessly, after the power had been shut off and while the machine was moving of its own momentum, oiled it, and was injured, he was not chargeable with "willful misconduct."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful Misconduct.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑405(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION — WILLFUL MISCONDUCT—MINOR EMPLOYÉS.

Evidence held to show that minor's disobedience to order was thoughtless, and not the result of willful misconduct.

Proceedings by Bert Bollinger, employé, for compensation, opposed by William Diestelhorst, employer. On application by the employer for writ of review for annulment of the award by the Industrial Accident Commission and others. Writ discharged, and award affirmed.

Dean & Carter, of Redding, and Thos. B. Dozier and Eric G. Scudder, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner seeks the annulment of an award made by said Commission to said applicant for an injury received by the latter while employed by the petitioner to act as a general helper around a gold dredger. It is claimed that the accident was due to the "willful misconduct of said Bert Bollinger, and therefore the Commission was without jurisdiction to make the award." It is admitted that if no other rational conclusion as to the attributable cause of the accident can be drawn from the evidence, then, in the exercise of its statutory authority, the court should vacate and annul said award. It is, however, the claim of respondents that there is sufficient justification for the finding that the injury was not due to the willful misconduct of the applicant, and that the Commission therefore cannot be properly chargeable with an adjudication in excess of its legal authority.

Indeed, the attack and the defense relate, not only to the evidence, but to the sufficiency of the finding itself to support the conclusion of the Commission. It is the contention of petitioner that the facts found are compatible only with the position that the applicant was guilty of willful misconduct, and that petitioner is therefore not liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

We are asked to set aside the award by reason of the following finding:

> "That previous to said injury said employé had been instructed by his employer on two occasions not to oil the said machinery while the same was in motion, and had been warned of the danger of so doing; that at the time of the injury the motive power of the machinery had been shut off, and after so shutting off the power, the machinery continues to move for 15 minutes by its own momentum, and while well knowing the said instructions and the danger of their violation, but for the purpose of saving the time necessary to wait for the machinery to stop, said employé, without waiting until the machinery had stopped, thoughtlessly and without at the time being mindful of said instructions, attempted to oil the same, and in so doing, sustained the injury as above set forth; that by reason of the extreme youth of said employé and his consequent lack of mature judgment and discretion, and for the further reason that the said act of the employé was with the sole motive and for the sole purpose of saving time, and to that extent in the interest of the employer, the act of the employé in violating his instructions as aforesaid was negligent, but was not an act of willful misconduct, and the said injury was not caused by the willful misconduct of the employé."

It is the contention of petitioner that a violation of such reasonable directions constitutes in itself willful misconduct, and that it is not condoned or mitigated by the excuse or apology contained in said finding. He claims:

> "That the cases from all jurisdictions uniformly hold that the breach of an express rule or order, particularly if made expressly for the safety of an employé, constitutes serious or willful misconduct within the meaning of Workmen's Compensation Acts."

He cites a large number of cases, beginning with Scotland. Of these, it is asserted that two are practically on all fours with the case at bar. Both involved minors, and the injuries were occasioned by disobedience of rules. The first is Powell v. Lanarkshire Steel Co., Ltd., 6 Sc. Sess. Cas. (5th Series) 1039 (1904). Therein the father of Patrick Joseph Powell, a minor, claimed compensation for the death of said minor under the Compensation Act of 1897. At the time of his death he was 15 years of age (the same as applicant herein). He was employed in a rolling mill, and was allowed certain intervals for resting. During such an interval the deceased and some other boys of about the same age, who were also employed in the mill, started to play on some wagons on an inclined track. One of the wagons started down the incline, and the deceased, in an attempt to stop it, was thrown beneath the wheels and met his death. The boys, including the deceased, had been instructed not to play about the wagons. Lord Trayner, in his decision, said:

> "The defenders had given this boy and others like him positive instructions that they were not to go across the line of rails or near the wagons. They had been repeatedly warned against doing so for fear of accident, and they knew that in doing so they were doing wrong. I cannot figure anything more serious or willful than positive and intentional disobedience to a strict and positive order. That is the character of the case, and I must hold accordingly."

The other is Fanny Callahan v. Maxwell, 2 Sc. Sess. Cas. (5th Series) 420. Therein Fanny Callahan, a young girl, was employed on a steam thresher to unbind and hand sheaves to the millman which he put through an opening into the mill. She had been instructed to remain at her place, and had been warned of the danger of moving about. The millman had occasion to go beneath the thresher to remove an obstruction, whereupon Fanny attempted to step across the opening for the purpose of speaking to another girl on the other side of the opening. In crossing the opening, her foot slipped and was caught by the revolving drum, and her right leg was taken off below the knee. One question presented to the appellate court was whether her conduct in leaving her place and attempting to step across the opening in the machine amounted to serious and willful misconduct on her part in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was held that she was so chargeable, it being stated in the opinion:

> "I do not think that there can be a more distinct case of willful misconduct than one in which a person is injured in consequence of having disobeyed a specific order, such as that given here, and which was given in order to insure her safety."

Many cases, also, from other British jurisdictions are cited, of which we may refer to Best v. London & Southwestern Railroad Company (1907), A. C. 209, 8 Ann. Cas. 1, which went to the House of Lords. In that case, an engine driver, because his train was late, left the foot plate of his engine while in motion and mounted the coal on the tender, in violation of a rule of the company that "enginemen and firemen must not leave the foot plate of their engine while the latter is in motion." He was killed by being struck by a bridge. It was claimed at the trial of the claim for compensation that the driver's object was to try and find better coal in order to make up the lost time. In the decision, the Lord Chancellor (Loreburn) said:

"This unfortunate man broke this rule, which certainly is a very serious rule. There was evidence that he knew of its existence, and that he knowingly and willfully acted in defiance of it. It was a rule to save life and to prevent danger, both to the public and to the servants of the company."

In the same decision Lord Atkinson said:

"I do not attempt to define what 'willful misconduct' is, nor to express any opinion which I might be unable to retract on further consideration, but it would appear to me, I confess, that if a man breaks a rule, knowing at the time that he is breaking it, and is not compelled to break it by some superior power which he cannot resist, he is guilty of a willful breach of it."

Coming nearer home, it is the opinion of petitioner that we have in this state two decisions that virtually govern this, that is, Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 162 Pac. 1040, and Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. In the first of these, an errand boy in the employ of a millinery company in San Francisco had been expressly warned not to ride in or attempt to operate the freight elevators in the building occupied by his employer. Notices to the same effect were also conspicuously posted near the entrances of the freight elevators. Said errand boy, upon returning from an errand, attempted to ascend by way of one of the freight elevators to the floor where his employer had his place of business, and, in so doing, to operate the elevator himself. The boy was killed, and compensation was sought for his death. The Industrial Accident Commission made findings "that the deceased and other employés of the defendant frequently operated said Fifth street elevator by themselves without reproof or discipline by said defendant," and "that the signs placed by the owners of said building upon the doors of the elevators were habitually disregarded without protest," and furthermore, "that the protection of its employés from serious bodily injury or death in connection with the operation of such elevators was not made plain to them nor to Cassell [the deceased] in a manner suited to the intelligence of a person of his age," and therefore compensation was allowed. It was decided by the District Court of Appeal for the First District that there was no evidence to support these findings, and the award was accordingly annulled. In denying the petition for rehearing the court said:

"We are of the opinion that the undisputed evidence in the case showed that the deceased had been expressly warned not to ride in, or attempt to operate, the freight elevators in the building in which he met his death, under penalty of discharge, and that notices were posted at, or near, the entrance of such elevators of similar import, and that the disregard of such warning by the employé must, in the absence of evidence mitigating such disobedience, be held to constitute such willful misconduct as would prevent a recovery before the Commission, where, as in the instant case, there is no evidence tending to show that the disregard of its warnings, orders, and notices was condoned by the employer."

In the Great Western Power Case, supra, the award by the Commission was annulled by the Supreme Court by reason of the willful misconduct of deceased, Mayfield, who had been employed as a lineman by said company. The company had issued orders that employés should not work on poles carrying live wires without using rubber gloves provided by the company. It was not shown that Mayfield did not know or understand this rule. On the day of the accident, Mayfield ascended a pole to cut a wire without taking his gloves, and he received a shock which caused his death. In discussing the meaning of the term "willful misconduct" the Supreme Court declared:

"But it cannot be doubted that a workman who violates a reasonable rule made for his own protection from serious bodily injury or death is guilty of misconduct, and that where the workman deliberately violates the rule, with knowledge of its existence and of the dangers accompanying its violation, he is guilty of willful misconduct."

It was held that the evidence showed a deliberate violation of the rule, and hence the annulment.

It must be conceded that petitioner makes a strong and persuasive argument, buttressed as it is by an imposing array of authorities. On the other hand, the contention of respondents is entitled to serious consideration. It is claimed that the defense of willful misconduct is an affirmative defense in the nature of a penal provision forfeiting compensation for willful wrongdoing, that the burden of proof is upon the employer to establish this defense, and that it was not established in the present case by reason of the failure of the employer to prove the necessary element of willfulness. In amplifying their position, respondents indulge in an interesting historical review of the common law and of the statutes culminating in the workmen's compensation acts as they relate to the redress for injuries afforded to the employé. The dissimilarity between the common-law remedy and that under the modern legislation is pointed out, and it is declared that under the system of workmen's compensation acts now adopted in California and in approximately 35 states of the Union, the industry is made to carry the cost of injuries sustained by its employés in the course of its operation, without regard to the fault of either the employer or employé. Or, as stated by the Supreme Court of Montana in Lewis & Clark County v. Industrial Acc. Board of Montana, 52 Mont. 6, 155 Pac. 268, L. R. A. 1916D, 628:

"Liability and compensation statutes cannot be grouped together, since they are the antipodes of labor legislation, having their foundation in essentially different social and economic ideas; the liability statutes being intended to limit the defenses of the master, and the compensation statutes to provide compensation for the workman regardless of negligence of master, fellow servant, or himself."

Attention is then called to a peculiar provision of the California act and of some of the other states, penalizing, so it is claimed, the employer or employé, as the case may be, for wanton and intentionally evil conduct, as provided in section 12b and section 12a (3) of our statute (Stats. 1913, p. 283), and it is claimed that this provision as to the employé was not intended as a substitute for contributory negligence, and it should not be so construed, but should be regarded in the spirit of section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, authorizing the Legislature by appropriate enactment to "create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employés for any injury [sustained] by the said employés * * * irrespective of the fault of either party." To give effect to this provision and the obvious purpose of the said Compensation Act, it is claimed that the misconduct which would defeat the right of the employé to compensation must be more than even gross contributory negligence, in fact, must be the violation of reasonable rules or the doing of an extremely hazardous act which, under the common law, would amount to a breach of the duty owed to the employer, and, in addition, must be accompanied by a willfulness of intent or wrong motive amounting to a mens rea. It is insisted that this is demanded by the language and spirit of the Compensation Act, and is supported by the decisions of this state and of other jurisdictions.

Among the decisions cited from foreign jurisdictions is Jensen v. Bowen Bros. & Co., Ct. of Abr. of New Zealand, Canterbury Ind. Dist. (1909), vol. 8, Decisions under the Workmen's Compensation for Accident Act, 49, 50, wherein it is said:

> "The question of serious and willful misconduct is one of fact to be determined on the circumstances of each case. In dealing with the question the court is not bound to treat every violation by a worker of a rule in force in the factory or works as amounting necessarily to serious and willful misconduct. Whether it is so or not depends on the nature of the rule and the circumstances in which the violation has taken place."

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the Matter of Nickerson, 218 Mass. 158, 105 N. E. 604, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 790, declared that "serious and willful misconduct," for the consequences of which the employé is not entitled to compensation, under the Workmen's Compensation Act of that state, "means more than even gross negligence, and resembles closely the wanton or reckless misconduct which renders one liable to a trespasser or to a bare licensee," and it was held that:

> "Where an employé, engaged in cleaning and painting, began work around a moving shaft shortly before noon, although he had been ordered to do that work during the noon hour, while the machinery was stopped, his disobedience was a thoughtless act on the spur of the moment, rather than deliberate disobedience, and does not deprive his dependent of compensation under [said] act."

In that case, it seems that the deceased, less than half an hour before he was killed, was told by the superintendent to do the work at the noon hour, and yet the court said:

> "The fact that the injury was occasioned by the employé's disobedience to an order is not decisive against him. To have that effect, the disobedience must have been willful, or, as was said by Lord Loreburn, in Johnson v. Marshall Sons & Co., Ltd. (1906), A. C. 409, 411, 'deliberate, not merely a thoughtless act on the spur of the moment.'"

It is asserted that the same rule is recognized by our Supreme Court in the quotation hereinbefore made from 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35, where willful misconduct is described as the deliberate violation of a reasonable rule made for the workman's benefit, where he has knowledge of its existence and of the dangers accompanying its violation.

As to the two cases from this state cited by petitioner, respondents find substantial disparity with this. It is pointed out that in the Pacific Coast Casualty Company Case the young employé was killed in the accident, and it was impossible to discover his exact mental state in violating the rule, that is, whether it was willful disobedience or the result of an inadvertence, and in the absence of testimony on that point, the court naturally, from the bare fact of disobedience, drew the inference that it was deliberate and willful. This, probably, was what the court had in mind in its opinion denying the petition for rehearing when it referred to the "absence of mitigating circumstances." Herein there is express testimony, negativing the willfulness which overcomes any inference drawn from the bare fact of disobedience.

In the Mayfield Case, supra, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35, there was not only an absence of testimony tending affirmatively to establish inadvertence, but there was, in addition, testimony that the deceased had been warned, within a few hours before his death, of the danger of not wearing gloves, which was sufficient to establish willfulness. Mayfield was, moreover, a man of mature years.

As to the cases from foreign jurisdictions cited by petitioner no specific attention is paid to them by respondents. However, the most important ones appear for the first time in the reply brief of petitioner, it being stated therein that:

> "Since receiving respondents' reply brief we have been to some trouble to look up the cases under workmen's compensation acts interpreting or defining 'willful misconduct,' and have found that most of said cases originated in the courts of Great Britain."

It would have been more satisfactory if petitioner had taken the trouble to do that before filing his opening brief. We cannot undertake to examine these cases in detail. Most of them, we may say, involved adults and accidents under circumstances leading necessarily to the conclusion that there was willful violation of reasonable rules for the safety of the workmen.

[1] Again, while some of the cases called for a consideration of "serious and willful misconduct," it is apparent that the word

"serious" added nothing to the gravity of the conduct. Any willful misconduct that leads to death or great bodily injury must necessarily be serious.

In reference to the Powell Case, from Scotland, it is apparent that the decision is based upon two grounds: First, that the accident did not arise "out of the employment" of the deceased; and, second, that he was guilty of deliberate and intentional wrongdoing when he went to a place where he had no right to be and placed himself in a dangerous position against which he had been warned.

The Fanny Callahan Case was decided upon the same grounds.

[2] In all these cases holding that the victim of the accident was chargeable with willful misconduct, it seems to have been assumed that the violation of the rule was intentional and deliberate, and, as far as we are advised, there was no attempt to excuse it on the ground of inadvertence or thoughtlessness. The violation of a rule known to the party would, of course, raise the presumption that it was done deliberately and intentionally, but is it not a disputable presumption? May not a person, although guilty of an infraction of an order given for his protection, show that at the time he was unmindful of the order, and that his act was the result of inattention and thoughtlessness and without any real purpose to be contumacious? Petitioner contends that to permit this course would open the door to fraud and perjury. In some cases, no doubt, such would be the effect, but these evils will never be entirely avoided in the attempt to administer justice through human instrumentalities. But the objection goes rather to the weight and effect of the evidence than to its admissibility. When the person violates a known rule, it should be held ordinarily that he does it deliberately, but we do not think that the door should be closed entirely against the inquiry whether it may not have been the result of thoughtlessness and inadvertence, at least in the case of a mere child. Where a minor is involved why should not the same consideration be shown as in the ordinary action for damages wherein contributory negligence is urged as a defense? Why should not the distinction be recognized that is so learnedly pointed out in the case of Maud Guyer v. Sterling Laundry Co., 171 Cal. 761, 154 Pac. 1057? Therein, as to minors, it is said:

> "Mentally, a tremendous growth must take place, * * * before knowledge has ripened into wisdom and wisdom coupled with experience, has developed a sound and sane judgment. * * * Youth is ever the time of heedlessness, of impulsiveness, and of forgetfulness. Lacking power of continuous application and concentration, it will, upon the other hand, center its thought for a brief time and to its peril upon one matter to the exclusion of all else."

With this well-known characteristic of youth in view why should it be thought a strange thing that a boy of 15 should forget an order given him, and, in a moment of forgetfulness, do that which was forbidden? And acting thus, how could his conduct be justly denominated "willful misconduct"? In that event it would be, properly speaking, willful misconduct to no greater degree than if he did the act in the absence of any order. In either case it might be, and, in this case it would be, contributory negligence but nothing more.

It is probably true, as contended, that the portion of the finding as to oiling the machinery while in motion in order to save time does not indicate a sufficient palliation or excuse for his conduct, yet it is at least opposed to the idea that he had an intentionally disobedient frame of mind, and is in aid of the conclusion that there was an absence of willfulness.

[3] Looking at the evidence, we find sufficient support for the inference that he was not intentionally and deliberately disobedient. The boy himself, when asked: "Were you aware at the time that you were violating your employer's instructions? Did you know and think at the time that you were disobeying orders?" replied: "No, sir; I didn't think." He further said that at the time he did not remember that Diestelhorst had told him not to oil the machinery while in motion. Indeed, one cannot read the record without obtaining a strong impression of the candor and honesty of the witness. He was anxious to save time, and he wanted to get out as much dirt as possible. He was in the habit of oiling right after lunch before the machinery was put in motion, but on this occasion he started it in obedience to the direction of petitioner, or, as the boy explained it:

> "We were then eating dinner, and right after dinner Diestelhorst wanted to go and fix a bridge across the creek, and there was a 'jack' out where we were dredging, and he said to move that, and I started up, and he passed the chain around it and moved it, and I shut off the power and went to oiling."

We think from these considerations that the Commission might conclude with legal propriety that the boy was not chargeable with such willful misconduct as to deprive him of the benefits of the Compensation Act and the writ is therefore discharged, and the award affirmed.

DILGER v. WHITTIER. (Civ. 1616.)

1. Highways 🔑184(2)—Injury to Pedestrian—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by a child when struck by an automobile, which was diverted from the roadway by reason of a collision with an automobile operated by defendant, evidence held to justify a finding that the injury was due solely to defendant's negligence in operating his car, and that the operator of the other car was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to plaintiff's injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 472, 473½.]

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1032(1)—Burden to Show Prejudicial Error.

It devolves upon an appellant to show prejudicial error.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑928(2)—Review—Presumptions.

Where the instructions are omitted from the record on appeal, the appellate court must presume that the jury was properly instructed as to the law applicable to the case.

4. Evidence 🔑474(8)—Speed—Knowledge of Witness.

As the objection that a witness who testified as to the speed of defendant's car had not seen the car in sufficient time prior to the collision to enable him to testify on the subject goes to the weight, rather than to the competency, of the evidence, and as such testimony differed but little from that offered by the defendant on the same subject, its admission was not error.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑1050(1)—Harmless Error.

Any error in the admission in evidence of the torn clothes of the child, and testimony as to tears and rents therein, was harmless as the evidence did not tend to show either negligence of defendant or injuries to the child.

6. New Trial 🔑88—Grounds—Discretion of Court.

As no facts were stated from which the trial court could determine what effort the sheriff had made to serve a subpœna upon two alleged material witnesses for defendant, and it was not shown that the defendant placed the subpœna in the hands of the sheriff before the trial was commenced, there was no abuse of discretion in denying a new trial upon the ground of surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Florencia Dilger, a minor, by W. J. Dilger, her guardian ad litem, against C. F. Whittier. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Rowen Irwin, of Bakersfield, and Fred L. Seybolt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff, a minor four years of age, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while playing in a vacant lot adjoining her father's place of business, as a result of being struck by an automobile driven by one Earl Oldham, which, it is claimed, was diverted from the roadway and precipitated against plaintiff by reason of colliding with another automobile negligently operated by defendant. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, for which judgment was entered in her favor, and from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Appellant's chief contention is that the verdict is not justified by the evidence, in that it fails to show that defendant was guilty of any negligence in operating his car, but, on the contrary, shows that the injury sustained was due to Oldham's negligence. Not only is the evidence touching the action of both Oldham and defendant in operating their respective cars conflicting, but the plat of the location and position of the cars used by the witnesses in testifying is not before us; hence much of the testimony is meaningless. No purpose could be served by an extended reference to the conflicting evidence. Suffice it to say, there appears to be testimony which tended to show and which, when illustrated by the plat in connection with which it was given, might, and therefore since it is not brought up we must assume that it did, clearly justify the jury in finding that the injury was due solely and alone to defendant's negligence in operating his car.

[1-3] The accident occurred in the unincorporated town of Fellows, in Kern county, through which a highway, known as the Midway road, extended north and south. The father of the plaintiff, W. J. Dilger, had a place of business on the east side of this highway, which, between the sidewalks, was some 47 feet in width. Adjoining Dilger's place of business on the north were two vacant lots, on one of which, and next to the northwest corner of her father's house, plaintiff was playing. Defendant was driving a Cadillac car on the right-hand side of this highway, going in a southerly direction at a speed of some 20 or 25 miles per hour, and Oldham, driving a Ford car, was closely following a Santa Fé car going northerly and traveling near the center of the roadway. At a point about opposite Dilger's place, defendant met the Santa Fé car, when, instead of passing it to the right, he turned to the left thereof, and when clear of the Santa Fé car met the one driven by Oldham, who, while in the rear of and close to the Santa Fé car, was nearer to the sidewalk on his right. At the time it appears that Oldham was traveling at a speed of 5 miles per hour, and, seeing defendant approaching at a high speed immediately in front of him on the wrong side of the highway, turned sharply to the right, toward the vacant lot, in an effort to escape, when defendant's car collided with the side of the Ford machine, projecting it some 15 feet, against the child on the vacant lot. Presumably the jury concluded the accident would not have occurred had defendant observed the law of the road, which required him to pass to the right of the Santa Fé car. On the other hand, Oldham, since he was operating his car slowly on the side of the street to which he was entitled, was not, as shown by the record, guilty of any negligence which contributed to plaintiff's injury. It devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show prejudicial error. Upon the record presented it cannot be said there is an absence of sufficient evidence to justify the verdict of the jury, which we must presume, in the absence of the instructions, copy of which is omitted from the record, was properly instructed as to the law applicable to the case.

[4] Basing his claim upon the fact that W. J. Dilger's view of defendant's car prior to its colliding with that of Oldham was not of sufficient length as to time as to enable him to testify upon the subject, appellant insists the court erred in permitting him to testify that it was running at a speed of 20 to 25 miles per hour. In our opinion, the objection goes to the weight rather than to the competency of the evidence, which differed little, if any, from evidence upon the same subject offered by defendant. In no event could it have affected the verdict.

[5] The court, over defendant's objection, permitted plaintiff to introduce in evidence the torn clothes of the child, and to testify as to tears and rents therein. While the evidence was immaterial, inasmuch as it did not tend to show either negligence on the part of defendant or injuries to the child, nevertheless it is impossible to conceive how defendant could have been prejudiced by the ruling. Surely the dress shown to have rents in it was not calculated to appeal to the passions of the jury to such an extent as to cause it to render a verdict for excessive damages; nor is the verdict in this case, when the child's injuries are considered, subject to such objection.

[6] One of the appellant's grounds of motion for a new trial was surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, in support of which defendant filed the affidavit of his attorney, from which it appears that at some time—whether before or pending the trial is not shown—he placed in the hands of the sheriff of Kern county for service a subpœna for Earl Oldham and one Mait Smith, both of whom, it was claimed, would give material testimony in favor of the defendant; that diligent search was made by said sheriff for said witnesses, without success. No facts are stated from which the court could determine what effort the sheriff made to serve the subpœna, and from aught that is shown to the contrary, defendant did not place the subpœna in the hands of the sheriff with instructions to serve it until the trial was commenced. It cannot be said there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying the motion upon such ground.

Finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HAMMOND v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 2205.)

1. STREET RAILROADS 🔑98(6)—ACCIDENTS ON TRACKS—DUTY TO PEDESTRIANS.

The duty of a pedestrian in crossing a city street is to use ordinary care with regard to street cars, which is the degree of care which people of ordinary prudent habits would reasonably be expected to exercise under the circumstances of a given case, and the rule governing the duty of a pedestrian about to cross a steam railroad or an interurban electric railroad in the country does not apply to city streets "in all its strictness."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 207.]

2. STREET RAILROADS 🔑114(13)—ACCIDENTS ON TRACKS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In action for damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff when hit by defendant's street car, in which negligence of defendant was established, evidence held to support a jury finding that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. TRIAL 🔑260(8)—PERSONAL INJURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

The rule stated in a requested instruction, that a person alighting from a car and intending to cross the street behind the same is charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care to look and listen for approaching cars before attempting to cross, and is charged with the duty of keeping up the exercise of ordinary care in looking and listening for approaching danger until the last moment, before passing from a place of safety to one of danger, and that the omission of such ordinary care constitutes negligence, and if thereby plaintiff contributes directly or proximately to the injury she cannot recover, was sufficiently and correctly stated in an instruction that the motorman in charge of a car has the right to assume that a pedestrian in the street is in possession of all his faculties, unless there is notice to the contrary, and will use reasonable diligence and ordinary care to avoid danger to himself, and that the failure to use such diligence and care is negligence, and that if the plaintiff negligently placed herself in a position of danger from which she was unable to escape, and the motorman of defendant's car, which struck her, used every effort in his power to avoid striking her after discovering her danger, verdict must be for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 657.]

4. Trial 🔑296(4, 5)—Personal Injury—Instructions.

An instruction that if plaintiff found herself suddenly in peril, without sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, she might be excusable for omitting some precautions in making an immediate choice under this disturbing influence, although, if her mind had been clear, she ought to have done otherwise, and that if she found herself in imminent danger just prior to and at the time of the collision, and at that time tried to escape the peril, and in thus doing acted as an ordinarily prudent and reasonable person would have acted under the same or similar circumstances, the jury could not find on this account that she was guilty of contributory negligence, did not purport to say that a person in sudden peril by his own negligence is relieved from the imputation of contributory negligence, but only stated the principle that an unwise choice under such peril is not of itself contributory negligence, when considered with instructions that if the plaintiff had failed to use such care that a person of ordinary prudence would have used under the same or similar circumstances, and such failure contributed proximately caused the injury, plaintiff could not recover, and an instruction that all of the instructions ought to be considered as a whole in arriving at the verdict.

5. Trial 🔑295(1)—Instructions.

It is the duty of the jury to consider all of the instructions given as a whole in arriving at the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703, 704, 713, 714, 717.]

6. Street Railroads 🔑102(2) — Injury to Pedestrians—Contributory Negligence—Proximate Cause.

The mere fact that plaintiff was careless and negligent is not of itself sufficient to excuse the defendant, if such carelessness is remote in the chain of causation and did not contribute proximately to the cause of the injury.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑1066 — Review — Prejudicial Error.

Although an instruction that the mere fact that plaintiff was negligent did not excuse defendant's negligence, if plaintiff's negligence was remote and did not contribute proximately to the injury was irrelevant, it was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Trial, Cent. Dig. § 558.]

8. Street Railroads 🔑118(11)—Action for Injury—Instructions.

An instruction that if plaintiff, at the time of the accident, may or may not have been guilty of such contributory negligence as under the instructions of the court relieved the defendant of liability, which otherwise would have attached, before the jury could find for defendant it must appear by the preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to excuse the defendant, which must appear from satisfactory evidence or such inferences as the jury may legally draw from the evidence, that the jury must not speculate or guess, but their minds must be convinced, does not state the doctrine of comparative negligence, but only requires that it be established that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to excuse defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by Leah Hammond against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant. W. O. Morton, Harry A. Hollzer, T. A. Williams, and C. B. Morton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff, who was hit by a car of the defendant while she was crossing a street in the city of Pasadena. Fair Oaks avenue runs north and south, and is intersected by California street. The defendant has a double-track railroad on each of those streets. Its interurban cars run on Fair Oaks avenue, and some of its north-bound cars turn east on California street at that intersection. Some of its local cars run westerly on California street from Fair Oaks avenue. The plaintiff was a passenger coming from Los Angeles, and as such passenger she received a transfer entitling her to go west on a California Street car. The northbound two-car train from Los Angeles, on which she was a passenger, stopped at California street, and then turned east on that street. The plaintiff alighted from the rear car of the train at a point about 100 feet south of California street. A West California Street car was waiting on the west side of Fair Oaks avenue to receive passengers. This was at 6 o'clock in the evening on January 29, 1912. When she alighted from the steps of her car on the east side thereof, she looked north and saw some of the passengers at the front of the train, who were moving around the front of the train to go to the California Street car. The plaintiff looked south, and then crossed the track at the rear of her train, and started to cross the westerly or south-bound track to go to the California Street car. In so doing she did not look to the north, and did not either see or hear an approaching south-bound car which was coming toward her at the rate of about 12 miles per hour. The car was so close to her that, after coming into the place of danger, she was unable to escape, and the motorman was unable to stop the train in time to avoid striking the plaintiff.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant was negligent, in that it was moving its train at an excessive and dangerous rate of speed, and in that no warning or signal was given by which she could be notified of the approach of the car. Although there is some conflict in the evidence, there is sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding of negligence on the part of the defendant, and we shall assume that such negligence was duly established. The defendant, in addition to denying its own negligence, pleaded that the plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care to avoid being injured, and that her injuries were directly and proximately contributed to and caused by her own negligence. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, as well as from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] On behalf of appellant it is insisted that the evidence proves, without conflict, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence directly causing her injury, since it is admitted by her own testimony and shown by all of the evidence in the case that she passed over from the north-bound track to the south-bound track without looking northward to see whether any car was approaching. In order to sustain this contention it would be necessary to hold, as matter of law, that under the circumstances stated the plaintiff was negligent in failing to look to the north before she moved into the place of danger. Whatever might be said as to the rule governing the duty of a pedestrian about to cross a steam railroad or an interurban electric railroad in the country, it does not apply "in all its strictness" as against pedestrians in crossing a city street. Under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff was required to use ordinary care, and that is the degree of care which people of ordinary prudent habits could reasonably be expected to exercise under the circumstances of a given case. We may say here, as was said in Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. 553, 567, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203, that considering all the evidence and circumstances in the case at bar, we cannot say that the jury abused its power in holding that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence. To same effect see Arbunich v. United Railroads, 28 Cal. App. 291, 294, 152 Pac. 51.

[3] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by the defendant as follows:

> "A person alighting from a car as the plaintiff did in this case, and intending to proceed across the street behind the same, is charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care in looking and listening for approaching cars, before proceeding to attempt the crossing, and is charged likewise with the duty of keeping up the exercise of ordinary care in looking and listening for approaching danger, until the last moment before passing from a place of safety to one of danger. The omission of such ordinary care constitutes negligence and if thereby a plaintiff contributes directly or proximately to the injury ensuing, she cannot recover."

This instruction might well have been given, as it is a correct statement of the law. We find, however, that in other instructions the same rule was correctly stated in sufficiently definite terms. The jury was told that the motorman in charge of a car has the right to assume that a pedestrian on the street is in possession of all his faculties, unless there is notice to the contrary, and will use reasonable diligence and ordinary care to avoid danger to himself, and that the failure to use such diligence and care is negligence. They were also instructed:

> "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff negligently placed herself in a position of danger from which she was unable to escape, and that the motorman of defendant's car which came in contact with her, used every effort in his power to avoid striking her after discovering her danger, then your verdict must be in favor of defendant."

In Arbunich v. United Railroads, supra, the appellant complained that the court erred in modifying the following instruction requested by the defendant:

> "In cases of this character the correct rule of law is that one riding or walking along or across the tracks of a street railroad company must use reasonable care in the exercise of his faculties of sight or hearing to watch or listen for cars going in either direction."

The court gave that instruction in the following modified form:

> "In cases of this character the correct rule of law is that one riding or walking along or across the tracks of a street railroad company must use reasonable care and precautions for his own safety."

Discussing this matter, the District Court of Appeal of the First District said:

> "It must be conceded that the cases cited by the appellant in support of the correctness as a matter of law of the foregoing instruction in the form requested by it sustain its contention in that regard, and that, had the court refused to give said instruction or one similar to it in effect, its action in so refusing would have been reversible error; but, in our opinion, the court gave in substance and effect, although not in its requested detail, the defendant's instruction, and that the language of the court, requiring persons walking across the tracks of a street railway to use reasonable care and precautions for their own safety, would suggest to the minds of the jurors as reasonable men that such care and precaution would naturally consist in the exercise of their faculties of sight and hearing."

The Supreme Court denied a rehearing in that case.

[4, 5] Error is predicated upon instructions 19, 25, and a part of 24, as given by the court to the jury. No. 19 is as follows:

> "In judging the conduct of the plaintiff, you must view the situation as it appeared to her just prior to or at the time of the accident. If she found herself suddenly put into peril, without having sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, then she might be excusable for omitting some precautions or taking an immediate choice under this disturbing influence, although, if her mind had been clear, she ought to have done otherwise. If she found herself in imminent danger just prior to and at the time of the collision, and at that time, tried to escape the peril, and in thus doing acted as an ordinarily prudent and reasonable person would have acted under the same or similar circumstances and conditions, then you cannot find on this account that she was guilty of contributory negligence. As the court has instructed you, negligence is commensurate with the circumstances under investigation."

No. 25 is as follows:

> "If the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, may or may not have been guilty of such contributory negligence, as under the instructions of the court would relieve the defendant from any liability which otherwise would have attached, then before you can find for the defendant it must appear further by a preponderance of the evidence plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to excuse the defendant. This must appear to you from satisfactory evidence, or such inferences as you may legally draw from the evidence, and you must not speculate or guess, for your minds must be convinced."

The objection urged against instruction 19 is that it presented to the jury an irrelevant suggestion, and omitted to point out that, if the plaintiff's own negligence had placed her in a position of imminent danger, then the jury might find that she was guilty of contributory negligence, even though the exercise of ordinary prudence in her efforts to escape could not then avail to save her from injury.

Appellant directs attention to the fact that the case of Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 483, 490, 66 Pac. 734, where the rule stated in instruction No. 25 was declared, was a case in which it appeared that the plaintiff's presence on the tracks was caused by reason of perturbation and panic induced by the negligence of the defendant, and not by his own negligence. There is force in the distinction thus pointed out by appellant. It is true, however, as suggested by counsel for respondent, that the instruction did not purport to say that a person in sudden peril by his own negligence is relieved from the imputation of contributory negligence, but only stated the principle that an unwise choice under such peril is not of itself contributory negligence, as the court said that the jury could not "on this account" find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. While the phraseology, standing alone, may be obscure, we think that respondent's explanation of it is supported by other instructions given to the jury, and which must be considered in connection with the instruction in question. The court very properly stated to the jury:

"You are not to take any one part of these instructions as expressing all the law, but are to consider the whole thereof in arriving at your verdict."

And they were instructed that if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff had failed to use such care as a person of ordinary prudence would have used under the same or similar circumstances as those then under investigation, and that such failure contributed proximately to or proximately caused the injury complained of, then plaintiff could not recover.

[6, 7] There was no error in adding to this statement the last sentence of instruction No. 24, of which the defendant complains, and which is as follows:

"The mere fact that the plaintiff may have been careless and negligent is not of itself sufficient to excuse the defendant, if you find that her carelessness or negligence is remote in the chain of causation, and did not contribute proximately to cause the injury."

It may be, as suggested by appellant, that the quoted sentence was irrelevant under the evidence presented; but as a proposition of law the statement was correct, and we cannot see that it was likely to affect the verdict.

[8] The additional objection urged against instruction 25 is that it suggests the idea of degrees of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and the thought that plaintiff might be guilty of some contributory negligence, and yet not of such contributory negligence as to excuse the defendant; that it presents the idea of comparative negligence, whereas the law is that even slight contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff would bar her recovery. The answer is that the instruction does not state the doctrine of comparative negligence, but only requires that it be established that the plaintiff was guilty of "such contributory negligence as to excuse the defendant," and that other instructions correctly and sufficiently inform the jury as to what constitutes contributory negligence, and that if the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence which contributed proximately to cause the injury, the verdict must be in favor of the defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, designating insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict as a ground of motion for new trial, and section 659, providing that the moving party must designate in his notice of intention to move for a new trial the grounds upon which the motion will be made, where defendants' notice set forth as one of the grounds of the motion "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict," the motion for a new trial on the grounds set forth in the notice of intention, following which was a statement of the grounds set forth in the notice of intention, was sufficient.

In eminent domain proceedings, where defendants moved for new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, and their specification of the particulars in which the evidence was claimed to be insufficient to justify the verdict directed attention to the particular elements of value constituting the basis upon which compensation should be fixed, each element being mentioned, and stated that the testimony bearing on such elements did not justify the jury's conclusion that the property was of no greater value than that fixed by the jury, such specification of particulars was sufficient, since plaintiff could have experienced no difficulty in determining therefrom the particular facts as to Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewitt, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation, against J. L. Rollins and others, as trustees of the Erie Mining Company, a defunct California corporation, and of its stockholders. From an order granting new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Wm. B. Bosley and Thos. J. Straub, both of San Francisco, and John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, for appellant. C. W. Kitts and C. W. Cross, both of San Francisco, and A. C. Lowell, of Auburn, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The action is in eminent domain to condemn a right of way for the conveyance of water. The plaintiff is engaged in the business of storing, selling, and distributing water, for power, mining, irrigating, domestic, and other purposes, and particularly for supplying counties, cities, and towns, etc., in the state of California, and the inhabitants thereof, with water for all of said purposes. To carry out these objects, it has constructed and now maintains and operates canals, reservoirs, dams, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, and all such other works, structures, machinery, and appliances necessary for the collection, storage, and distribution of water for the purposes mentioned. The plaintiff, it appears, was, at the time of the commencement of this proceeding, constructing a large storage reservoir in the county of Nevada, called "Lake Spaulding Reservoir," through which the South Yuba river flows, and owns the right to divert and appropriate from said river at said reservoir 11,000 or more miner's inches of water, and has near the outlet of said reservoir constructed an aqueduct through which it proposes to conduct and convey approximately 14,000 miner's inches, and, as soon as the right to do so has been acquired, will discharge the same into the channel of Bear river at the lower end of said aqueduct, thence through and along said channel of said Bear river to the plaintiff's diverting dam. The right of way adopted by the plaintiff for conveying said water to said diverting dam includes the channel of that portion of said Bear river which is included between the lower end of said aqueduct and said diverting dam, and particularly that portion of the channel of said river which crosses the defendants' tract of land, of which a specific description is given in the complaint. The property which the plaintiff herein seeks to condemn and appropriate to its purposes, above mentioned, is the right of way for conveying said water in and along that portion of the channel of the said Bear river which is included between the most northerly boundary line of defendants' said tract of land and the most southerly boundary thereof. It appears from the complaint that the defendant Erie Mining Company had, prior to the commencement of this action, failed to pay the state license tax imposed upon it for the year 1905, as provided by law (Stats. 1905, p. 493), and as a consequence had forfeited its charter to the state on the 14th day of December, 1905. Hence the action was brought against the directors of the defendant Erie Mining Company, as trustees of the corporation and its stockholders and members (Stats. 1907, p. 746), amendatory of the act of 1905 (Stats. 1905, pp. 493, 494). Upon the complaint, setting forth sufficient facts, and the denials of the answer, the cause was brought to issue and trial. The jury found that the market value of the right of way sought to be condemned was the sum of $4,000, and that the damages which will be sustained by the defendants on account of injury to the remainder of the tract of land owned by the defendants, and of which the land sought to be condemned is a part, by reason of the taking and the severing therefrom of the said right of way, would be $1,000. The court thereafter caused to be entered what is called in the record a "judgment." Within due time, the defendants served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial upon the following grounds: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of the jury; (2) that the verdict was and is contrary to and against the evidence; (3) that the verdict is contrary to law; (4) errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by defendants. The said notice stated that "said motion will be made upon a statement of the case," etc. The statement on the said motion was within due time prepared and served, and, on the 14th day of September, 1915, the court duly allowed and settled the same. On the 11th day of October, 1915, the matter of the motion for a new trial on the statement as allowed and settled was called for hearing. At said time, the defendants presented a motion for the amendment of said statement and specification of errors so as to make it appear in the appropriate place therein that "no findings were made or filed by the court, and that findings were not waived by defendants," and to add to the assignments of errors the following:

> "That the judgment herein entered is contrary to law in this: That the court did not file its findings of fact upon the issues presented in the case other than the issue of compensation, as required by law; that the final order or decree of condemnation herein entered is contrary to law in this: That the court did not file its findings of fact upon the issues presented in the case other than the issue of compensation, as required by law."

To said motion the plaintiff interposed an objection upon the ground, among others, that no notice of said motion to amend had been given as provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion was denied by the court without prejudice to the right of the defendants to renew the same, and, against the objection of the plaintiff to any further delay, the court continued the further hearing of the motion for a new trial until the 18th day of October, 1915. On the 13th day of October, 1915, the defendants served upon the plaintiff their notice to amend the said statement in the manner and particulars above mentioned. Said notice was accompanied and supported by an affidavit. Upon hearing said motion as so presented, the court allowed the same over a number of specifically enumerated objections by the plaintiff.

It is preliminarily objected by the appellant: (1) That the motion for a new trial as made did not set forth any grounds upon which the court could properly have granted the motion. The argument in support of this proposition is that "the grounds as stated in the motion were too general and indefinite to enable the court to know wherein the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; * * * that it was incumbent upon respondents in making such motion to state specifically the grounds of the motion or refer to some paper on file wherein such grounds were specifically stated (citing Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 77 Pac. 762; Hayne, New Trial and Appeal, sec. 164); that respondents did not state specifically the grounds upon which they relied, nor did they refer to any paper on file in the case wherein such grounds were stated." (2) That the specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is insufficient, in that it is too general and fails to point out the particulars in which the evidence does not justify the verdict.

[1] As to the point first suggested, section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure designates the grounds upon which a motion for a new trial may be made. Among the grounds so specified is that of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision. Section 659 provides that the moving party must designate in his notice of intention to move for a new trial the grounds upon which the motion will be made. This latter provision obviously refers to the grounds upon which a new trial may be allowed as specified in section 657, and contemplates that the grounds designated shall go no further than to specify them in the notice of intention in the general language of the last-mentioned section. This is precisely what was done by the respondents in this case. The statement as settled and allowed contains the notice of intention, in which is set forth, as one of the grounds of the motion, "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict," which is the exact language of subdivision 6 of said section 657. The statement further contains the following statement:

> "Thereupon the matter of motion for a new trial being before the court, defendants made the following motion: The defendants move the court for a new trial of this action upon the grounds set forth in the notice of intention, to wit"

—following which is a statement of the grounds set forth in the notice of intention.

The above motion was sufficient in all respects to meet the requirements of the law where, as here, the motion is, as the notice of intention here stated would be done, supported by a statement of the case. There is nothing said in Williams v. Hawley, supra, from which it may be implied that the court intended to hold or suggest that the motion as made here is not sufficient to warrant the trial court in considering and acting upon it. In that case the moving party, in making his motion, referred to the notice of intention theretofore served and filed, but, in making up the bill of exceptions prepared and settled for the support of his motion, failed to include therein said notice of intention. It was therefore very properly held that, not being a part of the record, although inserted in the transcript, the notice of intention could not be examined by the court for a statement of the grounds of the motion. The court in that case did say, however, that:

> "It is not necessary, * * * for the appellant in making the motion to state the grounds at length. He must, in some way, inform the court what are the grounds of the motion, but this may be done as well by reference to some paper on file in the action, in which the grounds are stated, as by word of mouth."

See, also, Taylor v. Northern Elec. Railway Co., 26 Cal. App. 765, 770, 148 Pac. 543.

[2] The specification of the particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient to justify the verdict, so far as compensation or value is concerned, while perhaps not as specific as it might have been, is, nevertheless, sufficient. By said specification (after the statement that the verdict, so far as it involved a decision of the question of the value of the property sought to be condemned, is not justified by the evidence) attention is directed to the particular elements of value which constitute the basis upon which compensation of the defendants for the taking of their property should be fixed, each such element being mentioned, and it states in effect that the testimony bearing upon such elements does not justify the conclusion of the jury that the property involved was of no greater value than that fixed by the jury. This was sufficient to point the particular evidence thus referred to, and the particulars in which it was claimed that it was not sufficient to justify the verdict. The plaintiff could have experienced no difficulty in determining from the specification the particular facts as to which it was thus stated that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict upon the question of value, and this is all that is needful in specifications. Indeed, the plaintiff seems to have perceived and understood the particulars to which the specification referred, as the statement contains a fairly complete statement of the testimony addressed to the several elements of value.

The rule respecting and requiring specifications of particulars, etc., is now much more liberally viewed and applied than in our earlier juridical history. Formerly the rule was very strict, and even a mere informal statement in such specifications might, and often did, operate to bring about a refusal by the courts to consider the points thus attempted to be pointed out. Many decisions have been from time to time made upon the subject, and finally the Supreme Court, in American, etc., Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744, held that:

> "Whenever there is a reasonably successful effort to state 'the particulars,' and they are such as may have been sufficient to inform the opposing counsel and the court of the grounds, * * * this court ought not to refuse to consider the case on appeal."

See also, Drathman v. Cohen, 139 Cal. 310, 73 Pac. 181; 1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) p. 755.

Taking up now a consideration of the merits of this appeal, we first remark that there seems to be much force in the point made by the appellant that the document purporting to be and characterized in the record as the "judgment" (the preliminary or interlocutory judgment) not only constituted such a judgment, without which, manifestly, the court would have no authority or jurisdiction to make the final order of condemnation, but also embraces findings of all the essential facts and conclusions of law. But, assuming this to be true, we need not, in view of the conclusion arrived at herein upon another consideration presented here, stop to inquire whether the document referred to might legally stand for the findings, conclusions of law, and judgment, or whether on an appeal involving the merits of the controversy, the cause would be reversed for the sole and single reason that the findings of fact and conclusions of law are not separately stated, as required by section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is expressly made applicable to proceedings in condemnation by section 1256 of said Code. It might be that the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution would apply in such case. But, as stated, it is not necessary to consider this proposition. We think the cause may be disposed of on another ground.

It has been shown that one of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was based and pressed was that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The order granting the motion is in the following language:

"The motion of the defendants in the above-entitled case for a new trial coming on regularly to be heard upon the bill of exceptions, the notice of intention to move for a new trial and the judgment roll, and the motion having been made upon all the grounds specified in said notice of intention and duly argued and submitted, and the court having considered the same, the premises considered, it is ordered that the said motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby granted."

[3] It will at once be observed that the order granting the new trial does not indicate the particular ground, or grounds, of the several set forth in the notice of intention upon which it was made, and it is the settled rule in California that where the trial court, in granting a motion for a new trial, does not expressly limit the order granting such motion to any particular ground of those stated, it is the duty of the appellate court to sustain it, if it can be upheld upon any ground embodied in the notice of intention. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Newman v. Lossing, 141 Cal. 175, 74 Pac. 761; Bouchard v. Abrahamsen, 4 Cal. App. 430, 88 Pac. 383; Briggs v. Hall, 20 Cal. App. 372, 129 Pac. 288; Shea-Bocqueraz Co. v. Hartman, 20 Cal. App. 534, 129 Pac. 807.

[4] There is in this case a pronounced conflict in the evidence upon the question of the value of the property sought to be condemned. Indeed, there is such a wide variance between the witnesses for the respective parties upon the question of value that it may properly be assumed, and, in fact, we are authorized to presume, in support of the order appealed from, that one of the reasons impelling the trial court to allow the motion for a new trial was that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. We may dispose of the case upon this presumption, and, therefore, consideration of other grounds and points involving an attack upon certain rulings of the court may be waived.

It is a well-established rule that:

"The granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of such discretion." Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 Pac. 1024; Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 411, 38 Pac. 960; Eidinger v. Sigwart, 13 Cal. App. 667, 676, 110 Pac. 521.

See, also, Bjorman v. Ft. Bragg R. R. Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591; Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 549, 34 Pac. 114; Bledsoe v. Decrow, 132 Cal. 312, 64 Pac. 397.

[5] We shall not undertake herein a detailed statement of the testimony upon the question of value. It is conceived to be sufficient to say: (1) That the witnesses for the defendants, having previously declared that they were familiar with the properties of the Erie Mining Company and were familiar with mining operations and the use and the methods of the impounding of water for power purposes, and the availability of the properties of the company for the development and use of water for such purposes, and that the mine itself contained large deposits of rich and paying gravel, expressed the opinion that the value of all said properties was from $100,000 to $125,000 for all the purposes to which they may properly and profitably be adapted; that the right of way sought by the plaintiff herein, if allowed, would completely destroy and render valueless all the properites of said Erie Company and the defendants, and render them worthless for any practical mining or water power purpose, to which they are alone adapted. (2) That the witnesses for the plaintiff, having first shown themselves to be experts upon mining and kindred subjects, including the development and conservation of water for power purposes, and that they were familiar with the properties of the Erie Company, and knew their value for any purpose to which they might with profit be put, testified that said properties were absolutely valueless for any purpose.

Thus it will be observed that, as stated, there is a wide diversity of opinion between the witnesses as to the value of the property sought to be taken. In fact, it has no value whatever, according to the plaintiff's witnesses. But, that it has some value is evidenced by the verdict, and, although it is not so made to appear in the record, it is stated in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff that the jury viewed and inspected the property sought to be condemned.

[6] But, at all events, it was, as above pointed out, entirely within the discretion of the trial court, in considering the motion for a new trial to determine whether the verdict, in so far as it concerned the value of the property sought to be appropriated, was justified, or reasonably in accord with the evidence upon that question.

[7] The order granting the motion is evidence of the opinion of the court that the verdict as rendered was not, in respect of value, justified, and, as it cannot upon the record as we must view it justly be said that the court, in granting the motion on that ground, abused its discretion, it cannot be disturbed.

[8] We have not, in considering this record, overlooked the analytical examination of the testimony presented by the defendants by counsel for the plaintiff in their briefs and their argument following therefrom against the reliability of said testimony. But this court cannot weigh the testimony of witnesses. This was, obviously a matter entirely for the jury in the first instance and then for the court when considering the motion for a new trial. The defendants appeared to have sufficiently qualified themselves to express opinions on the value of the property. This is all that this court need know, and whether the testimony given by them after so qualifying themselves was entitled to great or little or no weight is a matter with which, as suggested, a reviewing court, in the very nature of the case cannot concern itself. These observations apply as well to the argument that, since the only testimony in favor of the defendants upon the question of value was given by the defendants themselves, who were directly interested in the result of the trial, such testimony is not dependable.

[9] The defendants were competent to testify as witnesses in their own behalf, and whether they were influenced in their opinions on value by the fact that they were interested parties was a matter entirely for the determination of the jury and the trial court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Contracts 🔑261(1)—Failure of Consideration—Statute.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1689, providing for rescinding of a contract if consideration becomes entirely void, plaintiff could rescind an oral agreement, whereby defendant agreed, but later refused, to teach plaintiff to sell washing machines and subagencies therefor, upon the strength of which plaintiff purchased contract giving him the right to sell subagencies at an enormous profit, and for purchase price of which he had given a mortgage; it being an unexecuted contract, and defendant was not entitled to foreclose mortgage and leave plaintiff to an action for damages.

2. Quieting Title 🔑7(2) — Mortgage as Cloud—Failure of Consideration—Right of Action.

Since plaintiff could show, in foreclosure action, failure of consideration for which a mortgage was given, he may maintain an action to remove from his premises the cloud of such mortgage.

4. Cancellation of Instruments 🔑37(8)—Total Failure of Consideration—Sufficiency of Complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Joseph M. Shull against W. H. Crawford. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Miguel Estudillo, of Riverside, for appellant. McFarland & Irving, of Riverside, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was brought to cancel and annul a certain conveyance of real estate made by plaintiff and his wife to defendant, which instrument, while in form a deed absolute, was in fact conceded to have been given as a mortgage to secure an alleged indebtedness due from plaintiff to defendant. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and an order of court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

It appears that a corporation known as the Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of what was known on the market as the "Vacuum Clothes Washer." The company had adopted a lengthy, complex, and confused form of agency contract in appointing agents and making sales of its washers to those who could be induced to purchase the same in lots of 1,667, and whereby the purchaser was allotted the exclusive right to operate in territory selected and agreed upon. The form and substance of this contract was, if not intended as a means for the perpetration of fraud, well calculated to deceive the unwary and appeal to the gullible, for the reason that, while the purchaser was required to pay $5,000 for which he received 1,667 washing machines, it gave him the right, provided he could find persons equally unsophisticated, to sell like contracts for $5,000, for each of which he was to retain as his commission $3,333, the balance of $1,667 going to the company for the 1,667 washing machines which it furnished to the purchaser of the contract, who likewise was given the right, upon like inducement, to search for "prospects" and, if found, develop them if possible. The evidence, however, shows that to render one a successful agent in selling the vacuum washing machines, and particularly in selling the contracts, from which latter the profits were to be derived, required that the agent or purchaser be "posted, informed, and educated"; so the contract provided that an agent making a sale of "family rights," or to persons to whom he might sell "said articles at wholesale," or those "appointed as subagents," should "post, inform, and educate" them. Whether or not defendant was the holder of one of these valuable contracts is immaterial; at all events, it appears that he was authorized to sell the same, and selected Riverside as a fertile field for operation, and where it seems his labor was rewarded by the discovery of plaintiff, who was recognized as a "likely prospect." Defendant, it seems, was what is known as a "live wire" in the business, and without much effort convinced plaintiff that he, too, upon being "posted, informed and educated," could, with like success, find unsophisticated individuals whom he could induce to buy the privilege of making like sales in this endless-chain scheme.

On September 22, 1911, defendant consummated the sale of a contract to plaintiff, under which the latter was appointed the duly authorized agent of the company in the territory embracing the city of San Diego, and received the 1,667 vacuum clothes washers, with the power to sell like contracts of agency, for which washers he paid defendant as the agent of the company the sum of $1,667, and at the same time executed to defendant the mortgage as security to him for the payment of his commission of $3,333, which plaintiff knew he was to receive. In his complaint plaintiff alleges, and the evidence shows, that, in consideration of his purchase of said contract, the defendant orally promised and agreed that he would "post, inform, and educate" plaintiff with reference to said clothes washer, so that he would fully understand how to operate and demonstrate the same to the best possible advantage, and enable him to secure the appointment of other agents and subagents, and further agreed "that upon said plaintiff's selecting the territory in which he desired to have the exclusive right to sell said washers, that said defendant, Crawford, would accompany said plaintiff to said territory, and would put on lectures for a period of two months, said lectures to be delivered daily during said period with the exception of Sundays"; that plaintiff selected the city of San Diego as territory, where he opened offices for the transaction of said business, and demanded that defendant put on lectures for the purpose of demonstrating and assisting him in the sale of said washers, but that defendant at all times refused to comply with said demand and deliver said lectures, or to post, inform, and educate plaintiff in the use of the same or demonstration thereof; "that the said agreement on the part of the said defendant Crawford to put on said lectures as hereinbefore alleged, and to educate, post, and inform said Shull in the use of said washers and in the methods to be pursued in securing other agents and subagents for the said company was the sole and only consideration which induced the said plaintiff Shull to enter into said agreement with said defendant Crawford, or to accept an appointment as agent of said corporation, or to execute said contract as agent with said corporation, or give said note for $3,333 secured as hereinabove alleged; that said plaintiff, Shull, has, by reason of the failure of said defendant, Crawford, to put on said lectures and instruct and inform and post him in the use of said washers, been unable to sell said washers or to interest the public therein, or to secure other agents or subagents for said company"; that had plaintiff known that said Crawford would not fulfill his said agreement, plaintiff would not have purchased said contract, and would not have given the mortgage to secure to defendant the payment from him of said sum of $3,333; all of which allegations the court, in effect, found to be true. It is also alleged that said deed so given as a mortgage, if left outstanding, would constitute a cloud upon plaintiff's title to the real property therein described.

[1] The theory of the complaint, and that upon which the action was tried, was that the mortgage was given to defendant, which in fact it was, and not to the utilities company, which received from plaintiff all that was due to it; that the consideration for the mortgage so made to defendant was his agreement to perform certain services, without which promise plaintiff would not have bought the contract so made by the utilities company, sale of which was made to him by defendant; that defendant refused to perform the services constituting the consideration for the sale so made by defendant to plaintiff, and upon the ground of a failure of consideration moving to plaintiff from defendant, there remains nothing upon which to found plaintiff's promise to pay to defendant the $3,333 for which the mortgage was given; and likewise for a failure of consideration defendant is not entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgage, which he sought by a cross-complaint. Plaintiff was not seeking to rescind the written contract made with the utilities company under and by virtue of which he obtained the 1,667 washing machines, but sought to rescind the oral agreement made with defendant whereby he was induced to enter into the written contract, for failure to perform the services in consideration of which plaintiff purchased the contract, and to have the mortgage constituting a cloud upon his real estate set aside and annulled. Section 1689 of the Civil Code provides that a party to a contract may rescind the same if the consideration therefor becomes entirely void from any cause.

The consideration for the purchase of the contract was defendant's promise of 60 days' services in posting and educating plaintiff in the operation and demonstration of said machines and assisting him in the making of sales of $5,000 agency contracts at a profit of $3,333, as well as washing machines, which promise defendant refused to perform. Nevertheless, appellant contends that he is entitled to foreclose the said mortgage and leave plaintiff to an action for damages. To our minds, such a course, under the circumstances of this case, would be highly inequitable. In support of this contention counsel for appellant cites the cases of Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 132, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29, and Schott v. Schott, 168 Cal. 342, 143 Pac. 595, in which the plaintiffs sought to have deeds, which had been made and delivered upon the promise of the grantees to support the plaintiffs during their lives, set aside. Such relief was denied upon the ground that the transaction constituted a fully executed contract. Such, however, is not the case here. It is an unexecuted contract like that involved in Howlin v. Castro, 136 Cal. 605, 69 Pac. 299. Plaintiff has not parted with his property, but has merely given a mortgage thereon to secure his promise to pay defendant $3,333, which the defendant by a cross-complaint is seeking to enforce.

[2] To our minds, plaintiff, as a defense to the foreclosure action, is entitled to show a failure of the consideration for which the mortgage was given; and, if this be true, it must follow that he has the right to maintain an action to remove the cloud from the title to his property.

[3] There was a total failure of consideration for plaintiff's promise to defendant, and hence it was not necessary to give notice of rescission before bringing suit to cancel the mortgage. Glass v. Glass, 4 Cal. App. 604, 88 Pac. 734; Richter v. Union Land, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39.

[4] In our opinion, not only did the complaint state a cause of action, but the findings to the effect that the allegations of the complaint were true support the judgment, and they in turn are supported by the evidence. The action is not based upon fraud, either constructive or actual, of the utilities company, nor that of defendant, but solely upon the ground that since defendant failed to perform the promise in consideration of which the mortgage was given, it would be inequitable to enforce it.

Numerous complaints are made as to rulings of the court in admitting evidence. These alleged errors are based upon appellant's contention that the action was one to rescind the contract between plaintiff and the utilities company, instead of which the rulings were based upon the theory of the court that the subject of the litigation was the oral contract made between plaintiff and defendant, which plaintiff sought to have annulled for want of consideration. Considered upon this theory, we find no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court.

[5] Nor was defendant prejudiced by reason of the court permitting plaintiff to file an amended complaint after notice. Even should we concede such error, it could not be said that it resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

In our opinion, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Wm. J. Hayes, of Oakland, for appellant. Louis H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $494.80 with interest and costs.

The action was brought for the recovery of damages for the breach of a written contract, under the terms of which the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff four reels of block tin pipe, each reel weighing 500 pounds, at a price of 50 cents per pound, and which contract the defendant refused to carry out.

It appears that the day after the contract was entered into the defendant learned that the market price of block tin pipe had gone up from 45 cents to 68 cents per pound, which increase in price was due, according to the testimony of the defendant's manager, to the European conflict then and now prevailing. This witness also testified that the defendant company was a small dealer in this article of merchandise; that it knew nothing of its sudden rise in price, but that the plaintiff did; that when the plaintiff asked the price of such pipe and stated the quantity he required he was advised by the defendant to place the order directly with the Selby Smelting & Lead Company (which was at that time the only wholesale dealer in the commodity in California); and that plaintiff concealed his true reason for not purchasing from that company (which was that he would have to pay 68 cents a pound therefor), and, with the purpose of misleading and deceiving the defendant, represented to defendant that he was not on friendly terms with the Selby Company and did not care to have any personal dealing with it.

[1] Assuming that the evidence introduced by the defendant tended to sustain the allegations of the answer, that the contract was conceived in fraud, and is therefore void, still we cannot reverse the judgment, were we ever so inclined, for the simple reason that there is an abundance of evidence in the record sustaining the findings of the court that no misrepresentation was made by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that there was no concealment or fraud practiced by the plaintiff upon the defendant. Furthermore, we are at a loss to see how the court could have made any other finding. The record discloses that on the 5th day of August, 1914, the plaintiff called at the place of business of the defendant and asked for a price on block tin pipe, stating also the quantity he desired. The clerk of the defendant was unable at that time to quote a price, and the plaintiff was requested to call again. He did so that afternoon and again on the next day, when the defendant quoted the price above stated and the agreement in writing was made. The plaintiff denied emphatically that he made any of the misrepresentations referred to. It also appears in the record that block tin was quoted in San Francisco at 45 cents per pound the day the agreement was made. We conclude therefore that this first contention of the appellant is without merit.

Equally so is the point that the defendant in purchasing the block tin from the Selby Company to fill plaintiff's order was acting as the agent of the plaintiff. It is sufficient to say in this behalf that the evidence does not sustain this contention.

[2] A more serious question is whether or not the court committed error in admitting in evidence the deposition of M. E. Marvin. When the commission to take the deposition was issued, it did not have attached to it, as required by section 2024 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the seal of the court; and at the trial the defendant for the first time objected to the deposition, and made a motion to suppress it. The motion not being opposed, it was granted, but later, learning that the witness was not in New York, where he was when the deposition was taken, but was somewhere in South America, and it appearing that to again have his deposition taken would cause an indefinite delay, the plaintiff made a motion to set aside the order suppressing the deposition, and to amend the process of the court by affixing its seal thereto. This motion was granted, and the deposition read in evidence. The granting of this motion is now contended to be error.

We are of the opinion that under the facts the court correctly granted the motion. The court has control over its process, and it should permit an amendment to the same in the interest of justice, especially when, as in this case, the party complaining can show no resulting injury. The authorities sustain this view. In the case of Oriental et al. v. Barclay, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 193, 206, 41 S. W. 117, 122, the court, referring to that part of a motion to quash a commission based upon the ground that it did not bear the seal of the court, said:

> "The commission having been issued by the clerk of the court trying the case, and the deposition of the witness having been taken under such commission, the failure to place the seal upon the commission was a mere irregularity, which could not have worked an imposition: and it was not error to allow the clerk to place the seal upon the commission, and to refuse to quash the deposition upon this ground."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by S. N. Clark against the Berlin Realty Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Valentine & Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Benjamin E. Page and Arthur C. Hurt, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Judgment in this action was for the plaintiff. The appeal is taken from the judgment and from an order denying the motion made by the defendant for a new trial. Plaintiff, as assignee of the Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, brought this action for recovery against the defendant on account of an indebtedness created by the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company, a corporation, of which latter corporation defendant was at certain times material herein a stockholder and the owner of 209,535 shares of stock. The total capital of the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company was represented by 300,000 shares, all of which had been issued. Recovery was sought against the defendant for its proportionate liability as a stockholder. Plaintiff in his amended complaint, upon which issue was joined and trial had, alleged first in detail the fact of the corporate existence of the Berlin Realty Company and the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company. He then set out in the first cause of action that the Merchants' National Bank, on April 1, 1911, loaned to the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company (which for convenience we will hereinafter refer to as the "Laundry Company") the sum of $8,000 and the making of a promissory note payable 90 days after date by the Laundry Company to cover the amount of that loan with interest, with a condition as to the payment of attorney's fees. It is then alleged that on the 14th day of April of the same year the same bank loaned to the Laundry Company the sum of $1,500, taking a promissory note in like form, payable one day after date; that on the 8th day of May the same bank loaned to the Laundry Company the sum of $2,000, taking a one-day note in like form as was used in the preceding transactions; that on the 12th day of June of the same year the same bank loaned to the Laundry Company the further sum of $1,000 and took the Laundry Company's one-day note covering that amount; that on the 30th day of June, 1911, a new note for $8,000, and in renewal of the note dated the 1st day of April of that year, was given, and it was alleged that the sole purpose of the making of this note was to renew the $8,000 note formerly given. It was further alleged that on the 29th day of November, 1912, the same bank loaned to the Laundry Company a further sum of $2,000 and took a one-day note covering the amount involved in this last transaction. It was then alleged that on the 5th day of March, 1913, a note was made by the Laundry Company in favor of the bank and duly delivered for the principal sum of $14,500, payable one day after date. This note it was alleged was given, in its aggregate amount, to cover each of the notes hereinbefore described, and it was alleged that the five notes theretofore given were surrendered to the Laundry Company, and that the "said note dated March 5, 1913, for $14,500, was accepted and retained in place and renewal thereof by said bank, and not otherwise." There was also an allegation that the principal amount of the indebtedness so incurred at the several times had not been paid. It was next alleged that at the time the $8,000 indebtedness was incurred the Berlin Realty Company was the owner of 209,535 shares of the 300,000 shares constituting the total and issued capital stock of the Laundry Company. In the second cause of action, plaintiff, by reference therein stated, incorporated all of the material allegations set forth in the first alleged cause of action, and then alleged that at the time the indebtedness of $1,500 was incurred by the Laundry Company on April 14, 1911, defendant herein was the owner of the number of shares of stock described. The third cause of action was in like form, but referred to the indebtedness of May 8, 1911; and the fourth cause of action was set forth in like manner and form, but referred to the $1,000 indebtedness of June 12, 1911. No recovery was sought on account of the $2,000 note dated November 29, 1912, for the reason that the defendant at that time had ceased to be a stockholder of the Laundry Company. Defendant demurred to the complaint setting forth various special grounds therefor, in addition to the general one that sufficient facts were not stated to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled and an answer filed.

[1, 2] It is contended, first, that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. The complaint in its allegations of fact was simple and quite clear. In it was first set forth the alleged facts of the transactions had by the Laundry Company with the bank, and these allegations were specific and particular as to the amounts of money borrowed, the dates, etc. There seems to be no ground upon which to base the contention, as suggested in one of the asserted grounds of demurrer, that the complaint was uncertain. There was no misjoinder of causes of action. The first alleged cause of action, to be sure, contained statements of the several transactions had with the bank the individual ones of which might no doubt have been set out separately; but we cannot see how, assuming that such a procedure had been followed, defendant could have been any better informed of the facts upon which the plaintiff relied to sustain his suit. The contention that the allegations of the first cause of action, being substantial ones and essential to the pleading, could not by reference be incorporated in the subsequent alleged causes of action, is not supported by the California cases. The case cited on behalf of appellant to this point, to wit, Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262, is not sustained by the later decisions in Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac. 20, and Green v. Clifford, 94 Cal. 49, 29 Pac. 331.

[3-5] The main contention, however, and that which forms the substance of the defense interposed by the defendant, is that all of the indebtedness incurred by the Laundry Company to the bank and as evidenced by the several promissory notes was extinguished when the note for $14,500 was given on March 5, 1913, which was after the defendant had ceased to be one of the stockholders in the Laundry Company. It appeared in evidence that, at the time the note for $14,500 was made, the notes previously taken were delivered to the Laundry Company and marked "paid." The defendant urged and now insists that, under the facts shown by the evidence, when the last note was made a novation was effected, and under the agreement of the parties the new obligation extinguished the old debt. It has been held numerous times and by the decisions of this state that the taking of a promissory note from a debtor, or of a third party, will not extinguish the debt and create a new obligation, unless received by the creditor under an express agreement that it shall have that effect. It is further asserted in the authorities that there is not a presumption in favor of a note being received as payment under such circumstances; and, where a note was given to take up another note, it was said that because the original note was surrendered and marked paid on its face "was not conclusive evidence of the extinguishment of the debt." In the case of Bonestell v. Bowie, 128 Cal. 511, 61 Pac. 78, the text of the decision supports these statements, and a number of cases are therein collected and cited which are all to the same general point and effect. See, also, Gnarini v. Swiss American Bank, etc., 162 Cal. 181, 121 Pac. 726. In London & S. F. Bank v. Parrott, 125 Cal. 472, 58 Pac. 164, 73 Am. St. Rep. 64, the court said:

> "In the absence of an agreement to that effect, or evidence that such was the intention of the parties, the taking of a note for an existing liability does not constitute a payment of the debt."

In the same case it is further observed that:

> "The plaintiff's claim against the appellants as stockholders is not upon the note, but upon the liability originally created by reason of the advances made to the corporation."

And such was the action of the plaintiff here. There was, to be sure, some testimony heard by the trial judge which, taken by itself, may be said to tend to show an intention on the part of the bank to consider the last note as creating a new and distinct obligation—one which would cancel the old indebtedness. But the court had other testimony to consider which indicated that no extinction of the original indebtedness was intended to be worked by the taking of the last note, and, such being the condition of the evidence, it is sufficient to say that an appellate court has no right to make any further review of the testimony, for, in view of the conflict, the decision of the trial judge in that matter is final.

[6] We think there was no prejudicial error in refusing to allow a question to be answered which was asked of the cashier of the bank relative to his knowledge as to a change in the management of the Laundry Company being made prior to November 29, 1912. As is properly said by respondent, the president of the bank gave testimony which furnished an admission as against the bank, if it may be so termed, fully as favorable as that which the expected answer of the cashier could have supplied. The objection that the court erred in refusing to allow the case to be reopened after the parties had rested, in order to permit defendant to introduce further testimony, is addressed to a matter which is regulated by the sound discretion of trial judges, in the exercise of which appellate courts will not interfere. There is nothing shown from which we may conclude in this case that the court abused its discretion.

No other points are presented which call for discussion or consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SCHALLMAN v. HAAS. (Civ. 1624.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 16, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1917.)

1. EVIDENCE 🔑43(2)—JUDICIAL NOTICE — COURT RECORDS.

Where a motion to compel defendant to pay plaintiff certain sums for the support of an illegitimate child and for expenses pending an appeal was heard by the judge who tried the case on the merits, the court on the hearing of the motion had a right to take judicial notice of the record in the case.

2. BASTARDS 🔑92—SUPPORT — POWER OF COURT—SUPPORT PENDING APPEAL.

While a court has inherent power, after granting a divorce where the marriage was admitted for the husband's fault, to compel the husband to pay to the wife money for her expenses in resisting the husband's appeal, and for the support of herself and children pending the appeal, it has no such inherent power in an action under Civ. Code, § 196a, to compel a father to support his illegitimate child, since in the latter case the obligation does not arise until the judgment has established the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 228–239.]

3. BASTARDS 🔑92—SUPPORT — POWER OF COURT—STATUTES.

Civ. Code, § 196a, requiring the father to give a child support and education suitable to his circumstances, and authorizing a civil suit in behalf of a minor child by his mother or guardian to enforce such obligations, in which action the court shall have power to enforce performance thereof the same as under Civ. Code, §§ 138–140, does not, by making sections 138–140, which provide for orders in divorce actions requiring the husband and father to pay the wife's expenses and for the support of the wife and children, a part of that section, impose a similar obligation on defendant in an action to support an illegitimate child, but merely authorizes the obligation already created to support such child after his liability has been determined, to be enforced in the manner in which the other obligations may be enforced, and therefore does not authorize the court to require defendant to pay for the support of the child and the expenses of resisting an appeal from the judgment fixing his liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Anna Schallman against Carl F. Haas. From an order requiring defendant to pay plaintiff's attorney's fees and expenses in resisting defendant's appeal from a judgment requiring defendant to support an illegitimate child, and to pay a monthly sum pending the appeal for the support of the child, defendant appeals. Order reversed.

Tum Suden and Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was commenced for the purpose of obtaining a decree or judgment compelling the defendant to pay a monthly sum reasonably necessary for the support, maintenance, and education of the alleged minor child of the parties.

The complaint, in substance, alleges: That the plaintiff is the mother and the defendant the father of a minor child, who was born in the city and county of San Francisco, on the 26th day of July, 1911; that the defendant has failed, neglected, and refused for several months immediately preceding the time of the commencement of this action to provide for said minor child's support and maintenance; that the plaintiff is wholly without the means to provide for and maintain said minor child, being able only, through her own personal labors and work, and with the assistance of relatives, to provide for herself the common necessaries of life; that "the defendant has and possesses the present means and ability to pay to plaintiff a reasonable sum for the support, maintenance, and education of said minor child, together with a reasonable sum as and for plaintiff's counsel fees and costs of court." The prayer is for judgment requiring the defendant to pay to plaintiff a reasonable sum monthly for the support, etc., of said child, together with a reasonable sum for plaintiff's counsel's fees and cost of court herein.

The answer denies each and every one of the above-stated allegations of the complaint, and avers in paragraph 3 thereof:

> "Defendant alleges that he is under no legal liability or responsibility whatever to provide for the maintenance and support of the said minor child, Albert Schallman; that said Albert Schallman was born out of wedlock."

The court found that the plaintiff and the defendant were the mother and father, respectively, of the minor child referred to in the complaint; that the defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to provide said child with support, maintenance, etc., as alleged in the complaint; that, as likewise alleged, the plaintiff is wholly without the means, and that the defendant possesses sufficient means and ability to provide such support, maintenance, etc., for said child. Finding 6 reads:

> "That all the facts set forth in defendant's answer herein contrary to these findings are untrue."

Within due time the defendant duly served and filed a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from said judgment, and to stay the execution thereof gave a bond in the sum of $1,600, to which no exception was taken, and which covers a sum which would accrue within a period of approximately three years, should the judgment be affirmed. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709. Thereafter the plaintiff noticed and filed an application to the trial court for an order allowing her costs and attorney's fees to cover the expense for transcribing the testimony taken at the trial, to be used on the motion of the defendant for a new trial and upon the appeal from the judgment, for the printing of briefs on the appeal, for compensation of her counsel in those proceedings, and further asked for an order requiring the defendant to pay to plaintiff a reasonable sum for the support and maintenance of the said child "pending the determination of defendant's motion for a new trial and decision of defendant's proposed appeal to the Supreme Court herein." Upon hearing the above-mentioned motion the court made an order allowing the same, as follows, briefly: That the defendant immediately deposit with the clerk of the court the sum of $150, to be expended in the payment of such costs, charges, and disbursements "as may be necessary for plaintiff's costs and expenses in preparing her amendments to defendant's bill of exceptions and all of her costs necessary to be expended by her in preparation on her part against defendant's said motion for a new trial herein and defendant's appeal herein"; that defendant pay to plaintiff the sum of $75 as and for her counsel fees on said motion for a new trial and defendant's appeal herein; that, pending the hearing of said motion for a new trial and appeal and the final determination of both, the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of $20 per month for the support and maintenance of said minor. The defendant took an appeal from said order, and filed a bond to stay the execution thereof. It is the appeal from said order with which we are here concerned.

[1] The bill of exceptions in the transcript does not contain the judgment roll. It states, however, that, at the hearing of the application for the order from which this appeal is prosecuted, the defendant offered in evidence the judgment roll. It is quite probable that the judgment roll was, as a matter of fact, received in evidence, but that, under the decision in Harron v. Harron, 128 Cal. 303, 60 Pac. 932, it was deemed unnecessary to incorporate it in the bill. The notice of the motion in this case stated that said motion "will be made upon this notice of motion and upon all of the pleadings and papers filed herein, and on all of the proceedings had and taken herein, and upon such oral and documentary evidence as may be produced upon the hearing hereof." The order appealed from here was made by the judge who tried the case upon the merits and rendered the judgment thereon. The record in the case was judicially before the court upon the motion, and, in the hearing thereof, it took, as it had a right to do, judicial notice thereof. Harron v. Harron, supra.

The action purports to be based upon section 196a of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "The father as well as the mother, of an illegitimate child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. A civil suit to enforce such obligations may be maintained in behalf of a minor illegitimate child, by his mother or guardian, and in such action the court shall have power to order and enforce performance thereof, the same as under sections 138, 139 and 140 of the Civil Code, in a suit for divorce by a wife."

It is vigorously argued by the defendant that the complaint does not state a cause of action under said section, and that the findings, which follow, substantially, the averments of the complaint, do not support the judgment. It is further claimed that the complaint on its face shows that the minor child therein referred to and not the plaintiff is the real party in interest in this action, and for this reason said pleading fails to state the existence of a right of action in the plaintiff upon the cause of action so stated. We recognize much merit in the first stated of these contentions. As to the second we intimate no opinion, since we do not find it necessary to consider it on this appeal. Indeed, we prefer not to consider either of said points, inasmuch as there is, it appears, an appeal from the judgment pending and supported by some other record which is not here, and it is preferable that the questions suggested should be disposed of on said appeal.

[2] We think the court transcended its power in making the order complained of here. To our minds, the whole question, whether a trial court is legally authorized to make such an order after judgment in an action based upon section 196a of the Civil Code, must be determined upon a consideration of statutory law, conceding that it is within the competence of the Legislature to confer such power upon trial courts in a case like this. In other words, the power of the court to make such an order is not inherent, but, if it exists and can exist at all, it must come from direct legislative authority. The soundness of this proposition cannot well be challenged.

It is doubtless true that, in actions for divorce (and it will be understood that we are now referring to cases of that character wherein there is no contested issue of marriage—that is, wherein the marriage is not denied), even in the absence of statutory regulation of the matter or express legislative authority therefor, the courts having cognizance of such causes have the power to make after judgment suitable and reasonable provision for temporary or permanent alimony or support and provision for the payment by the husband to the wife of such sums as may be found to be requisite to defray the expenses necessary to be incurred by her in prosecuting the action or defending against it at the trial or in prosecuting or resisting the appeal, if one be taken. This power naturally follows from the nature of the marriage relation and the rights and duties of the parties thereupon arising, and from the fact that an action for a divorce is for the purpose of dissolving that relation. The husband upon the marriage becomes the head of the family, and has exclusive control, under certain restrictions as to disposition, of the community property. As a rule, he alone holds the "purse strings," and this is true even where the principal sources of his income are the property or belongings of the community. But, even if there be no community property and the wife is without separate means, the authority of the court to compel the husband after judgment to pay to the wife such sum or sums as may reasonably be required to prosecute or resist an appeal and for the support of their minor children pending the appeal will be recognized. "Natural justice and the policy of the law," says Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage and Divorce, volume 2, § 976, "alike demand that in any litigation between husband and wife, they shall have equal facilities for presenting their case before the tribunal. This requires that they should have equal command of funds. So that if she is without means, the law having vested (given control of) the acquisitions of the two in (to) him, he should be compelled to furnish them to her, to an extent rendering her his equal in the suit. This doctrine is a part of the same whereon proceeds temporary alimony. And so the English courts have from the earliest times to the present held without the aid of Parliament, and nearly all of our own have accepted the doctrine as of common law."

Of course, where the matter of costs, attorney's fees, and temporary or permanent support is regulated by statute, then the rules so promulgated must govern, and, undoubtedly, where, in a divorce action, a trial court failed to follow the statute in the matter of awarding costs, etc., or transcended its authority under the statute in that regard, its action therein would be annulled or set at naught upon appeal as being void or beyond the jurisdiction of the court. In this state, as well as in most of the states at the present time, the matter of costs, attorney's fees, and alimony, in divorce actions or suits for maintenance and support, is entirely regulated and governed by statute.

But there is no analogy between divorce suits or any other action between a husband and wife pertaining to or involving their marital relation and obligations and an action founded upon section 196a of the Civil Code. No more than in any other of the various classes of actions has a court the inherent power, if, indeed, it can have or be given any power in that respect at all, to require a litigant in a case of this character to provide his adversary with the means necessary to defray the costs and expenses incident to the prosecution or resisting of an appeal or for the support of such adversary, pending the disposition of the cause on appeal. This proposition necessarily follows from the fact that the essential issue to be determined in an action of this kind is contested. The gist or gravamen of this action is the paternity of the alleged illegitimate child. The defendant entered the court denying that he was the father of the child. His legal liability for its support can therefore only be fixed by proof that he is the father. There is not as to the defendant and the infant, as is true in divorce actions, wherein the marriage is admitted or not denied, a fixed and admitted status upon which the court is authorized to exercise a power whereby a decree affecting the rights of the parties may be made in advance of the trial of the issues of fact or in the absence of proof. Nor is it any less true in this case than in any other action, except in suits for divorce and kindred actions, that a court, after judgment, has no right to require the defendant to provide the plaintiff with the financial means with which to defend the judgment on appeal and to pay a monthly sum for the support of the children pending the determination of the appeal. To recognize such power in the trial court would be to assume that, with the rendition and entry of the judgment, the questions at issue had been definitively determined and settled, a position in direct contradiction to the rule that:

> "An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." Code Civ. Proc. § 1049; Naftzzer v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 83, 33 Pac. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23; In re Blythe's Estate, 99 Cal. 472; 34 Pac. 108; Story v. Story & I. Commercial Co., 100 Cal. 41, 34 Pac. 675; Borges v. Hillman, 29 Cal. App. 144, 150, 154 Pac. 1075.

[3] Thus it is very clear that there is no inherent power or authority in a trial court to make, after judgment, such an order as the one here complained of, and, assuming without deciding, but questioning the constitutional right of the Legislature to confer upon trial courts the power of making such an order as the one here after judgment in a case of this kind, we know of no statute investing such courts with such authority, unless, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, it is to be found in sections 138, 139, and 140 of the Civil Code, the provisions of which are by section 196a expressly made applicable to a limited extent to actions based upon the last-mentioned section. The sections named read:

> "Sec. 138. In actions for divorce the court may, during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage, make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such minor children as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate the same.
> "Sec. 139. Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support, during her life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively; and the court may, from time to time, modify its orders in these respects.

"Sec. 140. The court may require the husband to give reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the provisions of this chapter, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case."

The only section of the above which appears to lend support to the contention of the plaintiff is 138. But when we examine the language of section 196a, which refers to the above sections, it seems to us that the irresistible conclusion is that it was not thereby intended to create any additional rights in favor of the illegitimate child, but that the sole purpose was thus to provide a full and complete remedy for the enforcement of the rights previously given in said section. The language, it will be noted, is that "the court shall have power to order and enforce performance" of what? The obligations which, in the preceding part of the section, are established in favor of the child as against its parents, and this to be attained, as far as a court is authorized to go in a case of this character and no further, in the manner and mode pointed out by sections 138, 139, and 140 as applicable to actions for divorce. Of course, we are not to be understood as saying that, if the present, or a like case, is affirmed on appeal, and thus it is definitively determined and settled that the "obligations" created by section 196a rest upon the parent proceeded against, the trial court, in such case, would not retain jurisdiction of the cause to the extent of requiring the parent, if deemed necessary, to give reasonable security for providing maintenance, etc., for the child and of modifying from time to time, if the circumstances appeared to call for it, the judgment in so far as is concerned the sum to be paid for the child's maintenance and support. This proposition we do not decide, however, it being unnecessary for the purposes of this decision to do so.

But, as declared, we are firmly of the opinion that, in making sections 138, 139, and 140 a part of section 196a, the intention of the Legislature was not to create in behalf of the illegitimate child rights additional to those established for it by the latter section, but merely to provide a remedy for the enforcement of the rights so established or created.

Our conclusion is that the trial court was without jurisdiction to make the order from which this appeal is prosecuted, and it is accordingly reversed.

Ex parte HINES. (Cr. 517.)

LICENSES 🔑7(3)—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—CLASS LEGISLATION.

An ordinance of a city of the sixth class established the rate of licenses for certain occupations, and provided for every person, firm, or corporation conducting, managing, or carrying on a laundry $12 per annum, for every person, etc., operating a wagon for the delivery of laundry work to and from any laundry situated outside of the city limits $120 per annum, and for every person, etc., operating an agency for the collection and delivery of laundry work on behalf of any laundry situated outside of the city $120 for each agency. The ordinance also provided that violation of it should constitute a misdemeanor. Held, that the provisions relative to laundries outside of the city are void as an attempt to create or enforce a discrimination not based upon differences in the nature of the business being transacted, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 19.]

In the matter of the application of Thomas Hines for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged from custody.

Hutton, Jensen & Fogel and Chester L. Coffin, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner is held in custody by the city marshal of the city of Venice, a city of the sixth class. His imprisonment is pursuant to a judgment of conviction of the offense of operating and maintaining a laundry wagon for the soliciting and delivery of laundry work in the city of Venice without having first procured a license therefor as provided by an ordinance of that city; it being charged that the petitioner was operating and maintaining said wagon for the delivery of laundry work to and from a laundry situated outside of the limits of the city of Venice. He was sentenced to pay a fine, with the alternative of one day's imprisonment for each dollar of such fine being unpaid, and he refused to pay the fine; thereupon he was committed to the custody of the marshal to be imprisoned until, at the rate aforesaid, the fine shall be paid.

Ordinance No. 510 of the city of Venice is an ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain described businesses. Subdivision 34 of section 10 of that ordinance, as amended by Ordinance No. 636, establishes the rate of licenses for certain businesses and occupations; and, so far as applicable to this case, the provisions thereof requiring the payment of license are as follows:

"For every person, firm, or corporation conducting, managing, or carrying on a laundry, $12.00 per annum. For every person, firm, or corporation owning, operating, or maintaining a wagon or other vehicle for the delivery of laundry work to and from any laundry situat> ed outside of the limits of the city of Venice, whether such wagon or other vehicle shall be used to collect laundry direct from the customers or from other wagons operated by the same, or some other person, firm, or corporation, for each such wagon or vehicle, $120.00 per annum. For every person, firm, or corporation running, operating, or maintaining an agency for the collection or delivery of laundry work on behalf of any laundry situated outside of the limits of the city of Venice, $120.00 for each such agency so operated or maintained."

Another section of the ordinance declares it to be unlawful to carry on any of the described kinds of business within the corporate limits of the city of Venice without first having procured a license from said city to do so, and provides that violations of the ordinance shall constitute misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment.

Petitioner claims that the ordinances above mentioned are void, and that the recorder's court was without jurisdiction to try him upon the alleged offense; that the ordinance requires and imposes no tax upon wagons maintained for delivery of laundry work to and from laundries situated in said city of Venice, and imposes a tax of only $12 per annum on laundries located within said city; that there is nothing in the nature of vehicles delivering laundry to and from laundries outside of the city limits of Venice to require any further regulation than is required of laundry wagons operated to and from laundries inside of said city, or to require or justify a discrimination in the amount of license collected therefrom; that the charge of $120 per annum is discriminatory against him and other owners and operators of vehicles for the delivery of laundry outside of the city of Venice, and in direct violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies to petitioner and other such persons the equal protection of the law and abridges their privileges and immunities, and especially, he claims, that such ordinances are in violation of sections 13 and 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California. Said section 21 is as follows:

> "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the legislature, nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens."

We are of the opinion that the provisions of the ordinances under which petitioner has been convicted attempt to create and enforce a discrimination not based upon differences in the nature of the business being transacted or differences in the manner of conducting the same business, or any other difference other than the mere fact of difference in destination of the goods collected and delivered by wagons collecting for laundries located outside of the city and the destination of goods collected for delivery to laundries within the city. The license provisions in question are plainly devised as a protective tariff for the benefit of laundries located in the city of Venice or laundry wagons doing business with laundries located in the city of Venice, and apparently they have no other purpose. The case is similar in principle to that of Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642. The ordinance under consideration in that case provided that any person who in San Francisco should sell property of sundry kinds defined by the ordinance without at the time having the goods in San Francisco or a bill of lading or receipt of a common carrier showing on its face that the goods named therein had been shipped and were then in transitu to San Francisco should pay licenses in certain stated amounts. The same ordinance provided another set of license fees, much less in amount, payable by persons selling the same kinds of merchandise within the city and having their goods actually within the city or in transitu under bill of lading. It was held that the ordinance was inoperative and void; that it was flagrantly unjust, oppressive, unequal, and partial; that it discriminated between merchants in the same place dealing in the same kind of merchandise for no better reason than that one dealt in goods either actually in the corporate limits or in transitu under a bill of lading, while the other dealt in goods outside of the corporate limits and not in transitu under a bill of lading. The same observations apply to the present instance, and it is our opinion that the provisions of the Venice ordinances to which we have referred are likewise inoperative and void.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

Application by E. H. Merrill for a writ of review against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and others, to review an order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. Annulled.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Joseph K. Hutchinson and Walter Slack, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of review. The facts are briefly as follows: On November 2, 1916, there was filed in respondent court the affidavit of Joseph K. Hutchinson, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the action of California Trona Co. v. Harry E. Lee et al., pending in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of San Bernardino, showing that summons had issued therein and had been duly served on all the defendants therein; that petitioner E. H. Merrill (one of the defendants) was a necessary and material witness for plaintiff, and that said witness resided out of the county of San Bernardino, and more than 50 miles distant from the place of trial of said action, and in the county of Alameda. Upon the filing of this affidavit an order was made directing subpœna to issue, and the clerk of respondent issued a subpœna as directed, requiring the attendance of petitioner before H. B. Denson, a notary public, on November 9, 1916, at his office in San Francisco. The subpœna was duly served on petitioner, and a witness fee of $2.50 paid him, on November 3, 1916. Petitioner failed to appear at the time specified in the subpœna, or at all. This fact was made to appear to respondent by the certificate of the notary and the affidavit of Joseph K. Hutchinson. From the latter it appeared that petitioner resided within 50 miles of the place where said deposition was noticed for taking. On November 16, 1916, respondent made an order directing the sheriff to attach the petitioner and have him in court on November 29, 1916, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for disobeying said subpœna. This order, together with copies of the notary's certificate, affidavit of Joseph K. Hutchinson, and other papers relating to the matter, were served on petitioner on November 16, 1916. On November 29, 1916, petitioner appeared in court with counsel, and after argument respondent made an order, on December 5, 1916, finding and adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. Judgment on this order was duly entered and recorded on December 6, 1916, and petitioner by this proceeding seeks to have it reviewed and annulled.

[1] But two of the points discussed by petitioner in his brief require detailed notice. It is unquestioned that under the provisions of the second paragraph of subdivision 3 of section 1986 of the Code of Civil Procedure an order to take the deposition of a witness may be made by the superior court of a county other than that in which the action is pending. But the petitioner does question the power of that court to compel the attendance of a witness before an officer for the purpose of taking his deposition, when such witness resides outside of the county in which that court is situated, even though his place of residence be within 50 miles from the place where the deposition is noticed to be taken. In other words, the petitioner contends that since the action was pending in the superior court of San Bernardino the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco had no jurisdiction to require the petitioner, a resident of the county of Alameda, to appear in San Francisco for the purpose of there giving his deposition.

When a subpœna is issued to require the attendance of a witness before the superior court, or at the trial of an issue therein, the subpœna is issued by the clerk of the court as a matter of course, upon the application of the party desiring it. If it is issued to require attendance before a commissioner or other officer for the taking of a deposition, it must be issued by the clerk of the superior court of the county wherein the attendance is required upon an order of such court or of a judge thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1986. We can see no good reason why a subpœna issued by the clerk, upon the order of the superior court or a judge thereof, requiring the attendance of a witness before a commissioner or other officer for the purpose of giving his deposition, has not the same territorial force and effect as a subpœna issued by the clerk, requiring the attendance before the court, or at the trial of an issue therein; and accordingly we hold that such a subpœna may require the attendance of a witness for the purpose indicated, even though he resides outside of the county in which it is issued, but within the 50-mile limit.

[2] The remaining objection involves the question of whether or not it was the duty of the superior court, after a hearing upon the report of the officer of the disobedience of the witness, to make an order requiring the petitioner to obey the subpœna before finding him guilty of contempt of court—the solution of which question depends upon the construction and application of provisions of section 1991 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads:

> "Disobedience to a subpœna, or a refusal to be sworn, or to answer as a witness, or to subscribe an affidavit or deposition when required, may be punished as a contempt by the court issuing the subpœna. When the subpœna, in any such case, requires the attendance of the witness before an officer or commissioner out of court, it is the duty of such officer or commissioner to report any such disobedience or refusal to the court issuing the subpœna; and the witness must not be punished for any refusal to answer a question or to subscribe an affidavit or deposition, unless, after a hearing upon notice, the court orders him to so answer or subscribe and then only for disobedience to such order. Any judge, justice, or other officer mentioned in subdivision 3 of section 1986, may report any such disobedience or refusal to the superior court of the county in which such attendance was required; and such court thereupon has power, upon notice, to order the witness to perform the omitted act, and any refusal or neglect to comply with such order may be punished as a contempt of such court."

It is the contention of the petitioner that before the superior court may punish a witness for contempt of court for failure to obey a subpœna commanding him to appear before an officer for the purpose of giving his deposition, there must be a report to the court of such disobedience, and after a hearing thereon a direction to the witness by the court to obey the subpœna.

Counsel for the respondent, on the other hand, contends that such is the method designated by section 1991, only when the witness refuses to answer a question or to subscribe an affidavit or deposition; but that where he refuses to be sworn or disobeys the subpœna he is defying a direct and lawful order of the court, and that upon the establishment of either of these facts he may be punished as for a contempt of court by reason of such disobedience without the court making a further order that he perform the act in question.

A better reason may be conceived in the case of a refusal to answer a question or to subscribe an affidavit or deposition, for the requirement that the court, after a hearing upon the report of the officer concerning such refusal, should order the witness to perform the omitted act before punishing him for a contempt of court, than in the case of a failure to obey the subpœna. In the former case the question may be an improper one, and the witness justified in declining to answer it; and until the contrary has been determined by the court (the officer taking the deposition having no such authority), there has been no disobedience of a lawful command. But in the other case, the subpœna being lawfully issued, a refusal to obey it is a direct disobedience of the command of the court, and hence there would appear to be no logical necessity for the court to specially order the witness to appear before the officer as enjoined by the subpœna; nevertheless the lawmaking power in enacting the section above quoted may have deemed it advisable to provide that before a witness should be punished for disobeying a subpœna commanding him to appear before an officer and give his deposition, there should be an investigation by the court as to the sufficiency of the original showing, made ex parte for the order for the deposition, and of the good faith of the witness in refusing to obey the subpœna. However that may be, it seems to us that the language of the section makes no distinction between a refusal to answer questions or subscribe an affidavit or deposition, and a refusal to obey a subpœna or to be sworn. In each instance the refusal must be reported to the court, and, following the language of the section, upon the report of the "disobedience or refusal" to the superior court, the court has power upon notice "to order the witness to perform the omitted act, and any refusal or neglect to comply with such order, may be punished as a contempt of such court."

In the present case the record discloses that there was no order by the court to the petitioner upon notice "to perform the omitted act." The judgment of the respondent, therefore, finding him guilty of contempt of court in the premises, was beyond its jurisdiction.

The judgment is annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Jay H. Potter against the Back Country Transportation Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Doolittle & Morrison and Morganstern, McGee, Henning & Hendee, all of San Diego, for appellant. Kirk & Kirk, of San Diego, and E. E. Kirk, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The action is one to recover compensation for personal injuries which resulted from a collision between plaintiff and an automobile driven by a servant of the defendant. Pursuant to the verdict of a jury, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

[1, 2] There is evidence tending to show the following facts: Late in the afternoon of November 16, 1913, the plaintiff was walking across and toward the west side of Fourth street in the city of San Diego. After passing the middle of the street he saw defendant's car coming toward him at a distance of not more than 150 feet and at the rate of about 12 miles per hour. Observing that the automobile was changing its direction, the plaintiff took a step backward, checked himself, and then started backward again. Thereupon the automobile turned again toward the plaintiff and struck him. It knocked him about 8 feet, ran upon his leg and broke it, then reversed and backed away. If these were the facts, they were sufficient to authorize the jury to find in favor of the plaintiff upon his charge that the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, carelessly, and negligently struck the plaintiff with its automobile, whereby the plaintiff was injured. This is so, notwithstanding testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was intoxicated and that the plaintiff ran back into the path of the automobile after he had gotten across and out of danger. These were disputed facts, and the question of negligence of the defendant and also the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff were questions of fact to be determined by the jury in accordance with their belief derived from the testimony presented. The testimony of the plaintiff and his witnesses as to these matters was in conflict with the testimony of the witnesses produced by the defendant, and we are bound by the jury's determination of the facts. It may be noted, by the way, that the driver of the automobile was not a witness at the trial, although there is evidence indicating that his testimony could have been obtained. Appellant insists that it should not be held liable for the injury which plaintiff "sustained by suddenly stepping in front of defendant's automobile." The difficulty with this proposition is that, according to the testimony which the jury had a right to believe and did believe, the injury was not thus sustained.

Numerous objections are urged with respect to the instructions given by the court to the jury. These criticisms refer to an instruction defining negligence; to alleged failure of the court to give direction to the jury to find the circumstances surrounding the occasion under consideration, or the measure of care owed by the defendant to the plaintiff under those circumstances; to the alleged failure to instruct the jury that, if the plaintiff stepped in front of the automobile so close to it that there was not sufficient time in which the appellant could have prevented it from striking plaintiff, there was no duty on the defendant to avoid the accident, the failure to perform which duty is legal negligence; to alleged comments on the evidence, which appellant claims were charges to the jury upon matters of fact; to alleged errors of instructions to the jury upon the duty and obligation of the defendant towards plaintiff upon the theory that plaintiff had been placed in a position of emergency and of sudden and unexpected danger; to an alleged erroneous instruction upon the doctrine of "last clear chance"; to ambiguity and confusion in the instructions as a whole; to alleged errors in instructions upon the measure of damages.

[3] The record shows that the court refused to give instructions which were offered by the respective parties, but does not show what these instructions were. And we do not know how far the instructions given by the court on its own motion were inconsistent, or that they were inconsistent at all, with those requested by the appellant. With regard to omissions to give instructions, we need say no more than that an appellant may not here for the first time take advantage of the trial court's failure to give some specific instruction, if he presented no such instruction to that court. Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 697, 89 Pac. 976; Hardy v. Schirmer, 163 Cal. 272, 275, 124 Pac. 993.

[4] We find no prejudicial error in the instructions as given. Since a recital of those instructions would not raise any novel question of law or deal with any unusual application thereof, we shall not prolong the discussion very much beyond a general statement of our conclusions upon the objections presented, or set forth in detail our concurrence with appellant as to various inaccurate words and phrases which do not in any important sense affect the court's statement as a substantially correct exposition of the law. Notwithstanding these inaccuracies, the instructions contain a fair statement of the doctrine of negligence; of the rule requiring ordinary care on the part of the defendant to avoid injuring the plaintiff and requiring ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff to avoid exposing himself to injury; and of the rules governing the measure of damages. The language of the court in referring to the testimony did not in any instance amount to a statement of the judge's opinion upon any disputed fact; but, on the contrary, he directed the jury that in determining the facts they were not even to draw any hints or inferences from any statement made by him. There was testimony tending to show that by the change of direction of the automobile the plaintiff was suddenly placed in peril, and therefore the court was authorized to give the jury an instruction as to the duty of plaintiff under circumstances of sudden and unexpected danger.

[5] Complaint is made that the court stated that the doctrine of the last clear chance "has no application to the acts of the plaintiff in this case, so far as the circumstances involved in this case are concerned," and then proceeded to instruct on the subject on the contrary theory. The instruction as a whole is uncertain and confusing in its terms, and finally states that:

> "If you see fit to apply the last clear chance to plaintiff's actions, if you should believe that the plaintiff discovered that the automobile was in danger of being run into by him, or put in a place of danger, where it might suddenly be called upon to swerve and cause danger to itself or its driver, and that the plaintiff discovered that that danger was not apprehended or understood by the driver, and that he could by the exercise of ordinary care avoid it, or by the exercise of a high degree of care, avoid it, it was his duty to avoid it. I suppose the same rule does apply to both parties."

[6] It does not seem that appellant could have been injured by this instruction. As there was no injury to the automobile or to its driver, the last foregoing quoted statement hit only the viewless air, so far as this case is concerned. And there was no error in the court's earlier statement that the doctrine of last clear chance had no application to the acts of the plaintiff in this case. For, "strictly considered, this doctrine can be invoked only in favor of the person who is injured." Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 659, 117 Pac. 956.

Counsel for appellant state in their brief that the defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The transcript does not show that there is any appeal, other than from the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PLUMMER, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in the lower court dismissing the action herein for failure to file an amended complaint as allowed by the order of the trial court after sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's first amended complaint. The action was begun by the plaintiff to secure a decree rescinding, on the grounds of fraud and deceit, a contract of purchase for a tract of land comprising between eight and nine acres situated in Arboga Colony, county of Yuba, state of California, entered into between the plaintiff and defendant on or about the 15th day of October, 1912, and for the recovery of damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff. The demurrer to the complaint was both special and general, and was sustained by the lower court with leave to amend, which was not done.

[1] The complaint shows that the plaintiff, a Swede by birth, a farmer by occupation, was prior to the 10th day of October, 1912, a resident of the state of Michigan, of the same religious faith as one Hallner, living in Sacramento, in the state of California, a pastor of a church of the same faith as plaintiff; that on or about the 1st day of October, 1912, a letter was received by the plaintiff from said Hallner in reference to the Arboga Colony and its desirability as a place of residence. As this letter is made the foundation of the complaint, is annexed thereto and made a part thereof by proper references, the sufficiency of the complaint must, in large measure, be determined by the contents of the letter. The letter is as follows:

"Concerning Arboga Colony.

"Dear Brother in the Lord: Grace and Peace. It seems to be my duty to say a few words regarding Arboga Colony. I have myself looked over the ground and have myself made inquiries about it. Therefore I know what it contains. When I 9 years ago wrote up Turlock, I was abused, criticized by a great many. But they now must all acknowledge that I understood the case better and that I had a clear view of the future than those of my belligerent friends who criticized me at the time. My sole purpose at the time was to get together a great Swedish colony and a strong missionary movement. And I believe it must be admitted that we succeeded therein. I have now allowed myself to be persuaded to participate in the foundation and development of the Arboga Colony. And I am positive that it will succeed just the same as it succeeded in Turlock, sandstorms, grasshoppers and criticisms notwithstanding. It will succeed because God the Creator has ordained that the earth shall be filled and inhabited of people who will overcome and rule her (1 Mos. 1, 28). It must succeed because our purpose is the preservation of God's children in the faith and upbringing of the children in Christ and the faith of the fathers, and a vigorous missionary activity, which cannot be attained if our people are divided into small groups here and there. Think beside how costly missionary work is.

"Other conditions are much better in Arboga than they were in Turlock. A great quantity of potatoes was recently harvested, the largest and finest I have ever seen. All bearing witness to its extraordinary fertility.

"There we also find water transportation, lakes and fishing, for business as well as pleasure, in the neighborhood and also a good market and splendid communications. Our good land company has by means of restricting clauses in contract and deed shut out the liquor traffic and saloon keeping, as well as 'nuisances,' or in other words all that contend to degrade or lower the morals of the community.

"Just think what a great advantage this is; where have such opportunities ever been given to our people before? Can one imagine a place more fitted for homes for families and raising children? Moreover good milk cows are furnished free to new settlers who cultivate and live in their homes in such a way that half of their income from the cream is credited toward the payment of the cows. Mr. J. M. Henderson, Jr., cashier of the Sacramento Bank (which has 11,000 depositors with a combined capital of $6,210,539.97), is one of the largest owners. I have been acquainted with him for 17 years. No father or brother could have done more for our Swedish folk in and around Kingsburg and Riverside than he has done. He has been tried and found to be a true friend. It is therefore quite natural that I feel safe because I know that our people will be well treated and taken care of in Arboga. As far as the price of the land is concerned, it is cheap in proportion to the fertility of the soil and location.

"It is cheaper here at from $75 to $150 per acre than Turlock property was at from $25 to $32.50 per acre. I also believe that one can begin with the same capital here as there, but the prospect for himself and family for the future is far pleasanter.

"Finally, let me assure you that I have no connection with nor interest in the land company, nor have I received any allowance on the land I have bought, for which I have paid the same price as all others, but I do this out of pure interest for the Swedish people and for our mission.

"I believe in systematic colonizing by gathering our Swedish people in large Swedish communities, because it is better for them and better for the missionary activities, but not only that, our people will be protected against exploiters and schemers who will not stop extolling poor land for the sake of personal gain without the slightest possible care for the buyer's loss or ruin.

"I have already been requested to prepare plans as well as to produce drawings and the estimate for our meeting house or church, if one would so call it, and the building of which will take place in the near future.

"Preparations have accordingly been made to take care of both the colonists' temporal and spiritual welfare, which we, as Swedes and friends of the mission ought to duly appreciate.

"[Signed] A. Hallner.

"Sacramento Bank Bldg., Sacramento, Cal.

"March 1st, 1912."

The complaint then alleges:

"That in and by said letter said Hallner falsely pretended and represented to plaintiff:

"(A) That said land so offered for sale to plaintiff was of a character greatly superior to the land about Turlock, California.

"(B) That said land was a better bargain at $75.00 to $150.00 an acre than similar land at Turlock at $25.00 to $32.50 per acre.

"(C) That said land was of extraordinary fertility.

"(D) That a great quantity of potatoes had been recently harvested on said land, which were the choicest and finest ever seen by said representatives.

"(E) That said Hallner was not in any way financially interested in the sale of said land, and that the interest of said Hallner arose from his desire to get together a great Swedish colony, and promote a strong missionary movement."

That at the time said representations were made by said Hallner in said letter, said Hallner was an agent and employé of said defendant; that in said letter said Hallner fraudulently concealed from plaintiff the fact that said land was worthless and of no value, and that it was known as overflow land; and that there was present in it certain "hard pan," located at such distance from the surface that it was impracticable to drain the same of water so as to permit the profitable growth of plants and trees.

It is further alleged that the defendant, by means of advertising circulars sent by defendant to plaintiff—

"falsely pretended and represented that there was no hardpan in any of defendant's land so offered for sale; that said defendant in said circulars likewise fraudulently concealed from the plaintiff the fact that there was hardpan on said lands at such distance from the surface that it was impracticable to drain the same so as to permit profitable growth and culture of plants and trees; that an advertising circular was sent by defendant to plaintiff and received by plaintiff, reproducing as a part of said circular a photograph of a hop ranch, located near Wheatland in the county of Yuba, containing a picture of said Hallner in the foreground thereof, and said defendant falsely pretended and represented in said circular that said hop ranch was located in Arboga Colony; that another advertising circular was also sent by defendant to plaintiff, reproducing a photograph of an alfalfa field located near to the tract of land offered for sale by defendant, but not a part of said tract of land; and said defendant falsely pretended and represented to plaintiff in said circular that said alfalfa field was located in Arboga Colony."

It is further alleged that the plaintiff closed up his business in the state of Michigan, came to the state of California on or about the 15th day of October, 1912, was met by the said Hallner, who took charge of him and acted as friend and adviser, both business and spiritual. That the plaintiff relied implicitly upon said Hallner as such adviser, and believed him to be entirely actuated by spiritual motives, etc.

It is further alleged that upon the plaintiff's arrival at Arboga, defendant, through its representatives, exhibited the land referred to, while the same was free from overflow and during the dry season, and repeated the representations previously made by defendant, as aforesaid, prior to plaintiff's arrival, and continued to conceal the existence of the facts so concealed, and such false representations and such fraudulent concealments then and there made by defendant and its representatives were as heretofore stated, repeating in substance and with almost identical language the allegations hereinbefore set forth; and further alleging "that plaintiff was totally ignorant of the existence of the facts and entirely unfamiliar with swamp and overflow lands; that said representations so made by the defendant and its representatives both before and after the arrival of the plaintiff at Arboga, were false, as defendant and its representatives then and there well knew."

It is further alleged that the plaintiff did not discover the falsity of the alleged representations until during the winter of 1913–1914, when the lands referred to were flooded by the high waters of that season, whether by breaking the levees referred to in the complaint, or otherwise, does not appear; and by reason of the flooding great damage was suffered and the lands rendered entirely unfit for the purposes for which they were falsely represented to be fit. It will be seen by the allegations of the complaint that reliance was placed by the plaintiff upon the representations made by Hallner, and not upon anything said or done by any other representative of the defendant. While it is alleged that other representatives made similar statements, and that circulars were sent by the defendant to the plaintiff, the complaint is entirely silent as to any confidence being placed therein by the plaintiff, or that he made any purchases on account of any such representations. The complaint is also silent as to whether the representations made by Hallner in his letter were actually known by him to be false, or were in truth and in fact false, other than by way of mere recital. The language of the complaint is, "That in and by said letter said Hallner falsely pretended and represented to plaintiff," etc. The pleader, by paragraph 8 of his complaint, after stating that different representatives of the company had made certain representations, uses the following language:

> "That said representations so made by defendant and its representatives, both before and after the arrival of the plaintiff at Arboga, were false, as defendant and its representatives then and there well knew."

This is not a direct allegation that anything said or written by Hallner was either false, or known by him to be false. The special demurrer calls direct attention to this defect. An analysis of the letter shows that the principal purpose of the writer was the building up or founding of a Swedish colony of his own religious faith. This is not alleged to be either false or fraudulent. After speaking of the conditions in Arboga, the letter states:

> "A great quantity of potatoes was recently harvested, the largest and finest I have ever seen, all bearing witness to its extraordinary fertility."

From all that appears in the complaint, Arboga Colony may have produced a large quantity of potatoes, and of a quality asserted by Hallner. The language of the complaint is, "that a great quantity of potatoes had been recently harvested on said land." This is not an allegation that such potatoes were not raised in Arboga Colony; it is, at most, only an allegation that they were not raised on the small tract bargained for by the plaintiff. The letter further states: That market communications are good; this is not denied. That the deeds to the different tracts in Arboga Colony contain stringent clauses restricting the liquor traffic. The truth of this statement is not questioned. Then follows a reference to what one J. M. Henderson, of Sacramento, has done for the Swedish people. Upon this question the complaint is also silent. A comparison is then drawn as to the respective values of land in Turlock, Cal., and lands situate in the Arboga Colony. There is nothing in the complaint showing that this statement was not made in good faith, and, when carefully analyzed, whether such statement is not in fact true. The letter then concludes with the statement of the writer's belief in the advisability of colonizing and gathering the Swedish people together in large communities; that the writer had been requested to prepare plans for a Swedish meetinghouse or church. There is nothing in the letter, nor is there anything in the complaint, from which the trial court could infer that Hallner knew anything about any hardpan underneath the lands in Arboga Colony, or from which it can be inferred that Hallner was fraudulently or otherwise concealing such fact, if it be a fact. Nor is there anything in the complaint, or in the letter, from which the trial court could infer that Hallner was concealing from the plaintiff that the lands involved are worthless or of no value, if such be the fact. The language of the complaint in this particular, in the first instance, is as follows:

> "That in said letter said Hallner fraudulently concealed from plaintiff the fact that said land was worthless and of no value."

And further on, as a basis for charging the valuelessness of the lands, the complaint alleges:

> "That said land was inundated from flood waters to the plaintiff's great damage, rendering the same entirely unfit for the purposes for which it was falsely represented to be fit, as aforesaid."

This is not an allegation that the lands were otherwise than as represented by Hallner, or that they are not, in fact, both valuable and fertile; nor is there any allegation in the complaint alleging the actual existence of hardpan underneath the lands described therein, the nearest approach being the statement that said Hallner concealed from plaintiff that there was present in it certain hardpan located at such distance from the surface that it was impracticable to drain the same. If such were, in fact, the case, there might be "certain hardpan" in the land, and yet the tract, as a whole, still fertile and valuable.

Much time and space has been occupied by counsel in their briefs touching the question as to when an expression of opinion may be regarded as equivalent to a statement of a fact and rescission granted, but from the analysis of the complaint and the letter upon which it is based, as hereinbefore set forth, it does not seem to the court necessary to review a long list of authorities on questions which are not disputed.

[2, 3] The real point involved in this action is decided in the case of Baker-Boyer National Bank v. Hughson, 5 Wash. 100, 31 Pac. 423. The court there says:

> "The simple statement that such representations were false and fraudulent, in the absence of any statement of what the real facts were, is a simple conclusion of law, and no issue of fact could be made upon it."

That the mere expression of opinions by a vendor is not such a misrepresentation as might avoid a sale, even although such opinions are not warranted by the facts, is too well established to require the citation of authority. The allegation in that case was as follows:

> "That it was falsely and fraudulently represented that said real estate was situated," etc.

Here, it is not pretended that Hallner fraudulently represented anything, it being alleged only that he falsely represented and pretended. This language does not include any element of willfulness or lack of good faith on the part of the person making the representation, or that the truth is actually different from such representations.

In the case of Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 386, 92 Pac. 1013, the language of the complaint was, "falsely and fraudulently," but the court points out that no special demurrer was interposed, and says:

> "If the objection had been raised by special demurrer for uncertainty, perhaps it might have been held fatal, but no demurrer was filed to the complaint. The defendant answered, denying practically all the substantial allegations of the complaint, and the case was tried upon the theory that the complaint was sufficiently direct and positive."

The court further says:

> "The lack of a direct allegation that the statements were untrue, conceding it to be a defect, is one of that character which, in the absence of a special demurrer, is cured by the verdict of the jury or the finding of the court, and which cannot be taken advantage of when urged for the first time on appeal."

And, further:

> "The same rule applies to the defect of allegation of fraudulent intent on the part of Gorrill. While the allegation that he made the statements 'falsely and fraudulently' to induce Spreckels to buy, might not, in the face of proper special demurrer, supply the place of a direct allegation that Gorrill knew them to be untrue, or made them in a manner not warranted by his own information, although he believed them to be true, nevertheless it implies all this; and, where no special demurrer is interposed, it will be held sufficient after the verdict or decision upon the merits."

[4] In that case it was alleged that the representations were made falsely and fraudulently and with intent to deceive. In the case at bar, it is only when Hallner falsely pretended and represented without any fraudulent intent; and, so far as the complaint goes, without any purpose to deceive or mislead the plaintiff in any particular. The trial court upon demurrer held:

> "That it was not alleged in the complaint that the false statements were made with intent to deceive the plaintiff or induce him to make the purchase to his injury" (citing Sutherland Code Pleading, § 6886; Barber v. Morgan, 51 Barb. [N. Y.] 116; Heller v. Dyerville, 116 Cal. 133, 47 Pac. 1016).

And, further, that there was no allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff had, in fact, been injured by reason of his purchase, citing Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 588, 53 Pac. 26. This defect in the complaint further appears by reference to 12 R. C. L. § 167, where it is stated:

> "Fraudulent intent must be alleged in all cases where it is a material ingredient of a fraud relied on. In an action of deceit, it is proper to allege facts showing knowledge on the part of the defendant that his representations were false, and generally in such an action scienter must be alleged either expressly or by alleged facts which are tantamount thereto. It must also be alleged that the representations were made with a fraudulent intent, and for the purpose of inducing the other party to act on them. In all cases where the representations relied on relate to matters of opinion, it must be alleged that they were knowingly false, and were not honestly given."

Nothing of this kind appears in plaintiff's amended complaint. If the necessary facts existed to constitute a cause of action, the trial court, allowing 20 days within which to file a second amended complaint, provided ample time.

We are of the opinion that the defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint was properly sustained, and that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, we deem it proper to say that we do not desire to be understood as approving everything stated in the opinion of that court.

It seems to us that there can be no question of the correctness of the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer on the ground, among others, that it was not alleged in the complaint that the false statements were made with intention to deceive the plaintiff or induce him to make the purchase to his injury.

This being so, the judgment of that court would have to be affirmed in any event.

Ex parte MADALINA. (Cr. 2032.)

1. BASTARDS 🔑1—NONSUPPORT—LIABILITY OF FATHER OF ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—STATUTE.

Civ. Code, § 195, provides that the presumption of legitimacy can be disputed only by the husband or wife or the descendants of one or both of them. Pen. Code, § 270, provides that the parent of either a legitimate or illegitimate minor child shall be liable to a criminal prosecution, as each parent is liable under Civ. Code, § 196a, to a civil action, for its nonsupport. Held, that while under Pen. Code, § 270, the father of an illegitimate child may be prosecuted criminally for its nonsupport, a criminal proceeding will lie against the father only where the child is the illegitimate offspring of an unmarried woman, and will not lie in the case of a child which was born in wedlock, though in fact illegitimate, since the state cannot raise the question of legitimacy.

2. Bastards 🔑1—Nonsupport—Authority of State to Raise Question of Legitimacy—Statute.

Authority in the state to raise the question of legitimacy where a child is born in wedlock is not to be implied from the enactment of Pen. Code, § 270, authorizing criminal proceeding for nonsupport of legitimate or illegitimate child, since the provision applies to cases where the question of the legitimacy of the child will not arise or will be a proper subject of inquiry at the suit of the state.

In Bank. Petition for habeas corpus by Andrew Madalina. Writ granted, and petitioner ordered discharged from custody.

E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for petitioner. Clarence F. Lea, Dist. Atty., and C. W. Hoyle, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Petitioner seeks his release in this habeas corpus proceeding from the custody of the sheriff of Sonoma county, who holds him under a commitment by a magistrate to answer before the superior court of that county for failure to provide for his alleged illegitimate child. The facts presented on the hearing before the magistrate and upon which the commitment was based, but which are claimed to be legally insufficient to warrant his detention, are stipulated by the attorney for petitioner and the district attorney of Sonoma county.

The petitioner was prosecuted under section 270 of the Penal Code as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 572), which reads as follows:

> "A parent of either a legitimate or illegitimate minor child who willfully omits, without lawful excuse, to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance for his child, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or in the county jail, not exceeding two years, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by both."

The facts as stipulated are that the minor child referred to in the complaint is about eight months old; that it was born in lawful wedlock to a woman whose husband was alive when said child was born to her and between whom there had been no judgment of divorce. At the preliminary examination, so it is stipulated, the mother testified to the nonaccess of her husband or of any person other than said petitioner for a period of two years next prior to the birth of the child. It was further stipulated that no action had ever been begun by the said mother or by any other person under section 196a of the Civil Code to determine the parentage of said child or to obtain a judgment against the petitioner or any other person for the support of said child and that there is no such judgment.

In disposing of this petition, several sections of the Codes are to be taken into consideration.

Section 196a of the Civil Code, a moment ago referred to, provides:

> "The father as well as the mother, of an illegitimate child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. A civil suit to enforce such obligations may be maintained in behalf of a minor illegitimate child, by his mother or guardian, and in such action the court shall have power to order and enforce performance thereof, the same as under sections 138, 139, and 140 of the Civil Code, in a suit for divorce by a wife."

By section 193 of the Civil Code it is provided that "all children born in wedlock are presumed to be legitimate."

Section 195 of the same Code declares:

> "Who May Dispute the Legitimacy of a Child.—The presumption of legitimacy can be disputed only by the husband or wife, or the descendant of one or both of them. Illegitimacy, in such case, may be proved like any other fact."

The sections quoted are all the sections of the Code, criminal or civil, which bear directly upon the principal, and in our opinion the sole question involved here, namely, whether the state of California in a criminal prosecution of this character brought in its name is authorized to question the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock.

The first legislation in this state of the nature involved here was enacted in 1913, when section 196a, heretofore quoted, was passed providing for a civil suit at the instance of the mother of an illegitimate child, or its guardian, against its father for its support and education. In 1914, one Gambetta was prosecuted under section 270 of the Penal Code as it then stood; it being claimed that the said section 270, aided by section 196a, provided for the criminal prosecution of the father of an illegitimate child for its nonsupport. This court on habeas corpus (In re Gambetta, 169 Cal. 100, 145 Pac. 1005) held that section 270 of the Penal Code as it then stood had no application to the father of an illegitimate child, and that section 196a of the Civil Code, adopted in 1913, imposing an obligation on a father to support his illegitimate child, had not changed the application of said section 270 of the Penal Code in any way. Subsequent to this decision, and in 1915, the Legislature amended section 270 of the Penal Code to provide as it does now that the parent of either a legitimate or illegitimate minor child shall be liable to criminal prosecution, as each still remains, under section 196a of the Civil Code, liable to a civil action for its nonsupport. While it thus appears that under the amendment to section 270 of the Penal Code the father of an illegitimate child may be prosecuted criminally for its nonsupport, it is contended by counsel for petitioner that a criminal proceeding will lie, under said section, against the father only in a case where the child is the illegitimate offspring of his intercourse with an unmarried woman and that it will not lie, and was not intended to lie, against him in the case of a child which had been born in wedlock. The last portion of the contention of petitioner is the only point in the case which we deem it necessary to consider. As amplified by him in his argument, his position respecting it is this: That it being conceded that this child, of which the petitioner is alleged to be the father, was born in wedlock, the presumption is that it is legitimate; that the declared policy of this state as expressed in its legislation is that the presumption of such legitimacy can be disputed only by the husband or wife or the descendants of one of them; that no one else may do so; that the state having thus by express legislation inhibited any question as to the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock being raised except as above indicated cannot itself raise it in a criminal prosecution or other proceeding. It is, of course, to be understood that, when it is said that the state cannot itself raise the question of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock, it is not meant that it has no power to enact legislation authorizing such inquiry in a proceeding in its name, but only that it has not so far done so; that, on the contrary, it has denied itself this right by expressly declaring who of others alone may do so.

[1] We are satisfied that the position of counsel for petitioner is correct, and that any claim to the contrary is answered by a consideration simply of section 195 of the Civil Code, which declares that the presumption of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock can only be raised by the husband or wife or the descendants of one of them. This is the declared policy of this state and is simply the adoption of a rule prevailing generally in all civilized communities. If the state has decided to depart from that policy, it certainly has not declared that intent by any express language found in or any reasonable inference to be deduced from the terms of section 270 itself, or considered in connection with section 196a. Counsel for respondent strenuously contends that section 195 of the Civil Code is inapplicable, because the criminal proceeding under section 270 is found in the Penal Code which as to all criminal procedure governs. But this contention is not sound. A mere place in the Codes is not decisive of the effect or the application of Code provisions. The Civil Code by section 195 was laying down a rule of public policy in a matter which the state deemed vital to society; it was following the civilized rule and made it applicable under all circumstances where the question of legitimacy of children born in wedlock was sought to be raised, prescribing a limitation as to the persons who might raise the question by expressly enumerating those who might do so; it eliminated itself from doing it under an application of the familiar rule that an enumeration of persons to be affected by a Code provision is an implied exclusion of all others. By the Civil Code section the inquiry was expressly limited on behalf of certain persons. When it came to providing for proceedings under section 270, the Legislature did not in any language found therein, or anywhere else, abrogate what it had laid down in section 195 as to questioning the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock. This section 195 is to be considered with section 270 as in pari materia with the latter and must be construed as a part of it. Pol. Code, § 4480 et seq.

[2] But it is said by counsel for respondent that authority to raise the question of legitimacy where the child is born in wedlock must be implied from the enactment of section 270 authorizing the criminal proceeding; that such a proceeding can only be brought in the name of the state. True, the criminal proceeding must be in the name of the state —the people—and is authorized to punish the parent of an illegitimate or legitimate child for an omission without excuse to support it. Parents of legitimate children may be prosecuted at the suit of the state; parents of illegitimates born out of wedlock may also be prosecuted. So that the Code provision is not without cases for its application where the question of the legitimacy of the child will not arise or where it will be a proper subject of inquiry at the suit of the state. But when it is attempted to bring within its terms in a criminal prosecution a question of the legitimacy of children born in wedlock, there is nothing directly or inferentially in the language of section 270 which authorizes the state to raise that question. To the contrary, the expressly declared policy of the state as found in section 195 precludes it from doing so, and in the interests of public policy, decency, morality, and the protection of innocent children this commends itself. Public policy and common decency are opposed to the bastardizing of children born in wedlock against the wishes and perhaps against the protest of their putative parents. If neither the husband nor the wife to an existing marriage desires to raise any question of the legitimacy of a child born during its existence, the best interests and welfare of society will be promoted if the state likewise declines to intervene in raising that question. It will appear, too, that the welfare, comfort, and happiness of innocent children are, under this policy of the state, best conserved, as they are protected against the stigma of illegitimacy, or aspersions cast upon their birth being raised by third persons, either through excessive zeal or actuated by sinister motives in criminal proceedings brought in the name of the state.

The writ is granted, and the petitioner ordered discharged from custody.

In order that there be such joint undertaking, it is not sufficient merely that the passenger or occupant indicate the route or destination, and the circumstances must show that the occupant and the driver together had such control and direction over the automobile as to be practically in the joint or common possession thereof.

Under Civ. Code, § 1714, providing that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care except so far as the latter has brought the injury upon himself, in order that the negligence of one person may be imputed to another, they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim, "Qui facit per alium facit per se," applies.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by G. L. Bryant against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff was granted a new trial, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, E. E. Morris, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. G. L. Bryant brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by one of the defendant's electric cars colliding with an automobile in which he was riding. At the time of the accident the plaintiff's son was driving the machine. A trial was held before a jury which resulted in a verdict for the defendant, but, on motion by the plaintiff, a new trial was granted "solely on the ground that the court erred in instructing the jury that negligence of the driver of the automobile, if any, was to be imputed to the plaintiff." The defendant appeals from this order.

That the court did so instruct the jury is not questioned. One of the pertinent instructions, for instance, reads:

> "The actions of the said driver of the said automobile, the son of the plaintiff herein, are in law the actions of the plaintiff in this case; that is to say, if the said driver of said automobile, the son of plaintiff, was guilty of negligence, such negligence is imputable to the said plaintiff, and is a bar to this case, if it contributed directly or proximately to the collision between the said car and the said automobile."

Again:

> "If you find from the evidence that the said driver of said automobile was guilty of negligence in swerving upon or entering upon the said railroad tracks, * * * then no recovery can be had in this action."

These and other instructions of like effect were given to the jury at the request of the defendant, and indicate the theory upon which it based its defense and upon which the court tried the case. In addition, the following special interrogatory was submitted to the jury wherein all distinction between the independent contributory negligence of the plaintiff and that of the driver is wholly ignored:

> "Was the plaintiff or his son driving the automobile guilty of negligence, which contributed proximately, in any degree, to the collision between the street car and the automobile?"

The answer was "Yes." Clearly, if under the evidence adduced at the trial the negligence of the son is not to be imputed to the plaintiff as a matter of law, the order granting the new trial was proper and must be affirmed.

The automobile in which the plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident was owned by the Bryant Upholstery & Furniture Company, "a close corporation, consisting of the Bryant family, father, mother, and son, mostly, which held the controlling interest." The plaintiff was president of the corporation, and his son the secretary and manager. The corporation used the automobile in its business in delivering goods and going to various houses in the city and collecting furniture to be upholstered. According to the evidence, "instead of having the expense of keeping the automobile up town," it was always kept in the barn at the plaintiff's residence. At this residence the plaintiff lived with his wife and son. On the day of the accident, at closing time, it became necessary to make a delivery for the corporation on the east side of the city, which was on a detour and not a direct line to the garage where the machine was kept. The plaintiff and his wife were at the place of business, and, together with the son driving the automobile, made the delivery. On their way home the plaintiff rode on a box placed on the rear of the automobile and steadied himself by turning a little to the side and holding to the back of the front seat. His wife rode on the front seat at the left of the son. There was evidence submitted by the plaintiff:

> "That the plaintiff had no control or direction mechanically in the driving or management of said automobile at the time of said accident, but the same was under the full control and direction mechanically of the plaintiff's son, the said Leslie G. Bryant, who was 29 years of age and an experienced driver of automobiles."

Other evidence was to the effect:

> "That the father, mother, and son were driving home to supper; that the father was not paying any fare; that the father and mother and son were simply going toward home as a family, and the son was driving wherever the father, mother, and son wanted to go."

While thus driving south on Moneta avenue in the city of Los Angeles, and approaching West Fortieth place, the car was driven on to the south-going track of the defendant's railroad, where it was suddenly overtaken from the rear by a "beach car," a car larger than an ordinary street car, which was traveling "at a tremendous rate of speed." In the collision which resulted plaintiff received the injuries complained of.

[1] This court has but recently reiterated the well-settled rule that a guest or passenger in a vehicle driven or operated by another is not ordinarily bound by the negligence of the driver or operator. Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460. In that case the negligence of a person operating a motorcycle was held not to be imputed as matter of law to his brother, who was riding as his guest on the rear seat. The case at bar presents a somewhat different question. But first it may be observed that the mere relationship of the plaintiff and his son cannot, as suggested, take the case out of the rule. Board of Commissioners v. Mutchler, 137 Ind. 140, 36 N. E. 534.

[2] Nor does the added circumstance that both persons were employed by or interested in the same corporation necessarily alter the situation. In Siever v. Pittsburgh, etc., Ry. Co., 252 Pa. 1, 97 Atl. 116, it was held that the negligence of a street car conductor in causing a collision with a railroad train could not be imputed to the motorman "merely because they were working together on the same car" so as to prevent his recovery in an action brought against the railroad company. In McBride v. Des Moines City Ry. Co., 134 Iowa, 398, 109 N. W. 618, the negligence of a driver of a hose wagon was held not to be imputable to another member of the fire department who was riding with him at the time of a collision with the defendant's street car. In Baxter v. St. Louis Transit Co., 103 Mo. App. 597, 78 S. W. 70, the fact that plaintiff's son was engaged in helping to deliver ice along with the driver of an ice wagon at the time of the accident was held not to constitute such a relation as to make the negligence of the driver the negligence of the son. This is further illustrated by Johnston v. Delano (Iowa) 154 N. W. 1013. In that case it was held that, even though the plaintiff's employé negligently drove a team into collision with one of the defendant's trains, it constituted no defense to an action brought by plaintiff to recover for the death of his minor son, who was riding with the employé as a helper at the time of the accident. These authorities are in accord with the cases in this state, and to this extent the reasoning of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, does not apply. See Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652. The family relation, or the business association, therefore, does not of itself identify the plaintiff with the driver so as to impute to him the latter's alleged contributory negligence.

[3, 4] The rule is otherwise, however, if the occupant of the machine exercised control over the driver thereof, or, in the eyes of the law, may be said to possess such power of control. Illustrations of the application of this doctrine are found in cases where the parties are engaged in a common or joint enterprise. Ruling Case Law, after referring to the different rules as to whether negligence may be imputed to a guest or passenger in an automobile, says:

> "There seems to be no difference of opinion as to the rule that, when two persons are engaged in a joint enterprise in the use of an automobile, the contributory negligence of one will bar a recovery by either, if it is in a matter within the scope of the joint undertaking." Volume 2, p. 1208, § 43.

But in order that there be such a joint undertaking it is not sufficient merely that the passenger or occupant of the machine indicate to the driver or chauffeur the route he may wish to travel, or the places to which he wishes to go, even though in this respect there exists between them a common enterprise of riding together. The circumstances must be such as to show that the occupant and the driver together had such control and direction over the automobile as to be practically in the joint or common possession of it.

> "Parties cannot be said to be engaged in a joint enterprise, within the meaning of the law of negligence, unless there be a community of interest in the objects or purposes of the undertaking, and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto. Each must have some voice and right to be heard in its control and management." St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bell (Okl.) 159 Pac. 336; Atwood v. Utah Light, etc., Ry. Co., 44 Utah, 366, 140 Pac. 137; Cotton v. Willmar, etc., Ry. Co., 99 Minn. 366, 109 N. W. 835, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 643, 116 Am. St. Rep. 422, 9 Ann. Cas. 935.

In the case first cited, which arose out of a collision of a street car with an automobile in which the deceased was riding with a number of lady friends, the court, upon a careful consideration of the authorities, said:

> "Assuming that the trip was a 'joy ride,' as contended, it was not a joint or common undertaking."

Martindale v. Oregon Short Line Ry. Co. (Utah) 160 Pac. 275, and Lawrence v. Sioux City, 172 Iowa, 320, 154 N. W. 494, are recent cases of similar import. A case of a joint or common undertaking, however, is Van Horn v. Simpson, 35 S. D. 640, 153 N. W. 883. In that case the court held that, where the evidence showed that the occupant of an automobile was a partner of the driver and owner thereof, and was at the time of the accident engaged with his partner, the driver, in the prosecution of copartnership business, both parties were joint participants in the alleged negligence. Likewise in Washington & C. O. Ry. v. Zell's Adm'x, 118 Va. 755, 88 S. E. 309, the deceased and another person took an automobile trip in a machine which the deceased, according to his custom, put in readiness for the trip, and both participated in running it. The machine was owned by the deceased's companion. It was properly held that the parties were engaged in a joint enterprise or adventure; for the right of control of either person over the other is readily apparent.

That all the authorities do not require evidence of the exercise of such control to establish a joint enterprise is quite true. Thus Berry's Law of Automobiles (2d Ed.) § 322, points out that in many cases where the doctrine of imputed negligence has been applied the relation between such persons, while somewhat similar to that of master and servant, as a matter of fact "lacks the essential element of that relation of control."

> "Neither," he continues, "has control of the details by means of which the common purpose is executed. Hence the only theory on which one may be charged with the negligence of another is that each is engaged in the performance of the plans which all have agreed upon and which are as personal to one as to another. It is a sort of partnership, as it were."

Such a case is Wentworth v. Town of Waterbury (Vt.) 96 Atl. 334, where apparently the only basis for the imputation of the negligence of the driver of the automobile to the plaintiff was the circumstance that they were both engaged in the common purpose of taking two ladies for an afternoon's drive to view a lake.

[5] In our opinion, the doctrine of imputable negligence should not be so loosely applied. To do so leaves the law in an uncertain state. The better view is expressed by Nonn v. Chicago City Ry. Co., 232 Ill. 378, 83 N. E. 924, 122 Am. St. Rep. 114:

> "There can be no such thing as imputable negligence, except in those cases where such a relation exists as that of master and servant or of principal and agent. In order that the negligence of one person may be properly imputed to another, they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se directly applies."

Indeed, no other rule is consistent with section 1714 of the Civil Code, wherein it is declared that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care "except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself." (Italics ours.)

[6] It is clear, therefore, that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the question of fact as to whether the plaintiff exercised or had the right of exercising control over the son in driving the automobile home at the time of the collision. Had it been properly instructed, it may have found that the son, as manager of the Bryant Upholstery & Furniture Company, had full and absolute control over the movements of the machine and recognized as his superior only the corporation, and then only such orders as might be given by its officers when acting in their official capacity. This, of course, is not a case where the corporate entity may be disregarded. As far as the plaintiff's right of control existed at the time of the accident, the jury may have concluded that it, in fact, extended no further than that control common to guests or passengers for hire. There was evidence that the son was an adult person and an experienced driver of automobiles, and the jury may have found the fact to be that he was in all respects an independent agent. The machine, it should be repeated, belonged to the corporation. It may be conceded that the plaintiff and his son were jointly interested in the conduct of the business of the corporation. But it does not necessarily follow that they possessed a joint or community interest in the matter of driving the automobile. These and other questions of similar import involve matters of fact for the jury to determine in the light of the principles of law we have enunciated.

The order granting the new trial is affirmed.

McDOUGALD, City and County Treasurer, v. LILIENTHAL et al. (S. F. 6790.)

1. TAXATION ⚿864 — INHERITANCE TAX — STATUTE.

Inheritance Tax Law 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341) § 1, defining the property for whose transfer by act or by operation of law a tax is imposed, imposes a tax (1) upon all property passing by will or by the intestate laws of the state, and (2) upon all property of a nonresident, which, regardless of its mode of transfer or succession, shall be within the state.

2. Taxation 🔑867(1) — Inheritance Tax — Property Within State — Probate Proceedings.

The imposition, under Inheritance Tax Law 1905, § 1, of an inheritance tax upon all property of a nonresident, which, regardless of its mode of transfer or succession, shall be within the state, is not dependent upon any proceedings in probate, ancillary or otherwise, had within the state; the state having exercised its unquestioned power to tax property within its territorial limits and jurisdiction without regard to such proceedings.

3. Taxation 🔑867(2) — Inheritance Tax — Ownership of Property in State—Corporate Stock.

Ownership by a New York decedent of a portion of the capital stock of a California corporation, which ownership was evidenced by certificates of stock located in the state of New York, was ownership of property within California within the Inheritance Tax Law, since stock in a domestic corporation is subject to the tax at the corporation's domicile, though decedent was a nonresident, regardless of the place where the certificates may be kept.

4. Descent and Distribution 🔑5—Law of Domicile—Personalty.

The law of a decedent's domicile controls the disposition of his personal property, where the law at the location of the property is not in conflict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 19–22.]

5. Judgment 🔑822(3)—Effect of Decree of Distribution in Other State.

Under the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States (U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1), the decree of distribution of a New York decedent's property in the probate court of New York does not preclude the right of the state of California to levy an inheritance tax on shares of stock in a California corporation owned by decedent, since the full faith and credit clause does not impose any limitation on the sovereign right of a state to tax property within it, including the right to impose an inheritance tax.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Petition by John E. McDougald, as Treasurer of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, against Alice M. Lilienthal and another, for the exaction of an inheritance tax. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hartley F. Peart and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco (U. S. Webb and Albert H. Elliott, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Albert Lilienthal, a nonresident of this state and a resident of the state of New York, died intestate in the city and state of New York. At the time of his death he was the owner of 1,386 shares of the capital stock of the Lilienthal Company, a California corporation, having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco. The certificates representing his ownership in the capital stock of the corporation were, at the time of the decedent's death, in the city of New York. This property was distributed in probate proceedings by the courts of the state of New York, and these shares were distributed to the respondents upon this appeal, who are, respectively, one the widow, the other the son, of the deceased. The inheritance tax imposed through the succession of ownership of this stock under the laws of the state of New York was duly paid. No probate proceedings upon the estate of the deceased have been had in the state of California. The inheritance tax law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341) is the California law which was in force at the time of the death of the decedent. The treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, appellant herein, filed a petition as contemplated by the law looking to the exaction of a tax upon this personal property under our law. The respondents herein answered, hearing was had, and the court gave judgment against the treasurer's contention. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

Section 1 of the act of 1905 is the section defining the property for whose transfer by act or by operation of law a tax is imposed. The construction of this section gives rise to the principal controversy between these parties. The section, in so far as it is here necessary to quote it, provides as follows:

> "All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state * * * shall be and is subject to a tax hereinafter provided for. * * *"

Respondents' interpretation of this language, which was adopted by the trial court, is that the state has imposed this tax only on "all property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state"; that in the succeeding part of the sentence, grammatically and by necessary construction (since this tax proceeding is admittedly one in invitum), the words "which property" have direct reference to and in their meaning are limited by the opening words of the act; that, consequently, the state has declared its intention to tax only property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, which property, if the property of a resident, shall be taxed wherever situated, but which property, if the property of a nonresident, shall not be taxed unless situated in this state. As the property here under consideration is unquestionably personal property, and as it did not pass to these respondents either by will or by the intestate laws of this state (propositions which may not be controverted), it is not subject to the tax here sought to be imposed. Such is respondents' position.

[1, 2] Indisputably, if respondents' construction of the section is sound, the conclusion drawn from that construction is unanswerable. But with that construction we cannot agree. It may be at once conceded that the language lacks the clearness which should be found in every law, and especially in a law imposing the burden of a tax. But it is taken bodily from the statute of New York, and had been construed by the highest court of that state before its adoption into the law of this state, and the meaning given to it was, in effect, that the grammatical construction of the sentence was faulty and that it meant to impose a tax, first, upon all property passing by will or by the intestate laws of this state, and, second, upon all property of a nonresident, which, regardless of its mode of transfer or succession, shall be within the state. Such is not only the interpretation of the highest court of New York, but is likewise the interpretation of the highest court of Illinois under its statute identical in this respect with our own. People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313. The declaration of this court in Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 108 Pac. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, to the effect that the language in the first lines of the section "pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state" means to pass by virtue and effect of the law of this state governing testacy or intestacy, is, of course, perfectly sound. But this court was not there called upon to review the language of the whole section. It was dealing with the much narrower question, namely, whether a homestead set apart by the probate court constituted property passing by will or by the intestate laws. The unescapable conclusion that our law designs to tax all of the property of a nonresident deceased, which is within the state, carries with it the additional determination that the imposition of this tax is in no wise dependent upon any proceedings in probate, ancillary or otherwise, had within the state. Without regard to such proceedings, the state has exercised its unquestioned power to tax property, within its territorial limits and jurisdiction, over which it has extended the protection of its laws.

We are thus brought to the second and subordinate question, namely: is the property, within the meaning of our inheritance tax law, within the state? The familiar maxim mobilia sequuntur personam is one, it may not be questioned, which the state in its taxing laws may modify or reverse. In the case of the statute under consideration it is declared that all the property of a nonresident within the state shall be subject to the tax. It has (section 28) defined property very broadly to include real and personal property and interests therein.

[3] Our next consideration is whether this ownership by the deceased of a portion of the capital stock of a California corporation, which ownership was evidenced by printed and written certificates, which certificates in turn were in the state of New York, is of property within this state. Of this our own decisions as well as those of other jurisdictions remove all doubt. The proposition is thus stated in 37 Cyc. 1562, subd. "b":

> "Shares of stock in a domestic corporation are subject to the tax at the domicile of the corporation on their transfer by will or under the intestate laws, although the decedent was a nonresident and this without regard to the place where the certificate may be kept."

To the same effect are our own cases of Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 971, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90; McDougald v. Low, 164 Cal. 107, 127 Pac. 1027; Matter of James, 144 N. Y. 6, 38 N. E. 961; Estate of Bronson, 150 N. Y. 1, 44 N. E. 707, 34 L. R. A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632; Estate of Fitch, 160 N. Y. 87, 54 N. E. 701; Palmer's Estate, 183 N. Y. 238, 76 N. E. 16; Greves v. Shaw, 173 Mass. 205, 53 N. E. 372; Gardiner v. Carter, 74 N. H. 507; Douglas County v. Kountze, 84 Neb. 506, 121 N. W. 593; Morrow v. Gould, 145 Iowa, 1, 123 N. W. 743, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 384.

[4, 5] It is finally contended that under the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States the decree of distribution in the probate court of New York precludes the right of the state to tax this property, and in support thereof is cited Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43, 28 Sup. Ct. 1, 52 L. Ed. 95. It may be conceded that the law of the domicile controls the disposition of personal property, where the law of the place of the location of the property is not in conflict therewith. But we do not understand that the full faith and credit clause imposes any limitation upon the sovereign right of a state to tax any and all property within it, nor is this right we think for a moment denied by respondents. This general right to tax includes the right to impose a tax on succession known as an inheritance tax, and the effect of our law is that those to whom the property has gone by virtue of the distribution awarded by the courts of New York cannot take full title to and enjoyment of their property until payment of the tax imposed by the state of California, in which state the property is located.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

HALL v. HALL et ux. (S. F. 7135.)

1. Husband and Wife 🔑333(9)—Alienating Husband's Affections—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Plaintiff's testimony regarding minor differences with her husband's parents held not to sustain a verdict against them for alienating the husband's affections, where plaintiff had abandoned her husband and it did not appear his affection for her had ceased.

2. Husband and Wife 🔑333(9)—Alienating Husband's Affections—Sufficiency of Evidence

To establish willful alienation of a husband's affections by his parents, the proof must be extremely high, since it is not lightly inferred that a parent's conduct toward a child is prompted by malicious motives.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Cecile B. Hall against William Hall and Lucy Hall, his wife. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

Chas. M. Cassin and James L. Atteridge, both of San Jose, for appellants. Beggs & McComish and H. C. Jones, all of San Jose, and C. C. Houck, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued defendants, who are respectively the father and mother of her husband, to recover damages for the alienation by them of her husband's affections from her. The charge was that:

> "The defendants willfully, wrongfully, wickedly, unjustly and maliciously contriving and intending to injure plaintiff and deprive her of the affection, support, comfort, fellowship, society, aid and assistance of plaintiff's husband, * * * alienated and destroyed the affection of said Robert Hall, the husband of this plaintiff, for this plaintiff, * * * and did willfully, illegally and maliciously entice, abduct and persuade said Robert Hall from plaintiff, whereby plaintiff has wholly lost and has been deprived of the assistance, comfort, fellowship, society, aid and support of said Robert Hall."

Trial was had before a jury, which returned its verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. From the judgment and from the order of the court denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

[1-3] Upon appeal their principal effort is directed to the contention that the evidence is wholly insufficient to justify the verdict, and this effort, it may be said at the outset, is wholly successful. Seldom, indeed, is it that a reviewing court is called upon to consider a verdict such as this, whose evidentiary foundation is airy nothingness, not even the baseless fabric of a vision.

Plaintiff and her husband, Robert Hall, were married in Los Gatos, Santa Clara county, in November, 1906. At the time of their marriage the husband was about 26 years of age, the wife a few years younger. Her parents were living in Los Gatos, so were his. He seems to have been an only child. His father and mother had been married more than 50 years, and at the time of the trial of this action the father was 75 years of age and the mother 68 years of age. They owned their own home. They had some property. They were frugal, and the old wife did all of the household work. The narration which follows is that of the plaintiff. Following their marriage in the latter part of November, she and her husband went to San Jose. Her husband's parents came to them and begged them to come and live with them in Los Gatos, Mr. Hall saying that his wife would teach the bride economy. Apparently the wife had no means; the husband was earning about $75 a month. The newly married couple went to Los Gatos and began housekeeping in rooms not far from the home of the elder Halls. They were visited quite frequently by the latter; old Mrs. Hall urging that the young people come and live with them, saying that the cost of living was high and they could live more cheaply together. They did not comply with the Halls' request, however, but continued to live as they had been doing until the husband went into the nearby mountains under employment as a wood chopper and the wife went to live at her parents' home. During this time, when the husband was free from his mountain labors, he returned to and lived with his wife. One painful incident occurred during this time. The husband and wife were making a call upon his parents. The mother was urging that they should come there to live. Robert said that he did not think they would.

> "Then she began screaming and raving about me; that I was trying to keep Robert away from her. They put her to bed and worked with her for some three hours. She insisted that Robert stay all night with her, and as I was not wanted I started home, and after I started I discovered I had not the key, and I came back to get the key, and Robert came on home with me."

Plaintiff is a school teacher, and obtained a position as such to teach a country school distant from the city of San Luis Obispo about 30 miles. Her school term began in July and ended in November. Her husband went with her to the city of San Luis Obispo, and for his own improvement took a course in a polytechnical school there situated, while his wife went to the country to teach. Every week, usually on Friday afternoon, he rode his bicycle 30 miles to be with her over the week's end. While there she took from her husband's suit case and read certain letters written to him by his father. She was permitted to give secondary evidence as to the contents of these letters. She said that in them her husband's father accused her of being "wasteful and extravagant" and "a hindrance to Robert's spiritual development"; that he ought to separate from her; that the letters often contained the quotation, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." He urged his son to "take the paper route by all means for $20 a month, but do not let Cecile know how much you are getting, and once in a while in case of absolute necessity I will slip in a little." The letters told her husband to keep her there teaching, "that would be a good lesson in economy for her." Another letter said:

> "Let Cecile come on home, and I will meet you in San Luis, and together we will take a trip in Madera county; but don't let Cecile know I am coming. You will know how to manage that."

It is pertinent here to add that the father denies having written, and the son denies having received, letters of such import. Certain trips made by father and son together are complained of by plaintiff, as for example she persistently calls a trip which her husband and his father made to Los Angeles as their "wedding trip." The explanation of these trips is that the father was earnestly seeking to establish the son in some profitable business, and his wife was unwilling to go on these trips with them. In December, 1907, they returned from San Luis Obispo to Los Gatos and took up their abode in the home of defendants. Plaintiff was pregnant. As the date of her confinement approached, she told her mother-in-law that she expected the arrival of the little grandchild, and the mother-in-law "sat back in her chair with utter scorn and disgust on her face and never said one word." She asked her mother-in-law if she might stay in her home during the period of her confinement and convalescence, and her mother-in-law replied, "Yes; you may stay here, but you must not be a trouble to me." The aged mother-in-law's account of this interview was that she looked forward to the birth of her grandchild with great interest; that she told her daughter-in-law that she could stay there if she desired, "but there are some things I cannot do for you." So the daughter-in-law went to a sanitarium where she was confined. On leaving the sanitarium, about the middle of July, 1908, she did not return to the Halls, where her husband still was, but went to her mother's, where she remained until in August, 1908, she and her husband moved to San Jose. There they resided until June, 1909. The defendants visited them not infrequently, and her father-in-law paid at least in part for the furniture in their San Jose home. In June, 1909, they returned to Los Gatos, moved by considerations of the baby's health. The husband continued in his employment in San Jose and went back and forth on the interurban cars. They lived in their own home. The principal complaint of the conduct of the husband during this time is that, returning to Los Gatos from San Jose, he usually went first and directly to the home of his parents and spent some time there before returning to his own. Sometimes he took his supper there. The explanation is that the son spent his time helping his aged father and mother in the work about the place, and that when he took supper with them it was because he preferred to do this rather than to get his own supper at home, as frequently he was obliged to do because of his wife's absence at her mother's home. Their residence in Los Gatos continued until January, 1911. During that period of time between 1909 and 1911 plaintiff asked the Halls at sundry times many questions. She asked Mr. Hall, Sr.:

> "Why two months after we were married he suggested to my husband that I married him for his money, thus poisoning his mind against me. Mr. Hall's reply was, 'Well, what do you think we thought you married him for? People call me a millionaire and people are after my money. What else do you think I thought you married him for?'"

But elsewhere she testifies that the elder Halls hailed her marriage to their son with great delight. Again she asked Mr. Hall:

> "Why he suggested to Robert that we were not mated constantly by suggesting to him we were not mated? He said he didn't think we were mated and he considered it his duty to separate two people who were not mated. Again I asked Mr. Hall why he was a party to offering me $1,000 in March, 1907, to leave my husband and telling me I could go as a missionary if I wanted to. Mr. Hall's answer was —coolly sat back and said he supposed it was because they wanted me to go, and Mrs. Hall said, 'Do you think we wanted you to go without anything?'"

There is more to like effect, all of equal inconsequence, and the defendants deny that such conversations ever were had.

The separation between the plaintiff and her husband came as indicated in January, 1911. During all of their married life, as the evidence discloses, he had neither neglected his wife nor been unkind to her in any way. He did not drink. His absences from home were only those upon the short business trips made with his father, or when his labors called him away, or when he stopped at his parents' home to help them before returning to his own. He contributed all of his earnings to the support of his wife and child. He seems to have indulged his wife in every way, and when the separation came, which was in fact her abandonment of him, he "told her to take her own way. I let her have her own way all the time." In January, 1911, she sold the furniture in their home, took this money, and with her child departed, leaving her husband weeping in the house. To the sum which she received from the furniture he added $20. He went to his parents' home. She stayed two weeks in the nearby town of Campbells and then went to Capitola, a summer resort on Monterey bay, and remained there until the middle of the summer. She returned from Capitola to Los Gatos, and in September secured a position as school teacher in the county of Fresno. She went there and taught until the following May. While at Capitola she wrote to her husband, telling him where she was, and he came down to see her for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation. He met with no success. Upon another occasion he asked her to join him and his father in the town of Morgan Hill, where it was proposed to look at ranch property with a view to settling the young people. She went, remained with her husband one or two nights, but soon left, as "I wanted to get back to Capitola to attend a meeting of the Young Women's Christian Association that was shortly to convene down there." A second time her husband visited her at Capitola, but left when she told him that her father was coming to the house. Her parents disliked her husband very much, and she did not want them to know that she communicated with him. She went to Fresno and did not let her husband know where she had gone, nor for many months was he able to learn, notwithstanding his efforts to locate her. She testifies that she did not want him to know, and for explanation justifying her conduct says that it was because her husband "said he would shoot the county full of holes. Now, do you wonder that I didn't want him to know?" She wrote to her husband but once while she was in Fresno, and returned from there to Los Gatos in May, 1912. She immediately began to take steps looking to a divorce and to securing money from her husband, which money, of course, would come from his parents, as it is not asserted that he had anything other than his earning capacity. She planned to use this money to build a home. Some sort of tentative arrangement seems to have been entered into by which she was to receive a thousand dollars. In one of these letters she writes to her husband as follows:

> "These are my terms: (1) The guardianship of Lawrence; (2) the payment to me of the thousand dollars you once offered me, not for my own use this time, but for Lawrence's care. Has it ever occurred to you that you could be arrested for felony for not having given anything for Lawrence's support for over a year?"

The greater part of the year to which reference is here made was the period when she had taken the child, had abandoned her husband, and had even concealed from him her whereabouts. The Halls seemingly thought that this thousand dollars, as under the mother's declaration it was to go for the maintenance of the child, would better be paid in monthly installments, and this called forth from the wife a letter, from which the following extracts are taken:

> "You seem to think you have the power to make or unmake terms as you see fit, and I have nothing to say, but only accept. Let me say right here that I am not going to do anything of the kind. * * * Those days when I took Lawrence on the beach (at Santa Cruz) to see you were the most miserable days I ever put in, and so was the whole time. If you hadn't spent so much time crying, and if I hadn't felt sorry, I should never have stood it for a minute. Then you would keep saying there was no other way but a divorce, so you could start all over again, and if I didn't start proceedings you would. To support what I previously said about the stay in Santa Cruz being a most unpleasant vacation, Lawrence and I did not go home, but we went to Capitola and had a real vacation. * * * My sister-in-law got $5.000 damages, and didn't half try, and the $1,000 is beginning to look mighty little to me. I might just tell you that a prominent business man in this town has hired the best lawyer in San Jose for me, and he is now consulting with Mr. Jones. * * * I said to them this afternoon that if you would live up to your part of the agreement and pay $1.000 in addition to the $500 already paid, I would live up to mine. That $1.000 was not to be paid in monthly pay'ts. Nothing was said about such an arrangement. If you feel free to go back on your word I shall feel free to act accordingly. Furthermore, it was to be in my name."

Certain other facts here merit notice. She charges that the malign influence of her husband's parents was exercised upon him immediately after the marriage and continuously from that time on. Yet she had no differences, no wordy quarrels with the senior Halls during the six months that she lived in their house. Before she went there to live, it will be remembered, she had been teaching school in San Luis Obispo county, and it was while there she read the letters from Mr. Hall, her versions of which have been given. Yet she writes to "Dear Mother Hall" a chatty and affectionate letter which closes with, "Lovingly yours." When she abandoned her husband in 1911, she wrote to him that:

> "I want to love you again, but it just seems as though I am groping blindly in the dark trying to find something on which to base that love."

In no one of her letters is there even a suggestion that the unhappiness which darkened their marital relations was occasioned either because of the loss of the husband's love for her or by reason of the pernicious activities of these defendants directed to that end. One of these letters to her husband, dated October, 1912, contains this sentence:

> "Robert, I believe just between you and me that our folks, while not meaning to be, are hindering rather than helping us. I say this with all regard to them for they do not realize it, but we ought to realize it and rise above it."

Her explanation of this sentence, written after all of these difficulties, is neither satisfactory nor illuminating. Notwithstanding the fact that she testifies that her parents disliked her husband, she insists that the language "our folks" had exclusive reference to his parents. For the rest, she asserts that this declaration had nothing to do with the "willful, wrongful, wicked and malicious" efforts which her parents-in-law were, she charges, persistently making in their effort to destroy her husband's affection for her. One other episode calls for narration. In 1912 the senior Halls with their son Robert had gone to Santa Cruz and were there living together. This plaintiff, returning from Fresno county to Los Gatos, discovered this fact. She filed her complaint for a divorce in Santa Cruz county. After so filing it, she herself went to Santa Cruz county. She accepted her husband's invitation to come to his home, which was also the home of his parents, and there spent one or more nights with him. While they were at the dinner table, her husband was served with the complaint and summons in her suit for divorce. After that she again visited her husband at his parents' home, upon this occasion Mrs. Hall, Sr., being present. She was not at home on the occasion of the dinner table episode. Mrs. Hall saw her son with his arm around the plaintiff's waist. According to plaintiff, her mother-in-law screamed and said, "They will be reconciled again and my troubles will all begin over." The senior Mrs. Hall's explanation is that she thought and declared that such conduct upon the part of a woman was not proper in contemplation of the fact that she was prosecuting an action for divorce against the man who was embracing her.

This ends a fairly complete résumé of the evidence in the case, saving that it should be added that upon its trial, while the wife admitted her loss of affection for her husband, he declared his continued love and devotion to her. It is quite plain that if plaintiff had brought this action because of the alienation of her affections from her husband it would stand, so far as the evidence at least goes, upon a much firmer basis than does the one which actually she did bring. For here is a case where, without hesitation, it may be said that the evidence fails to show either an attempt to alienate the husband's affections or any success for that attempt, if it were actually made. It would be a work of supererogation to dwell at length upon the governing law of cases such as this. It is sufficient to state it briefly, with due reference to the authorities, when at once the utter inadequacy of this evidence will be apparent, if it has not already become so. Actions for damages against parents for the alienation of the affections of their married child from his or her spouse are frequent in the law, and the principles governing the introduction of evidence and the weight to be given it are equally well settled. Having in contemplation the natural solicitude of the parent for its child, and the well-nigh universal experience of mankind that parents in their conduct toward their children are actuated by high and disinterested motives, involving the sacrifice of their own interests for the welfare of the child, it is not to be lightly inferred that the language or conduct of such a parent toward a child is prompted by evil and malicious motives. Therefore to establish such willful and malicious alienation "the measure of proof must be extremely high." Beisel v. Gerlach, 221 Pa. 232, 70 Atl. 721, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 516. Says Chief Justice Kent in Hutcheson v. Peck, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 196:

> "If the defendant did not stand in the relation of father to the plaintiff's wife, I should not, perhaps, be inclined to interfere with the verdict. But that relationship gives the case a new and peculiar interest. * * * A father's house is always open to his children; and, whether they be married or unmarried, it is still to them a refuge from evil, and a consolation in distress. Natural affection establishes and consecrates this asylum, * * * and, according to Lord Coke, it is 'nature's profession to assist, maintain, and console the child.' I should require, therefore, more proof to sustain the action against the father, than against a stranger."

But "every legal presumption is that the parent acted for the best interest of the child." Leavell v. Leavell, 122 Mo. App. 654, 99 S. W. 460; Reed v. Reed, 6 Ind. App. 317, 33 N. E. 638, 51 Am. St. Rep. 310. Quite like the present case in its facts is that of Busenbark v. Busenbark, 150 Iowa, 7, 129 N. W. 332, where, after setting forth at great length, as has been done here, the annoying interference of the parents-in-law, the court said:

> "The incidents which are described as above set forth in plaintiff's testimony appear to us as very commonplace. They may have been unwise and lacking in delicacy and tenderness, but there is nothing to indicate that they were otherwise than the natural expressions of solicitude of this mother-in-law. Parents often annoy their children with advice, good and bad. The good is often quite as annoying as the bad. This mother-in-law seems to have fought the battle of thrift in a certain way, and she was quite sure that it was the only safe way."

And without amplifying these quotations reference may be made to Codoni v. Donati, 6 Cal. App. 83, 91 Pac. 423; Cripe v. Cripe, 170 Cal. 91, 148 Pac. 520; White v. Ross, 47 Mich. 172, 10 N. W. 188; Brown v. Brown, 124 N. C. 19, 32 S. E. 320, 70 Am. St. Rep. 574; Rice v. Rice, 104 Mich. 371, 62 N. W. 836; Pollock v. Pollock, 9 Misc. Rep. 82, 29 N. Y. Supp. 37; Fronk v. Fronk, 159 Mo. App. 543, 141 S. W. 697; Park v. Park, 40 Colo. 354, 91 Pac. 830.

The jury after it retired to deliberate upon its verdict came into court seeking further light upon the law, as shown by the following questions asked of the judge:

> "Question by a juror: The question is, Judge, in the event we should award damages, will that be protecting the child; should we award damages would there be compensation, protection for the child; would the child be sure of protection? That may be entirely foreign to what we are expected to do, but the argument came up."
> "Another juror: That may be foreign to what we are asked to come here for, but we seem to want to know about it."
> "Another juror: There has been considerable argument. Some of the jurors argue one way, some another, and the question came up, provided any damages were awarded to the plaintiff, would the boy be protected by the court in any respect? The supposition was that probably the plaintiff might marry and the boy would lose any protection which we might accord him."

This transcript from the record affords the only understandable reason for the verdict given. It is but another exemplification of the power which some juries assume of adjusting, without regard to the evidence or issues, the finances of the litigants in accordance with their views. It is another case like that of Driscoll v. Market St. Cable Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203, where, as this court said:

"A jury catches at a mere semblance or pretense of evidence for the purpose of simply equalizing financial conditions by taking money from one party and giving it to the other without legal cause."

But in this case, no more than in that, has this great, and to the jurors most inexpensive, generosity the sanction of the law.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

JACOBI et al. v. BUILDERS' REALTY CO.

(S. F. 7127.)

1. Carriers ⚷288—Elevators.

The use in an apartment house, without warning and protection against the attending perils, of an automatic elevator for the transportation of passengers, when it is in the experimental stage of development and not suitable for such purpose, constitutes negligence, though the appliance is the latest achievement of mechanical and scientific skill, particularly where the owner was chargeable with knowledge of the defects in the construction and operation of the elevator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1188.]

2. Carriers ⚷328(1)—Elevator Accident—Contributory Negligence.

That a person using a defective automatic elevator installed in an apartment house opened the door or stepped through the open doorway into the elevator shaft without looking to see that the cage was in place, did not constitute contributory negligence precluding recovery for her death, where the customary use of the elevator warranted her in believing that the door could not be opened unless the cage was in place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1367.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Mignon Jacobi and others against the Builders' Realty Company. Verdict for defendant, new trial granted, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denson, Cooley & Denson, Stanley Moore, and Geo. K. Ford, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Joseph Bien and Abram M. Marks, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs as heirs at law of Annie Jacobson, deceased, brought their action to recover damages for her death, alleged to have been occasioned through the defendant's negligence. Trial was had before a jury, which returned its verdict for the defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which motion the court granted. This appeal is taken from the order so doing.

Appellant urges two propositions: The first, that the court erred in granting the motion because the evidence conclusively shows that defendant was not negligent; second, that the court erred because the evidence conclusively establishes that the deceased met her death through her own negligence; that the negligence of the deceased was either the sole negligence established in the case, or at the least was contributory negligence, barring the right of recovery.

The unquestioned facts are that the defendant owned and maintained an apartment house in the city and county of San Francisco. The deceased frequently visited friends residing in this apartment house. For the use of the tenants, their visitors and guests the defendant maintained an elevator in this house of a type known as a "full automatic elevator." This elevator was without attendant, and was operated exclusively by the passengers. One desiring to use the elevator stood in front of a closed door opening on the elevator shaft and pressed a button in the door casing. This pressure made an electrical connection, causing the elevator cage to ascend or descend and stop at the given floor. Its presence there unlocked the door, which the intending passenger then opened and stepped into the cage; closing the door behind him he pressed a button corresponding to the floor to which he desired to go, and, through a second electrical connection, thus made the cage move to the indicated floor. As it started on its journey the door of the floor upon which it was departing again was automatically locked. The door at any floor could not be opened unless the cage was present at that floor, nor, upon the other hand, would the cage when at a floor move unless the door fronting it was closed. Such in theory was the operation of this elevator, and in theory, therefore, it was an extremely safe appliance. In practice, however, it failed to measure up to this. In point of operation it not infrequently happened that the cage would move when a door was opened or on the jar. The evidence in the case went to show that at least a part of this trouble was due to an inherent structural defect in the appliance; that another part of the trouble resulted from the fact that the elevator frequently got out of order and repair, it being in evidence that this occurred as often as once or twice a week.

[1] There was no eyewitness to the immediate circumstances attending the death of Mrs. Jacobson. Mrs. Harris, the housekeeper, who was in the office on the ground floor of the building, saw Mrs. Jacobson pass in front of her toward the elevator. Subsequently she heard a slight scream. Mrs. Jacobson had fallen down the elevator shaft, and was found dead in the basement. The elevator cage was several floors above. Touching the absence of negligence on its part, appellant argues that the elevator which it had installed and was maintaining was as perfect an elevator as could be constructed under the then condition of electrical knowledge and science; that it was not an insurer of the safety of the passengers using the elevator, and having furnished the best possible appliance it had completely fulfilled its legal duty, and it is said that "it will certainly not be contended that the use of an automatic elevator is negligence." But the contrary of this is the well-established law. If the appliance, though it be the last achievement of mechanical and scientific skill, is not a suitable appliance to be used in the transportation of passengers, to employ it for that purpose is negligence. The law does not contemplate that such appliances, in the experimental stage of their development, may be used to the peril of the life and limb of those who may be invited to employ them, at least without adequate warning and protection against the perils attending such employment. Specifically, as to this elevator, there was no attendant, nor even any sign to warn a passenger of this defect either in its construction or operation, or both. No person using it was informed that a door which was presumed to be tightly locked unless the cage was at its floor could be opened when it was not there. Ignorant of this, persons intending to use the elevator came to rely, and to a certain extent were entitled to rely, upon the fact that if they could open the door at all it would be because the cage was there. The evidence leaves no doubt but that this was the precise situation upon the occasion of this fatal accident. Mrs. Jacobson, familiar with the use of the elevator, in all probability found the door wholly closed or ajar. It opened to her touch, and assuming, by virtue of this fact, that the cage was there, she stepped forward and met her death. Since knowledge of the defects in construction or in operation, or both, was not only chargeable against this defendant, but was actually possessed by it, it is too plain for discussion that in inviting tenants and their guests to use such a contrivance it was sheer negligence not at the same time to have adequately warned and protected them against dangers necessarily attendant upon the use of the elevator under this defective faulty construction or lack of repair. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175.

[2] Under its second proposition appellant contends that the negligence of the deceased is established by virtue of the fact that if on opening the door she had used her eyesight, as she was in duty bound to do, she would have perceived that the cage was not there, and that it was therefore contributory negligence upon her part to have made the fatal step. We have hereinbefore sufficiently outlined the course of conduct which the deceased doubtless pursued, and also the conditions which prompted her to that course of conduct. It has thus been made to appear, and indeed the positive evidence is to that effect, that people, using such an elevator and finding that in general practice when such an elevator was operating properly a door could not be opened unless the cage was at that floor, had come to rely, in determining the presence or absence of the cage, upon their ability or inability to open the door. The deceased unquestionably opened this door or found it open. In either case (there being no attendant to warn or any other kind of warning given) it was not at least unnatural that she should have placed reliance upon the conditions which she found. Whether under these circumstances she should also have looked or be convicted of negligence, presents a question of reasonable argument before a jury, but one which cannot be resolved against plaintiffs as matter of law. The language of the Supreme Court of New York is here appropriate:

> "An elevator for the carriage of persons is not, like a railroad crossing at a highway, supposed to be a place of danger to be approached with great caution; but, on the contrary, it may be assumed, when the door is thrown open by an attendant, to be a place which may be safely entered without stopping to look, listen, or make a special examination." Tousey v. Roberts, 114 N. Y. 312, 21 N. E. 399, 11 Am. St. Rep. 656.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by E. G. Hicks, doing business under the name and style of the Texas Coast Land Company, against A. Christeson. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Knight & Heggerty and Wm. M. Madden, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one by which plaintiff sought to recover $893.90 as damages for defendant's failure to carry into effect an alleged agreement for the sale of real property located in Texas. It was the contention of respondent that defendant was bound under the terms of a written contract of employment to pay to him the amount sued for, by reason of Christeson's failure to carry out an arrangement negotiated by plaintiff for the sale of the property to one McCrory. The date of the original contract between the parties to this action was December 4, 1907. On that day defendant signed a writing, by the terms of which he appointed plaintiff his agent to procure a purchaser, and to enter into a contract to sell 1,365 acres of land in the "Edward Beaty League" in the state of Texas. The agreement was mailed to plaintiff at Victoria, Tex., and was delivered, accepted, and signed by him there. By this writing defendant appointed plaintiff his exclusive agent for 12 months to sell the land at $4 per acre net to the vendor, and (to quote directly from the instrument)—

"thereafter until said agency is by me terminated in writing with full authority to execute a contract for the sale of said land in accordance herewith in my name and behalf. 1/3 of the amounts to be received by us for said land shall be paid in cash, and the balance 2/3 within 1, 2 and 3 years shall be secured by the vendor's lien 7% interest in the warranty deed to said land to be executed as soon as purchaser is found and to recite as consideration therein such amount as said agent shall designate."

The other parts of the contract had reference to the furnishing of an abstract of title, and to other matters which need not be discussed here.

After entering into the said contract, the plaintiff, on May 23, 1908, executed an agreement signed by himself and one W. W. McCrory, wherein it was provided that in consideration of $333⅓ paid by McCrory to plaintiff the former should have the option from the date of the agreement to November 1, 1908, to purchase the property upon the following terms: $1.50 cash per acre and notes in the sum of $3 per acre, bearing interest at 7 per cent. and secured by a vendor's lien. These notes were to provide for the payment of the balance of the purchase price in three equal sums two, three, and four years after date. The amount paid on the execution of the option agreement was to apply on the purchase price if the option should be exercised, and plaintiff as the agent of Christeson promised to convey the land to McCrory, or to whomsoever he might name by a good and sufficient deed of warranty in the event of the exercise of the option. This contract also provided for the tender of a deed or deeds from Christeson to McCrory upon compliance with the terms of the sale. The writing itself was not sent to Mr. Christeson, but he was notified by a letter dated May 27, 1908, that Mr. Hicks had made a "tentative" contract with some person. The letter contained the following sentence:

"He is to pay one-third cash, and give vendor lien notes for the balance, payable in equal payments on the deferred in 2, 3 and 4 years. That is, you will receive $1 per acre cash, and $3 per acre in notes."

On June 10, 1908, a letter was written by Christeson to Hicks informing him that Sarah A. Christeson had owned a half interest in the land for 3 years, but undertaking to get her agreement, signature, and acknowledgment to the deed at the proper time if the sale were made. Answering the part of the letter from Hicks to the effect that the latter's commission would be 50 cents per acre, the defendant wrote:

"I observe, in this connection, you indicate that the warranty deed is to recite a consideration of $5 per acre, which I take to mean that you are selling the land for $5. If so and your commission being 50 cents, while of course I agreed to accept $4 to me net, but under the circumstances don't you think it would be about fair to divide the other half dollar, giving me 25 cents, or rather $4.25 per acre, and you retaining the balance? The payment of $1 down of course is satisfactory, and is in accordance with previous understanding, the balance to be covered by vendor lien notes, payable in two, three and four years, and if sale is made you can have deed drawn, and send to me for signature and execution."

On September 21, 1908, A. Christeson wrote advising Mr. Hicks that he had transferred all of his interest in the land to Sarah A. Christeson, formerly his wife. "Of course," wrote defendant, "any further negotiations in regard to this land will have to be carried on with her."

[1, 2] Appellant calls attention to the fact that the contract of option itself was never sent to him for his inspection, and he attacks the court's finding that there had been a ratification of the optional agreement. We agree with appellant that no such ratification ever took place. There was nothing in the letter of respondent to Christeson dated June 10, 1908 (upon which the court based its conclusion that Christeson had consented to a modification of the original contract), by which Christeson authorized or ratified any option by which the land might be held out of the market and subjected to the whim of any prospective purchaser. The only effect of that letter was to enlarge the authority of the agent with reference to the deferred payments. The writer did not give him further power to accept an agreement different in its essence from the contract for the sale of Christeson's land which he was empowered to execute. He was not informed by the agent regarding the name of the other party to the "tentative contract," or the payment for the option, or the arrangement that, upon default of the option holder, such sum should be forfeited not to Christeson, but to Hicks, and unless we can say that these were matters which, under the original contract of agency, were left to the discretion of Hicks, we must hold that the option was not binding upon Christeson. The agreement which is the fountain head of any authority possessed by plaintiff gave him the right to contract for a sale. An option is by no means a sale of property, but is the sale of a right to purchase. Dreyfus v. Richardson, 20 Cal. App. 800–805, 130 Pac. 161; Pehl v. Fanton, 17 Cal. App. 247, 119 Pac. 400—cases which this court approved by declining to review the decisions. Therefore, if we seek to justify the court's finding upon the letter written by the vendor to his agent, we see that there was no meeting of the minds of Hicks and Christeson except upon the one question of the modification of the terms of the sale.

[3, 4] But respondent insists that he furnished a buyer who was able, ready, and willing to purchase the land on the terms proposed, and that he is therefore entitled to his commission. The most complete answer to this contention is found in the fact that so far as the evidence shows McCrory never agreed to purchase the property upon the terms of the option. Since a contract for the sale of real property must be in writing (section 1624, subd. 5, Civ. Code), it must follow, says appellant, that McCrory's election to purchase, if of any value, must have been expressed in writing. The writing upon which reliance is placed by respondent is a letter by McCrory to him. This was undated, but according to the writer's testimony was mailed about the month of September, 1908. There was no pretense that McCrory ever dealt directly with Christeson, and although the former testified that he had orally informed Hicks that he intended to exercise his option, he did not give the details of any conversation; therefore, even if we were to hold that the court might have based the finding of election to purchase upon oral testimony, the strongest evidence which was offered on that subject was in the language of the letter of McCrory to Hicks, and that language did not bind McCrory to take the land. The pertinent parts of the letter are as follows:

> "I am inclosing you herein deed to be signed by A. Christeson and Sarah Christeson also the notes to be signed by me. * * * Under our agreement I have until November 1st to close up the deal, but as Mr. Christeson is sometimes away from home, hard to hear from, etc., I will I think be able to get the matter closed up before that time. I am sending the deed and notes along now with the idea that they will be back here by October 1st. You can instruct Mr. Christeson to send the deed properly executed by himself and Sarah Christeson to the Allen National Bank of Edna, Edna, Texas, with instructions to deliver same to me upon my signing the inclosed notes and paying to his credit the sum of $1,355, and to your credit the sum of $677.50, less the forfeit money already deposited with you. * * * I have had the abstract made, and it runs about 35 pages of typewritten matter. The affair that you sent me was no abstract at all. * * * I have dropped the matter of having the line through the brush run out, as it is about two miles long, and all very thick timber, and the fact is that you can hardly get help to do this work among the ticks and in the heat, so I have drawn the deed for the acreage shown by the old surveys, to wit, 1,355 acres. I think Mr. Christeson is under his contract with you to furnish an abstract, so I will expect him to pay for the abstract, as the matter he sent was no abstract at all, and would be of no use at all to me in case of sale, and I have to furnish abstract."

This letter still leaves the matter within the option and caprice of McCrory. He does not say in this letter that he elects to exercise his option, nor that he will purchase, nor that he will sign the notes and pay the money. The deed was not drawn for 1,365 acres, the area specified in the contract between Hicks and Christeson, but for a smaller tract of land, and he seeks to charge Christeson with the expense of preparing an abstract which the latter had never ordered. There was nothing in the option requiring the deposit of a deed in escrow in Texas or elsewhere, and the prospective vendee could not arbitrarily read such a requirement into the contract, select the place or escrow, and then complain that the other party to the option had violated the agreement. It is evident that if Christeson had complied with all of the terms of the letter of McCrory to his agent, and McCrory had failed to complete the transaction by signing the notes and paying the money, Christeson would have been without a cause of action for specific performance of a contract of sale. His only recourse would have been against Hicks for the amount which McCrory had deposited with the latter as a consideration for the option. Unless an intending purchaser has entered into a contract binding him to buy the property, or has offered to the vendor and not merely to the broker to make such an agreement, the broker has not earned his commission. Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105; Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200; Mott v. Minor, 11 Cal. App. 774–779, 106 Pac. 244; Douglas v. Spangenberg, 23 Cal. App. 294–296, 137 Pac. 1103; Massie v. Chatom, 163 Cal. 772–776, 127 Pac. 56. It is not pretended that an offer of any sort was made to Christeson personally, and the letter to Hicks was nothing more than a proposal for a change in the terms of the option. It follows that even if we give to the optional agreement all of the force accorded to it by the learned superior court, we must reverse the judgment because the proof fails to show any binding contract for the sale of Christeson's land. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider any of the other assignments of error, except the plea of the statute of limitations.

Appellant contended that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The original complaint concededly was filed within the statutory time, and although the amended complaint was prepared after the expiration of the period limited by the statute, we are satisfied that both pleadings relate to the same cause of action.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Ada Cooper Langford and husband against the San Diego Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs and order denying new trial, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Read G. Dillworth, of Coronado, and E. Swift Torrance, of San Diego, for appellant. Adam Thompson, of San Diego, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs are husband and wife. They brought this action to recover damages for injuries received by the wife in a collision between an automobile in which the plaintiffs were riding and a street car belonging to the defendant company. There was a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for $5,000 in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The points raised by the appellant turn principally upon the court's instructions to the jury. To understand these questions, their discussion should be preceded by a brief statement of the facts.

The defendant operates a double-track line of electric street railway on Washington street and other streets in the city of San Diego. Washington street runs east and west. Among the streets intersecting it are Falcon, Goldfinch, and Hawk streets. Falcon street is the most easterly of these, the next street to the west being Goldfinch street, and Hawk street the one next beyond. The accident resulting in Mrs. Langford's injury occurred on the evening of March 13, 1913, at the intersection of Washington and Goldfinch streets. The pavement of Washington street was being repaired, and the only part of the street that was passable was that occupied by the tracks of the railroad company, including a space of two feet in width on either side, beyond the outer rails. The automobile was driven by Norton Langford, the husband. He was coming easterly on Washington street. As Langford crossed Hawk street, an east-bound car of the defendant was running on the southerly track, a short distance ahead of him. He followed on the southerly track, until the car came to a stop at or near the intersection of Goldfinch street. There is a sharp conflict over what took place then. Langford's testimony was, in effect, that the street car stopped some distance west of Goldfinch street to take on passengers; that in order to avoid the delays which would be imposed upon him by the frequent stops of the street car, if he remained behind it, he turned out to the left or north track, with the intention of passing around the east-bound car, and getting in front of it. The street car started again as he got abreast of it, and, as Langford drew up, the motorman increased the speed of the street car. About this time Langford saw a west-bound car ahead of him on the northerly track, at a distance of one or two blocks. Concluding that he would not be able to get ahead of the east-bound car, and cross to the southerly track in front of it before the approaching west-bound car would be upon him, Langford stopped his automobile with the intention of falling in to the right behind the east-bound car. This brought his automobile to a standstill upon the north track, about the middle of the intersection of Goldfinch and Washington streets. Before he was able to get his machine out of that position, the west-bound street car ran into him.

[1] The complaint charged that the collision was caused by the careless, negligent, and unskillful running of the car by the defendant's servants. The answer denied negligence, and alleged that the collision was caused by the negligence of Langford in turning onto the northerly track at a time when the west-bound car was so close that a collision was inevitable. The evidence offered by the defendant tended to support these claims. There was ample and substantial testimony from which the jury might well have concluded that the west-bound car was very near the intersection of Goldfinch street when Langford drove his automobile onto the northerly track, and that the motorman driving said car was not, and could not have been, aware of Langford's presence on the north track in time to enable him to stop the street car. The appellant does not claim, and we do not suggest, that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. Upon the whole record, however, there is room for serious doubt whether responsibility for the accident in reality rested upon Langford or upon the defendant. Under these circumstances, any substantial error, if such there was, in the instructions defining the relative rights and obligations of the driver of the automobile and the person in charge of the street car, must be regarded as prejudicial.

[2] Among other instructions, the court gave the following:

> "You are further instructed that it is and was the duty of the defendant corporation to employ competent and careful persons to manage its street cars, and that it was and is the duty of the motorman in charge of the street cars of the defendant to exercise proper care, and keep a proper lookout, in order to avoid, if possible, all accidents and injury, and the defendant would be liable for any injury proximately caused by its failure in these respects."

The court refused to comply with the defendant's request to instruct the jury:

> "Plaintiffs do not here complain that the motorman on defendant's west-bound street car was incompetent or inexperienced, and the only question for you to consider with reference to him is whether on the occasion of the accident he acted with the care and prudence which a reasonably prudent man under the circumstances would have exercised."

The appellant assigns as error the giving of the one and the refusal to give the other instruction. These assignments are well taken. The question of the competency or incompetency of the motorman was not an issue, nor could it have been made an issue, in the case. The great weight of authority supports the rule that in actions of this kind the competency of the person claimed to have acted negligently, or his reputation for care, is not a subject of inquiry. The decisions in this state are definitely in accord with this view. In Cunningham v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 561, 564, 47 Pac. 452, the court said, in dealing with this question:

> "Defendant was responsible to plaintiff for a want of ordinary care only, and whether it was in the exercise of such care was to be determined from a consideration of what actually occurred at the time of the alleged negligent act, regardless of any fact affecting the general character of the servant for skill or proficiency in the discharge of his duty. The question was: Did the servant exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury? If he did, the plaintiff could not recover, no matter how wanting the servant may have been in general competency; while, if he did not exercise such care, plaintiff was entitled to recover, even if the servant possessed the utmost degree of efficiency and skill in the performance of his duty. The sole question therefore was: What was the conduct of the servant at the time? And this was to be unembarrassed by any consideration of his general qualifications."

In the earlier case of Towle v. Pacific Improvement Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207, the court had declared the same rule, although it was there applied to a somewhat different state of facts. Quoting from 2 Thompson on Negligence, p. 804, the court said, in the Towle Case, that:

> "The principle is that the question whether a person was at a given time in the exercise of due care is to be resolved upon evidence of what took place at the time, and not upon evidence of the general character he may sustain."

See, also, Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 117 Pac. 956; Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 120 Pac. 35; Minot v. Snavely, 172 Fed. 212, 97 C. C. A. 30, 19 Ann. Cas. 996.

[3, 4] Under instruction 13, the jury was authorized to hold the defendant liable because it had employed an incompetent motorman, even though the evidence of the facts surrounding the accident may not have been sufficient, in and of itself, to show that the motorman had failed to exercise due care. The vice of the instruction is not remedied by the concluding words that "defendant would be liable for any injury proximately caused by its failure in these respects." The argument is that the mere employment of an incompetent motorman could not proximately cause the injury, if the motorman was not negligent on the particular occasion. But the answer to this suggestion is that the natural effect of testimony of incompetency is to lead the jury to infer that the person whose conduct is in question failed to act properly at the time and in the very matter under investigation. Wigmore on Evidence, § 65. The error is emphasized by the court's refusal to give the instruction requested by the appellant. The requested charge was designed to limit the jury, on the question of the defendant's negligence, to an examination of the conduct of the motorman at the very time in controversy. As we have seen, the defendant was entitled to have the inquiry so limited.

[5] If there had been no evidence bearing upon the question of the motorman's competency, these errors might, perhaps, be regarded as of little moment. But the bill of exceptions contains an explicit statement that the motorman, when testifying as a witness, was dull, slow, and hesitating; that he showed a lack of knowledge of the appliances used on the car; and that "the jury might readily have drawn the conclusion from his manner of testifying, and his appearance on the witness stand, that he was incompetent to serve as a motorman at the time of the collision." As we have already said, the evidence left the true cause of the accident in great doubt. We cannot say that, if this instruction had not been given, the jury ought, nevertheless, to have found in favor of the plaintiffs. We cannot even, after a careful review of the evidence, say that the jury, under proper instructions, would probably have reached a conclusion in favor of the plaintiffs. Under these circumstances, we would not be justified, even under the liberal provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, in disregarding the error and denying a new trial.

[6] As a guide to the further proceedings which must be had, we may refer briefly to some criticisms directed by the appellant against the remaining instructions of the court. We are not, in this, to be understood to hold that the objections which we find to be good would alone justify a reversal. Instruction 14 states that it is the duty of drivers of street cars to have their power under control, and so use the control "as to avoid injury whenever possible." The words "whenever possible" put too stringent an obligation upon the operator of the car. His duty is to exercise ordinary care, and the court so instructed the jury, in other parts of its charge. It would be well, upon another trial, to obviate possible confusion by modifying instruction 14.

[7] We think there was no substantial error in instructions 12, 15, and 17, regarding the right of the driver of the automobile to drive upon the part of the street occupied by the street car track. It is true, generally, and more especially where, as here, the portion of the street beyond the tracks is not passable, that the driver of any vehicle has the right (always subject to the duty to exercise due care) to drive on the part of the street occupied by the street car rails. The appellant's complaint seems to be based on the proposition that it was negligent for the plaintiff to drive onto the left-hand track. But this subject was covered by other instructions, and was not involved in the instructions now under consideration.

[8, 9] A point is made of an ordinance of the city of San Diego, providing that every person driving a vehicle on any street shall "on all occasions when it is practicable so to do, travel on the right side of such street, and as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible." The ordinance was not intended to prohibit the use of the left-hand side of the street under all circumstances. The only part of the street that was passable was that occupied by the tracks. There was no way for the plaintiffs to pass the east-bound car except by going to the left of it. In a certain sense it was "practicable" for them to remain behind that car, stopping whenever it stopped, and being delayed by it as long as it remained upon the portion of Washington street that was undergoing repairs. But we do not think that the ordinance should be given so strict an interpretation. Whether it was reasonable, under the circumstances, to hold the driver of an automobile to this inconvenient mode of travel, was, we think, a question for the jury. They may well have concluded that it was not "practicable" for Langford to keep on the right of the road where, by so doing, he would be unduly blocked in his progress.

[10] Complaint is made of the action of the court in instructing the jury upon the last clear chance doctrine. It is exceedingly doubtful whether there was any evidence to which these instructions were applicable. We do not, however, express any definite view on this point, as the evidence may be different upon another trial. We do not agree with the appellant's contention that facts showing the applicability of the "last clear chance" rule must be alleged in the complaint. The appellant relies upon Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 88 Cal. 399, 406, 26 Pac. 211. The decision did not turn upon the question of pleading, and what is said in the opinion on this point is little more than a passing intimation. On the second appeal in the same case (Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 541, 546, 37 Pac. 500), the court seemed to view with doubt the suggestion, made on the first appeal, that the complaint should have charged that the defendant acted willfully and wantonly, but was compelled to accept it as binding under the "law of the case" rule. Well-considered cases in other jurisdictions hold that the plaintiff may rely upon the last clear chance doctrine where he has made proper allegation that his injury was caused by the defendant's want of reasonable care, and the defendant has denied this allegation. Nathan v. Railway, 118 N. C. 1066, 24 S. E. 511; Crowley v. B. C., etc., Ry. Co., 65 Iowa, 658, 20 N. W. 467, 22 N. W. 918. As was said in the North Carolina case:

> "In contemplation of law, the injury is not attributed to the wrongful act unless it is shown to be the immediate and proximate cause. So that the allegation by the plaintiff that the injury was due to the defendant's carelessness, and the denial of that, coupled with the averment by defendant that the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was the cause, necessarily involves the question whether the defendant negligently omitted to avail itself of the last clear chance to avoid the accident by the performance of a legal duty."

[11] Instruction No. 19, given at the request of the plaintiffs, contained the statement that "street cars with proper appliances are easily stopped." This declaration should have been omitted. In the first place, it involves a charge upon a matter of fact. Next, it was misleading, in that it suggested to the jury that the sufficiency of the appliances on defendant's cars was involved, whereas no such question was presented by the pleadings or the evidence. Still further, the words "easily stopped" are too uncertain to furnish a standard of any value. One person might think that a car was "easily stopped" if it could be stopped within 40 feet, while another might think it could not be easily stopped unless brought to a standstill after running 10 or 15 feet.

Some other instructions are criticized; but we think that, on a reading of the charge as a whole, the objectionable matter pointed out by the appellant is not such as to have caused any material misunderstanding on the part of the jury.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

J. E. Pemberton and A. G. Kazebeer, both of San Francisco, for appellant Louise Malone. Cullinan & Hickey, Wilson & Haines, Hugh K. McKevitt, and Theo. Bell, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order admitting a will to probate on the ground that the appeal was not taken within the time allowed by law. It was not taken within 60 days after the date of the entry of the order (section 1715, Code Civ. Proc.), but it was taken within 30 days after a motion for a new trial duly made was determined (section 939, Code Civ. Proc.).

The court is of the opinion that the provision of section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 205), providing that if proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until 30 days after entry in the trial court of the order determining the motion for a new trial or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion, is applicable in the matter of an appeal from an order admitting a will to probate, and for that reason the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹1032(2)—BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR—REJECTION OF EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff and defendant were landlord and tenant on share-cropping lease. The landlord sued in unlawful entry and detainer and later for recovery of money received by the tenant for the crops. The actions were tried together, and the tenant cross-complained for money and labor in cropping the land. Plaintiff sought to show that he had ordered a surveyor to check over the land and determine what work defendant did, and also to introduce testimony of the surveyor as to what he found. The surveyor's maps were admitted, but his testimony and that of plaintiff were excluded in rebuttal, plaintiff having gone into the matter on direct examination. The record fails to show that the evidence rejected would have added anything shown by the maps, nor does it show the issues in the unlawful detainer action. Held, that such showing does not sustain plaintiff's burden of proving error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Jules Kloster against C. W. Hawn, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. N. Barber and F. W. Docker, both of Fresno, for appellant. W. D. Crichton and C. K. Bonestell, both of Fresno, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in the defendant's favor for the sum of $340 and costs upon his answer and cross-complaint.

The record discloses the following facts: During the years from 1913 to 1915, inclusive, the plaintiff and defendant stood in the relation of landlord and tenant with respect to a certain tract of land in Fresno county, which the defendant was to work on shares under a cropping lease. During the close of the latter year the plaintiff commenced an action in unlawful detainer for the ouster of the defendant from the land. The defendant apparently appeared and answered in that action, and, issues being thus made up, the cause was ready for trial. In the meantime the plaintiff commenced the present action against the defendant for the recovery of money alleged to have been received by the latter for the plaintiff's use and benefit from the sale of certain crops raised upon the land. The defendant appeared in that action with an answer and cross-complaint for money expended in plowing and checking the land in question upon an oral agreement with the defendant providing for the extent and compensation of such work. Plaintiff answered said cross-complaint, admitting the making of an oral agreement with the defendant for the leveling, checking, plowing, and seeding of certain portions of the land in question, but denying that its terms were those alleged by the defendant, and averring that the defendant had not performed or completed the performance of his part of said agreement. The issues in this action having been thus made up, both of said causes came on for trial, whereupon it was stipulated by counsel for the respective parties that the two causes should be tried together. The court permitted this to be done, and upon such dual trial the plaintiff apparently took the laboring oar, and undertook to testify upon his examination with respect to the amount of leveling and checking of the land which the defendant had done during the years in question, and also as to the various transactions between the defendant and himself relating to said agreement and its performance, and also as to the settlements made from time to time as the products of the land were sold and their proceeds divided. The defendant also testified as to the terms of the oral agreement between the parties, with respect to the leveling, checking, and cultivation of the land, and the application from time to time of the moneys realized from the disposition of its crops.

The court found from the evidence before it that there was a balance due the defendant of $340, and rendered its judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appeals.

Appellant's first contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the court in the particular respect that it fails to show that the defendant had so far completed the work of leveling and checking the land in question, according to the terms of the oral agreement between the parties, as to be entitled to recover the amount awarded him, and that in respect to his cross-complaint for the value of such work, his action was prematurely brought.

[1] From a reading of the whole record we are unable to say, however, that the court was in error in reaching the conclusion arrived at by it. Whatever may have been the precise terms of the original oral understanding between the parties as to the extent to which the work of the defendant in leveling and checking the whole of the land, or even the whole or any part of one or more of its several lots, should proceed before he was entitled to be paid for such work, the record does show that the parties by their conduct in making their settlements from time to time, as the products of the land were sold, placed their own construction upon the contract in suit, which in effect was that the defendant was to be paid from time to time a specified sum per acre for the work actually done by him, regardless of whether or not the whole or any part of said work had been completed. We are not, therefore, prepared to say that the trial court was in error in interpreting the contract in suit in keeping with the conduct of the parties thereto. Nor can we say from the record before us that the sum awarded to the defendant was not justified by the evidence adduced upon the whole case.

[2] The next and final contention of the plaintiff is that the court erred in its refusal to permit him to testify in rebuttal as to his having ordered a surveyor to make a survey of the land for the purpose of showing the amount of leveling and checking done by the defendant, and was also in error in refusing to permit the surveyor to testify as to what work his survey showed to have been done by the defendant. Had this case been tried alone there could be no doubt that the ruling of the trial court in refusing to permit the introduction of this offered evidence upon the objection that it was not rebuttal would be error. It was clearly in proper rebuttal of the defendant's evidence in support of his cross-complaint in this action; but whether it was prejudicial error sufficient to require a reversal of the judgment is another question. The only matter to which the plaintiff was called in rebuttal was as to his having ordered the survey. This would seem to be rather immaterial, for whether or not the plaintiff had ordered the survey would not affect the integrity or value of the survey or of the surveyor's testimony regarding it had he been allowed to so testify. The material error, if any, lay in the refusal of the court to permit the testimony of the surveyor to be given; but in this respect the record shows that the surveyor, when called as a witness by plaintiff, did testify without objection to the extent of identifying the maps which he had made purporting to show the amount of leveling and checking which had been done by the defendant upon the land. These maps were then offered and admitted in evidence; and it was after these were before the court that the objection was for the first time made and sustained to the questions asked of the surveyor as to the leveling and checking of the land. The maps are not before us; and we are therefore unable to say that the evidence of the surveyor, if presented, would have added anything to what had already been shown upon the face of his map. The burden was upon the appellant to affirmatively show reversible error of the court in its ruling in respect to this matter; and we cannot say that such error appears in the absence of some affirmative showing or claim that the testimony of the surveyor would have added anything to that which had been already exemplified on the face of his maps. Aside from this, however, there is no record here as to what the issues were in the action for unlawful detainer, and in which it may well be that the evidence above offered would not have been proper rebuttal. It does appear, however, that upon the trial the plaintiff did assume to testify in chief as to the deficiencies in the defendant's work. The trial court, with the record of both cases before it, held that the plaintiff, having gone into the matter in chief, should have exhausted his proofs. In view of the state of the record we are unable to say that in so doing the court abused the discretion with which by the Code it is invested as to the order of proof in the dual trial before it.

Judgment affirmed.

PIERCE v. EMPLOYERS' INDEMNITY EXCH. et al. (Civ. 2303.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 27, 1917.)

1. Courts ⟹212 — District Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction.

In an action at law wherein the amount of the demand was less than $2,000, the appeal should have been taken to District Court of Appeal.

2. COURTS ⚷212—COURT WITHOUT JURISDICTION—POWER TO MAKE ORDERS—STATUTE.

Const. art. 6, § 4, defining the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal, and providing that no appeal to either of such courts shall be dismissed because not taken to the proper court, but the cause shall be transferred to the proper court on just terms, does not give to the court to which an appeal has been wrongly taken any jurisdiction to make orders extending time, or any other orders except the order of transfer, and, though the Supreme Court may transfer any case from a District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, until it has made such order of transfer it is without jurisdiction over cases in which the Constitution provides that appeal shall be taken to a District Court of Appeal.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷773(2)—FAILURE TO FILE OPENING BRIEF—DISMISSAL.

Where the time for filing appellant's opening brief had expired when notice of motion to dismiss was served and filed, respondent is entitled to dismissal as called for by her motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3104, 3108.]

Action by Ita Pierce against the Employers' Indemnity Exchange and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which transferred to the District Court of Appeal, and plaintiff moves to dismiss. Motion to dismiss granted.

Oliver O. Clark, George M. Pierson, and Claud B. Andrews, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ingall W. Bull and Fleming & Woodard, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] This was an action at law in which the amount of the demand was less than $2,000, and the appeal should have been taken to this court. Nevertheless the defendant Employers' Indemnity Exchange appealed to the Supreme Court, and filed its transcript with the clerk of that court on the 19th day of December, 1916. By order of February 6, 1917, the Supreme Court transferred the case to this court; the transfer being made on jurisdictional grounds. No brief having been filed on behalf of the appellant, the respondent Pierce, on February 8, 1917, served and filed notice of motion to dismiss, stating, among other grounds of motion, that appellant had not filed its brief or points and authorities within 30 days from the time of filing the transcript. More than 30 days after the transcript was filed, and before the transfer of the case to this court, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court signed an order extending appellant's time for filing points and authorities until the 19th day of February, 1917; and on the 19th day of February, 1917, the presiding justice of this court signed an order which was entered in the minutes, extending appellant's time for the same purpose for a further period of fifteen days. Without doubt the order obtained from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was inadvertently made by him without having his attention called to the fact that the appeals had been taken to the wrong court. Section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, after defining the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal, states that no appeal to either of those courts shall be dismissed for the reason only that the same was not taken to the proper court, "but the cause shall be transferred to the proper court upon such terms as to costs or otherwise as may be just, and shall be proceeded with therein as if regularly appealed thereto."

[2] It has never been held that this saving clause of the Constitution gives to the court to which the appeal has been wrongly taken any jurisdiction to make orders extending time, or any other orders, in such a case, except the order of transfer. It is true that the Supreme Court may transfer any case from a District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court; but, until it has made such order of transfer, it is without jurisdiction over cases in which the Constitution provides that the appeals shall be taken to a District Court of Appeal. The appellant cannot by its own mistake confer jurisdiction contrary to the Constitution. The order made by the presiding justice of this court extending the time of appellant for filing its opening brief was made without knowledge that respondent had served and filed a notice of motion to dismiss the appeals, and would not have been made if that fact had been called to his attention. That order, therefore, is revoked.

[3] As the time for filing appellant's opening brief had expired on the 8th day of February, when the notice of motion to dismiss was served and filed, respondent is entitled to a dismissal as called for by her motion. The rule to this effect has been settled by several decisions, among which are Barnhart v. Conley, 17 Cal. App. 230, 119 Pac. 200; McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359; Coats v. Coats, 146 Cal. 443, 80 Pac. 694.

Respondent's motion to dismiss the appeals is granted.

CHAMBERS et al. v. BELMORE LAND & WATER CO. (Civ. 2215.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷159(2)—LEASES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a landlord for breach of an agreement in a lease contract to construct headgates to enable the tenant to irrigate the land, evidence held to warrant a finding that the landlord's failure to construct such headgates was the proximate cause of the damage sustained by the tenant.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑159(2)—DEFENSES—DILIGENCE.

Where the failure of the landlord to construct headgates enabling lessees to irrigate land caused a crop failure on a large portion of the land planted, the lessees cannot be denied recovery on the ground that they should have constructed the headgates themselves, it appearing that such gates would have cost upwards of $2,000, for in such case the lessees had the right to rely on the landlord's agreement, and the case does not fall within the rule warranting denial of damages where one injured might have prevented the injury by reasonable diligence and slight expense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 611.]

3. NEW TRIAL 🔑102(2)—RIGHT TO—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence which was almost wholly cumulative, particularly where it appeared that the unsuccessful party by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have procured such evidence at trial.

4. COURTS 🔑91(1)—DECISIONS—PRECEDENTS.

The last decision of a court of last resort, though inconsistent with an earlier decision, is deemed to establish the law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by B. L. Chambers and another against the Belmore Land & Water Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barstow, Beach & Rohe, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Drew Pruitt and H. G. Redwine, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The subject of this action is defendant's alleged liability for damages due to its breach of the terms of a contract of lease made to plaintiffs. Upon trial judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs, from which, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] The evidence tended to establish the following facts: Defendant was the owner of a large tract of land in Fresno county, which it leased, for the growing of grain thereon, to plaintiffs, who agreed to pay defendant as rental therefor one-fifth of the crop grown thereon during the season of 1912. The land was located in an arid zone, by reason of which fact it was necessary in the growing of crops thereon to irrigate the same. The source of supply of water for such irrigation was two streams known as Silver creek and Panoche creek, having their sources in the mountains, and which as a rule during the rain and flood seasons afforded a supply of water, which, however, varied from year to year, depending upon the precipitation of moisture upon the watershed tributary to said creeks. In order to utilize the waters of the creeks for irrigating the land, it was necessary to construct a dam across the streams whereby to divert the water therefrom into a main canal, by means whereof and lateral ditches connected with said main canal, it was distributed over the land. The lease contained provisions as follows:

"It is agreed by party of the first part (defendant), that he shall construct a dam across the Silver creek and Panoche creek on or before December 20, 1911, and to place headgates at different points of turnouts. It is agreed by party of the second part (plaintiffs), that he shall use all water from Silver creek and Panoche creek diligently, which means, as long as water can be had in heads of one hundred inches or more, and that it shall be turned either upon the land farmed by said second party, or upon other land owned by party of the first part. It is further agreed on part of party of the second part (plaintiffs), that he shall keep said dam and gates in repair and that he will attend said dam in person or by reliable party during heavy rains."

Plaintiffs entered upon the land and in the winter of 1911 and 1912 plowed and prepared about 800 acres thereof for grain, which they seeded to barley, and also reconstructed and cleaned the lateral ditches extending throughout the tract for use in irrigating the grain. Defendant constructed the dam across said streams, completing the same some time in February and prior to there being sufficient rainfall to affect the flow of water in the creeks, but at all times neglected and refused to construct the headgates which it agreed to install in the main canal for the purpose of diverting water therefrom into the lateral ditches, the cost of which would have been about $2,000. It appears there was little rainfall upon the watershed tributary to said creeks during the winter, but that about March 1st there was a storm as a result of which the creeks were filled with water for a period of about 50 hours, during which time plaintiffs, as best they could without the headgates, and with a sufficient force of men and by means of dirt dams constructed in the main canal, irrigated about 100 acres of the barley which they had planted. It further appears that, had defendant complied with its agreement to put in the headgates in the main canal as promised, the flow of waters in said creek during said 50 hours could have been used to properly irrigate at least 400 acres of said barley, and that for want of the headgates it was impossible for plaintiffs to control the water and conduct it upon the land, as a result of which at least three-fourths of the water which might have been used for irrigation with the headgates installed was lost and dissipated. The conclusion of the court was that, notwithstanding the light seasonal rainfall, the flow of water in said creeks, had headgates been put in as agreed upon, would have enabled plaintiffs to irrigate 400 acres of the barley instead of 100, and that the 100 acres produced 15 sacks of 110 pounds each per acre, which, after paying the rent reserved in said lease, gave plaintiffs 12 sacks of barley per acre; and that said 300 acres additional, had they been irrigated, would have produced a like number of sacks per acre, the market value of which, after paying all expenses connected therewith, would have been $8,378.55.

While admitting its breach of the contract to install the headgates, appellant insists that such breach of the contract was not the proximate cause of the damage found to have been sustained by plaintiffs. Says appellant:

> "The record shows there were many steps between the headgates and the actual securing of a crop of barley."

It appears, however, that plaintiffs, relying upon defendant's promise, took every step required of them in the plowing, seeding, use of the water available for irrigation, and growing of a crop upon the land, and that, owing to the fact that the flow of water in said streams during the season of 1912 continued for only 50 hours, it was impossible by the use of dirt dams to irrigate more than 100 acres of land, whereas with the headgates installed, which would have permitted control of the flow of water, 400 acres could have been irrigated during said time. Nor is there any ground for claiming that the lack of irrigation of the crop was due to plaintiffs' failure to care for the irrigating system, since there is ample evidence to the contrary. The situation is explained by the testimony of one of plaintiffs' witnesses who, in referring to extra work done, stated:

> "If we had had the headgates and the turnouts, we would not need to have done this extra work. We made some of the dams before the water started and some afterwards; we had one in when the water first came, and we had to go up the ditch and turn it out into No. 6, and we had to turn it also to get it in No. 7. We had to go to the dam (a distance of four miles) and turn the water out of the main canal, go back down, put this mud dam in, and go up to the canal again and turn the water in there again and let it come down. A large part of the time during that 50 hours the water ran we had to turn it down the creek in order to put in the mud dams."

In our opinion, it is apparent from the evidence that, whatever might have been done in preceding years when for a long period of time the streams afforded a continuous flow of flood waters, the flow of water therein for a period of 50 hours only during the month of March, 1912, was insufficient to irrigate more than 100 acres of the land without the headgates called for by the contract; and that, had these gates been installed, the flow of water, as found by the court, was adequate to irrigate 400 acres. Hence the proximate cause of failure of the crop on the 300 acres of land was want of irrigation, due directly and solely to defendant's neglect to install headgates in the main canal by means of which the water diverted from the creeks could, with the force of men employed, have been controlled, and, through the lateral ditches constructed therefor by plaintiffs, properly distributed over the land.

[2] Conceding the damage sustained to have been due to defendant's breach of the contract, appellant nevertheless insists that plaintiffs should themselves have constructed and installed the headgates; in support of which contention it cites the case of Mabb v. Stewart, 147 Cal. 413, 81 Pac. 1073, to the effect that in a case of this character, where the party injured could with reasonable diligence and slight expense have prevented the injury, the measure of damage sustained is limited to the reasonable cost of doing that which would have prevented the injury. To the same effect is 1 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 88, where it is said:

> "Where the damages that would otherwise result from a wrong of this sort can be reduced by reasonable diligence and at slight expense upon the part of the party injured, the measure of damages, in case the injured party willfully and negligently fails to use the diligence or incur the expense, is not the serious consequences which actually and naturally result from the deprivation, but is limited to the reasonable expense which would be necessary to prevent further loss."

In the Mabb Case, plaintiffs could have prevented damage to the extent of nearly $3,000 by the payment of $30 wrongfully exacted by the defendant therein as a condition of supplying water for irrigation. While applicable to the facts in that case, the rule has no application to the circumstances in the case at bar. Plaintiffs had the right to assume that defendant would, prior to the need therefor, construct the headgates in accordance with its agreement. Moreover, if there was a slight rainfall only, the headgates would have been useless and of no avail to plaintiffs. The cost was not slight, but, as shown by the evidence, the expense of installing the same would have been some $2,000. The conditions existing and cost of the improvement render the rule to which we have referred inapplicable to the case.

[3] One of the grounds for a new trial was newly discovered evidence, in support of which defendant filed several affidavits. An examination of these not only shows that the alleged newly discovered evidence was touching issues presented by the pleadings, but almost wholly cumulative. Moreover, it appears that defendant by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have obtained the testimony of such witnesses for use at the trial. The issues being tendered by the pleadings, it was the duty of defendant to make such preparation to meet the same as it deemed advisable; and the fact that it expected plaintiffs to produce said witnesses is no excuse for its failure to have produced them.

There is no merit in the contention that the court failed to find upon material issues; and the claim that there was a settlement between the parties which, as to plaintiffs' claim for damages, constituted an accord and satisfaction, is groundless.

[4] The court in ascertaining and determining the damages sustained by plaintiffs followed the rule laid down in Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779, which conceding it to be in conflict with that of Crow v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 314, 62 Pac. 562, 1058, cited by appellant, must nevertheless, since it is later in point of time, be deemed the law upon the subject.

In our opinion, the appeal is without merit, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

RICHMOND DREDGING CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2095.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 26, 1917.)

Master and Servant 🔑417(7)—Workmen's Compensation Act — Award on Conflicting Evidence.

Where the Industrial Accident Commission made its award of compensation to an injured servant on a fairly substantial conflict in circumstantial evidence, the appellate court cannot interfere with the award, though the circumstantial evidence affords strong reasons in support of a conclusion contrary to that which the commission reached.

Petition for certiorari, by the Richmond Dredging Company against the Industrial Accident Commission and Resto Sulaver, to annul an award of the commission. Writ dismissed, and award affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission. C. Harold Caulfield, for respondent Sulaver.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, in support of its contention that the award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in this case should be annulled, argues that the evidence points all one way, viz. against the conclusion arrived at by the commission, and that there is no evidence in the record upon which its award can be based.

We are of the opinion, however, that there is a conflict in the circumstantial evidence upon which this award is founded; and while we feel that the commission might with propriety have reached a conclusion diametrically opposed to the one arrived at by it, and probably would have found stronger reasons in support thereof in the circumstantial evidence relied upon by the petitioner, nevertheless, having made its finding upon what we conceive to be a fairly substantial conflict in such evidence, we do not see how we can interfere with the award, and for that reason the writ is dismissed and the award affirmed.

SUHR v. METCALFE et al. (Civ. 1621.)

1. Assignments 🔑94—Rights of Assignee — Notice of Defenses — Payment under Building Contract.

The assignment of the last payment due a building contractor puts the assignee, independently of any statute, on inquiry as to the condition on which the payment was to be made to the contractor, and gives the assignee no rights against the owner greater than the contractor himself would have had, especially where the assignee consented in writing that a portion of such payment might be withheld to meet claims against the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 162-165.]

2. Set-Off and Counterclaim 🔑49(1) — "Thing in Action" — Statute — Right to Set Off.

An assignment of the last payment due under a building contract made before the payment was due is an assignment of a "thing in action" within Code Civ. Proc. § 368, providing that an action by the assignee of a thing in action is without prejudice to any set-off or other defense existing at the time of or before notice of the assignment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. § 107.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Thing in Action.]

3. Evidence 🔑450(7) — Parol Evidence — Explanation of Contract—Unambiguous Provisions.

Under Civ. Code, § 1638, providing that the language of a contract is to govern its interpretation if the language is clear and explicit and does not involve an absurdity, and section 1639, providing that, when a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a supplementary contract whereby a building contractor, in consideration of the owner's note acknowledged satisfaction in full for all extras due and agreed to deliver the building on completion, clear of any charge of any character whatever, including architect's charges, referred only to charges for the extras, since the provision clearly includes charges for work done under the original contract as well as the extras, and that provision is not an absurdity.

4. Evidence 🔑384 — Parol Evidence — Construction of Contract — Extrinsic Circumstances.

Civ. Code, § 1647, permitting explanation of a contract by reference to the circumstances under which it was executed and the matter to which it relates does not permit parol testimony to vary the express terms of a written instrument.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑1050(1)—Prejudicial Error—Admission of Evidence.

In an action by an assignee to recover the last payment for a building which the owner claimed the right to withhold to pay certain charges against the building, including architect's fees, error in admitting parol testimony that the builder's agreement to deliver free of charges was limited to charges for extras was prejudicial where the architect made no charge in connection with the extras.

6. Novation 🔑6—Building Contract—Order by Contractor—Acceptance by Owner.

Where a building contractor gave a subcontractor an order on the owner which the latter accepted, there was a novation by which the liability of both the original contractor and the owner became fixed so that neither the contractor nor his assignee could recover that amount from the owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Novation, Cent. Dig. § 6.]

7. Assignments 🔑57—Building Contract—Withholding Payment—Notice of Adverse Claims.

An order on the owner given by the contractor to a subcontractor and by the latter presented to the owner for acceptance is sufficient notice to the owner within Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, to entitle the owner to withhold the amount of the order from the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 116–120.]

8. Principal and Agent 🔑170(2)—Unauthorized Acts of Agent—Ratification by Principal.

Where the agent for an owner accepted for her an order drawn by the principal contractor in favor of a subcontractor, that acceptance, if unauthorized, was ratified where the owner was advised of the agent's action and accepted it thinking it all right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 639, 640.]

9. Contracts 🔑300(2)—Delay in Performance — Excuse — Building Contract — Statute.

Civ. Code, § 1511, providing that the want of performance or any delay therein is excused when performance is prevented or delayed by the act of the creditor or by operation of law, by an irresistible human cause or public enemy, or when the debtor is induced to make it by any act of the creditor naturally intending to have that effect, does not excuse the delay in performance of a building contract because of an agreement between the contractor and owner for extra work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1376, 1380, 1381.]

10. Contracts 🔑300(1) — Delay in Performance — Excuse — Acts of Owner — Storm.

Where a building contract provided that the time during which work was delayed by the owner or by stormy weather should be added to the time fixed for completion, but that no allowance should be made unless a written demand for additional time was presented to the owners by the contractor within 24 hours after the cause for such delay has accrued, delay is not excused by acts of the owner or his architect or by a storm where no demand for additional time was made by the contractor.

11. Contracts 🔑300(1) — Delay in Performance—Excuse—Street Improvements.

Street improvements by municipal authorities do not excuse delay in completing a building unless it rendered performance of the contract practically impossible; mere difficulty or unexpected expense not being sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by H. F. Suhr, Jr., against the Western Mortgage & Guaranty Company to recover certain mortgage certificates, in which Eva Metcalfe and another were substituted as defendants after the original defendant delivered the certificates into court. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the substituted defendants appeal. Reversed.

Luther Elkins and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Louis H. Brownstone and J. J. Lermen, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was in claim and delivery for the recovery of certain first mortgage 6 per cent. certificates of the face value of $11,500. The original defendant was the Western Mortgage & Guaranty Company, a corporation. Upon affidavit of the president of said company that the Metcalfes claimed to be the owners of said property and had made a demand for its possession, the court made an order directing the guaranty company to deliver said certificates to the clerk of the court, and that Eva and George Metcalfe be substituted as parties defendant in the place of said company.

The answer of said defendants sets forth the considerations which we are called upon to determine. Therein by suitable averment it appears: (1) That on or about the 2d day of April, 1912, the defendants entered into a building contract with the Mutual Construction Company for the construction by the latter of a hotel upon the lot of defendants on Geary street between Mason and Taylor, in San Francisco, for the sum of $141,350. It was agreed that $90,000 of that sum should be payable in certificates of the Western Mortgage & Guaranty Company, which were to be secured by a first lien upon said real property, and that $22,500 of the face value of said certificates should be retained by the defendants and not delivered to the contractor until 35 days after the completion of the building; (2) that Righetti & Headman, architects, were employed by the defendants to draw the plans and specifications for the building and to superintend its erection for the customary fee of 5 per cent. of the contract price, and that it was agreed between the Mutual Construction Company and defendants that said company would pay said fee; (3) it was stipulated that the building should be completed within ten calendar months from and after March 1, 1912, and that if the same should not be so completed the defendants should be entitled to damages from said construction company, not as a penalty, but as liquidated damages, the sum of $50 for each day the building remained uncompleted, and that on or about December 12, 1912, the contractor further agreed to deliver the said building free and clear of all charges and liens whatever, including any liens for architects' fees.

Then follows the specification of the particulars in which the contractor failed to keep its agreement: (a) It failed to pay the balance of the fee of the architects in the sum of $4,567.50, and it is averred that said Righetti & Headman claimed and asserted and have in fact a valid and subsisting mechanics' lien against said real property for this sum; (b) on June 9, 1913, the Mutual Construction Company was indebted to the Citizens' Construction Company for work and labor performed and materials furnished on said building as subcontractor in the sum of $2,124.80 and that said contractors gave an order on said defendants for said sum, which order was accepted on or about June 9, 1913, and that defendants are now indebted to said subcontractor in said sum; (c) the contractor failed to complete said building until four months after the time fixed in the contract, and that thereby defendants suffered a loss of rent and were damaged in the sum of $8,000; (d) at the time of the acceptance of the building it was uncompleted, and that for the purpose of securing its completion it was agreed that the defendants should retain the sum of $500 until the completion thereof.

It further appears that the $11,500 in face value of said certificates referred to in the complaint were part of the $22,500 final payment due 35 days after the completion of the building, and that the plaintiff at the time he acquired his alleged ownership of the certificates had full knowledge and notice of these rights, counterclaims, and offsets, and, furthermore, that on or about August 2, 1913, and after a knowledge and notice of all these facts, the plaintiff agreed to the retention by the Western Mortgage & Guaranty Company, the original defendant, of all these certificates until the performance by the Mutual Construction Company of all its covenants and agreements, including the payment of the demands above set forth.

The general findings and the judgment were in favor of plaintiff. As to the special defenses the court found that the Mutual Construction Company did not agree to deliver the hotel building to the defendants Metcalfe free and clear of all liens and charges, including a lien for architects' fees; that said company had not failed to carry out its contract with the exception that certain work on the ground floor of the building had been omitted pursuant to agreement, and for this work $500 of the $22,500 worth of certificates was ordered to be retained by the clerk until the building was finally completed. As to the claim of the Citizens' Construction Company it was found that at the time said order of June 9, 1913, was given there was nothing due to the Mutual Construction Company from the defendants Metcalfe, for the reason that said company had previously assigned and transferred to plaintiff all sums of money due to it from the defendants, and that at the time of the presentation of this order to defendants they had notice of this prior assignment, and as to the acceptance of said order it was found that the attorneys who had indorsed upon the order the acceptance had no authority to accept the same for the defendants.

[1] It can hardly be disputed that the rights of plaintiff as assignee of the Mutual Construction Company are no other or greater than those of said company, the contractor, and that, if the aforesaid defenses are sound and decisive as against said company, they may be urged with equal propriety and effectiveness against the claim of plaintiff. In other words, it seems plain that plaintiff by reason of the assignment is entitled to all the rights and is subject to all the liabilities of the Mutual Construction Company growing out of and based upon said building contract.

[2] Indeed, the assignment, as far as the present controversy is concerned, related to "a thing in action," since the last payment was not due when plaintiff succeeded to the rights of the contractor, and section 368 of the Code of Civil Procedure is in point:

> "In the case of an assignment of a thing in action, the action by the assignee is without prejudice to any set-off, or other defense existing at the time of, or before, notice of the assignment; but this section does not apply to a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange, transferred in good faith, and upon good consideration, before maturity."

Besides, it is clear from the record that plaintiff had notice, or at least was put upon inquiry, as to the conditional liability of the contractor, and therefore he cannot shield himself from the obligations of the contract. Again, on August 2, 1913, plaintiff consented in writing that the Western Mortgage & Guaranty Company should hold $12,500 of the said final payment under the contract for the protection of the defendants against these claims, and he cannot now repudiate his agreement.

In dismissing this point it may be said, indeed, that if the final payment supposed to be reserved for the protection of the owner can be so readily disposed of regardless of his rights, a building contract affords no obstacle to the facile and convenient perpetration of fraud against the property holder. But the fact must be, independent of any statutory provision, that the assignment itself of such claim demands an inquiry upon the part of the assignee to determine the conditions of future payments. To these alleged defenses, applicable to plaintiff as to the contractor, we therefore devote some attention.

[3] It is admitted that, on December 12, 1913, an agreement was entered into by the contractor and the defendants in the form of a letter as follows (letter head of Mutual Construction Company):

"San Francisco, Cal. Dec. 12/12.

"Mr. George Metcalfe and Mrs. Eva Metcalfe, San Francisco—Dear Sir and Madam:

In consideration of the execution and delivery to us this day of your note for the sum of fourteen thousand six hundred and eighty-six (14686) dollars, secured by a third mortgage on your property on Geary street we hereby acknowledge satisfaction in full for all extras due us upon the building constructed upon the lot on Geary street and we further agree to deliver said building to you upon the completion thereof clear of any charge of any character whatever, also including architect. * * *

"Yours very truly,
"Mutual Construction Co.,
"[Corporate Seal.]
"Per [Signed] S. L. Hansbrough, Secretary."

The question in dispute is as to the force and effect of the clause we have italicized. It is not claimed that by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake there was any failure to express the intention of either of the parties, but upon the contention that said terms are ambiguous parol evidence was admitted to show what was understood by the adopted form of expression. In that respect we feel entirely satisfied that error was committed. The language appears to us plain and unequivocal, and in this case if it is to be varied by parol no reason can be advanced why the same practice should not be permitted in any instance where parties have reduced their agreements to writing. How in concise phraseology it could be more clearly declared that the building when complete should be free from such a burden as the lien in question we are at a loss to understand. It was to be clear of any charge of any character whatever. This comprehensive language would necessarily include a lien for the architects' fees, but the company was not satisfied to let it rest at that, but has shown conclusively by specific mention that it had particularly in view a burden that might be imposed by reason of the architects' charge. The familiar sections of the Code cited by respondent do not, in our opinion, lend any support to his contention. The language herein seems to be clear and explicit and not to involve an absurdity, and therefore, within the purview of section 1638 of the Civil Code, said language should govern the interpretation of the agreement. Manifestly the agreement to turn over the building free from any liens does not involve an absurdity or even anything unusual or extraordinary, and, since the said conditions concur, the succeeding section of the Code (1639) would limit and confine to the writing itself the inquiry as to the intention of the parties.

[4] Section 1647, permitting explanation of a contract by reference to the circumstances under which it is executed and the matter to which it relates, may be of aid in many instances where it is apparent something needs explanation, but it cannot be extended to the point of permitting parol testimony to vary the express terms of a written instrument.

[5] If we are right in this position it would not be disputed that the error was prejudicial, for the reason that the parol evidence was offered and received for the purpose of showing that the intention was to relieve the building and the owners of any lien or burden for the possible charge of the architects for the extra work put upon the building, and the proof is that there was no charge whatever for said services.

While the said provision seems to us so certain as to preclude parol testimony to determine its meaning, there is force in the other consideration suggested by appellants that, if there be any uncertainty in the language, it should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist, that is, the contractor, who fits the position both of promisor and the person who prepared the contract. Section 1654, Civ. Code.

[6] We agree with appellants in their contention as to the claim of the Citizens' Construction Company. There is no dispute that the order for their payment was given by the Mutual Construction Company. We think it equally plain that it was accepted by appellants. If so, there was, in effect, a new contract, a novation, the substitution of one creditor for another. By that order the Mutual Construction Company authorized appellants to pay to said Citizens' Company, out of said 35 days' payment, the sum of $2,124.80, and when the order was accepted the liability and obligation of both became fixed. Neither could thereafter question it, and if the Mutual Construction Company were the plaintiff herein, there could be no doubt that defendants could set up said amount as an offset to the claim made to the said deferred payment. For reasons already stated, we think respondent, as assignee, is equally bound with the contractor, and that said offset may be urged against him.

[7] If we are right in the view that the assignee occupies the same position as would his assignor, then, of course, there is no force in the claim that it was necessary to have a notice to withhold given to the architect or owner as provided in section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But as to that appellants point out sufficient facts to show a substantial compliance with the requirement of that provision. The written recognition by the Mutual Construction Company of its obligation to the Citizens' Construction Company as made and directed to the owners on June 9, 1913, should be held equivalent to the notice provided by said statute, and the record shows that at that time the said Citizens' Company had a right to file a lien for the amount of its claim. The statute itself provides that:

> "No such notice shall be invalid by reason of any defect in form provided it is sufficient to inform the owner of the substantial matter herein provided."

As stated by appellants:

> "In the present case the Citizens' Construction Company notified the owner of its claim, for it presented the contractor's recognition of its validity and its amount, vouched for by the contractor and itself. It presented this claim to the owner and asked him to accept and pay it."

This was probably even more than the statute requires. It was at least equivalent to the notice contemplated by the law.

[8] It is contended that the court was justified in finding that this order was not accepted by Eva Metcalfe, the owner. There is no doubt, however, that Mr. Brandon, who was the attorney for Mrs. Metcalfe, accepted this order for her on June 9, 1913. He seems to have been representing her in all these matters, and although he had no express authority to sign the acceptance, it would not seem unreasonable to conclude that his authority was broad enough to cover such act. As to this also it may be suggested that respondent, standing in the shoes of the Mutual Construction Company, assumes rather a questionable attitude in denying the authority of the attorney who was recognized and treated by said company as the qualified agent of appellants. If the owner were disputing the authority of the attorney a very different situation would be presented. However, granting the want of authority, as claimed, it cannot be disputed that the unauthorized act of the attorney might be ratified by the principal and in this case there can be no doubt that it was so ratified. Mrs. Metcalfe's testimony was:

> "I was advised of the execution of this paper, Defendant's Exhibit F, by Mr. Brandon on or about June or July. I accepted it and thought it was all right."

This was a sufficient ratification within the teaching of Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 296, 32 Pac. 243, and Porter v. Lassen County, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 261, 59 Pac. 563.

Besides, as before indicated, this particular claim was covered by the letter of plaintiff of August 2, 1913, which was agreed to by Mrs. Metcalfe and the Mutual Construction Company. This appears clear enough from the testimony in the record, and we see no reason why the contract of these parties should not be enforced.

As to the damages claimed for the failure to complete the building within the time specified, we think the delay has not been entirely excused or justified and that said delay did operate to the detriment of defendants. It is claimed that the extra work consumed about 90 days, and that this was covered by a contract between the Metcalfes and the Mutual executed on December 12, 1913, "just 18 days before the defendants claim that the building should have been actually completed." The amount of the extra work was $14,686, and a third mortgage was given in payment of this. Respondent says:

> "It would be strange, indeed, if the defendants in this case were to be permitted to order $14,000 worth of extra work within 18 days prior to the time that the contract was to be completed and expect the same to be finished without allowing additional time."

But it appears that when this agreement was made the extra work had already been done, so the argument is not persuasive.

[9] To determine whether the extra work would excuse delay, we must look to the statute and to the agreement of the parties. The particular law in point is section 1511 of the Civil Code, as follows:

> "The want of performance of an obligation, or of an offer of performance, in whole or in part, or any delay therein, is excused by the following causes, to the extent to which they operate:
> "1. When such performance or offer is prevented or delayed by the act of the creditor, or by the operation of law, even though there may have been a stipulation that this shall not be an excuse;
> "2. When it is prevented or delayed by an irresistible, superhuman cause, or by the act of public enemies of this state or of the United States, unless the parties have expressly agreed to the contrary; or,
> "3. When the debtor is induced not to make it, by any act of the creditor intended or naturally intending to have that effect, done at or before the time at which such performance or offer may be made, and not rescinded before that time."

[10] The case does not seem to fall within any of these subdivisions. It is, however, covered by the contract of the parties. Extra work involves an act of the owners and a modification of the contract. In subdivision 3 thereof it provided that:

> "The time during which the contractor is delayed in said work by the acts of the owners or by the acts of God, which the contractor could not reasonably have foreseen and provided for, or by stormy weather which prevents the work, or by any strikes by employés or labor organizations, shall be added to the aforesaid time for completion; but no such allowance shall be made unless a written demand for additional time with the amount thereof approximately stated and the reasons for such demand given is presented to the owners by the contractor within twenty-four hours after the cause for such delay has accrued."

Then section 9 specifically provides for "alterations, deviations in, additions to, or omissions from" the plans and specifications, and declares that "the same shall in no way affect or make void the contract," except that the additional cost was to be added to the contract price. The extras therefore fall within said subdivision 3 and in order to claim an extension of time it was incumbent upon the contractor to make demand, which was not done.

In McGinley v. Hardy, 18 Cal. 116, there was a modification of the contract, but the case is different from this, in that there was no agreement that written demand should be made for extension of time, and the court very properly held that the new contract operated to extend the time for completion of the building.

We can see no reason why it was not competent for the parties to provide in their contract for an exclusive method by which the time could be extended as to this particular feature, nor do we see anything in the way of giving effect to such agreement.

The mistakes of the architect, we think, also fall under said subdivision 3. He was the agent of the owner, and his mistakes were therefore those of the latter. We think also that the interference by rain falls within said subdivision.

[11] It is at least doubtful whether the claim that a period of 30 days should be allowed because of the condition of Geary street is tenable. The court found that the delay was by reason of the act of the municipal authorities. We are not pointed to any evidence in the record that sustains the finding. It does not seem to be included among the facts of which the court may take judicial knowledge. No doubt, the municipal authorities were engaged at the time in constructing a railroad on said street and the proof was easily available, but it should have been produced. Probably through inadvertence it was not offered. As to whether such action of the municipal authorities would excuse the delay, we think the correct test is declared in Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 692, 109 Pac. 29, to the effect that it rests upon the consideration whether it rendered performance practically impossible, and in that connection it is said that mere difficulty or unusual or unexpected expense would not excuse the contractor. It is, in our opinion, a close question whether there is sufficient evidence to sustain the conclusion that the condition of said street rendered the performance of the contract "practically impossible," but as the evidence may be different upon another trial, we refrain from passing upon the point.

We think the judgment and order should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

LINCOLN v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Civ. 2199.)

2. Master and Servant 🔑281(9) — Servant's Injury—Contributory Negligence—Operation of Street Railroad—Disregarding Signal.

In a motorman's action for personal injury, evidence held sufficient to warrant jury in believing that plaintiff did not drive interurban car into an open switch causing collision with another car in disregard of switch lamp signals.

3. Master and Servant 🔑145 — Rules — Construction—"Under Full Control and Prepared to Stop."

Street railway company's rule that "trains must approach all meeting and passing points under full control and prepared to stop" meant control and preparation appropriate to probable emergencies; the purpose of rule being to avoid accidents.

4. Master and Servant 🔑281(9) — Servant's Injury—Contributory Negligence—Operation of Street Railroad—Violation of Rules—Speed.

In motorman's action for personal injury, evidence held sufficient to warrant jury in believing that plaintiff did not approach switch in disregard of company's rules as to speed, requiring trains to approach meeting and passing points "under full control and prepared to stop."

5. Master and Servant 🔑238(7)—Servant's Injury—Contributory Negligence—Operation of Street Railroad—Mistake in Judgment.

Where jury might have believed that a motorman's failure to stop car before running into an open switch was due only to a mistake in judgment, in using the reverse before applying the air brake, they were justified in holding him not guilty of contributory negligence.

6. Negligence 🔑98—Comparative Negligence—Operation of Street Railroads—Statute.

The fact that motorman negligently failed to stop his car before running into an open switch, colliding with another car, would not require a verdict against him in his action for personal injuries, if jury believed his negligence slight in comparison with employer's negligence, in view of St. 1911, p. 796, providing that employé's contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery for personal injury where his negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished in proportion to employé's contributory negligence.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑932(1)—Review—Presumption—Instructions.

Where instructions as to assessing an employé's damages for personal injuries in proportion to his contributory negligence as provided by St. 1911, p. 796, are not complained of, it will be assumed that jury properly assessed damages, making due allowance in accordance with the facts found.

8. Appeal and Error 🔑1048(6)—Harmless Error—Cross-Examination.

In a motorman's action for personal injury, refusal to allow defendant's cross-examination of plaintiff, "There is no way to account for it [running into open switch when lights signified it closed], is there?" was harmless, in view of further testimony elicited, which covered all matters which would probably have been developed upon answer to the question.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Verne H. Lincoln against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Defendant appeals from judgment for plaintiff and from order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. John S. Steely and Jones & Evans, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action wherein an employé of an interurban electric railway company seeks to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the negligence of the employer. The defendant denied all allegations of negligence, and as a separate defense alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The defendant has appealed from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The accident occurred at Long Beach, Cal., on February 6, 1913, at about 6:10 p. m. Plaintiff was, and had been for several years, a motorman of the defendant, running trains upon its line between Los Angeles and Long Beach. American avenue is a double avenue of the city of Long Beach, lying on the east and west sides respectively of a private right of way of the defendant company. On that right of way defendant has double tracks running north and south. At a point between Fifteenth and Fourteenth streets a curved track leads from the south-bound main track of defendant, swinging gradually southwesterly into Fourteenth street. In addition to its interurban cars, the defendant operated local cars, called the Willowville cars, and it was the custom to run Willowville cars into the curve above mentioned so as to allow the through trains south-bound to pass them on the main line. On the evening in question a Willowville car was running southward, followed by a three-car train of which plaintiff, Lincoln, was the motorman. The crew of the local car consisted of the motorman, Lysaght, and the conductor, Jesse Dunn.

At the point of divergence of the curved track from the south-bound main track and on the west side of the tracks, there was a switch stand on which was established a switch which was operated by a lever for the purpose of opening and closing the switch, which when opened gave access from the main tracks to the curved track. The switch was operated by a hand lever, and a part of the apparatus consisted of devices for signaling. These devices consisted of colored lights and also of flat sheets of metal called wings. When the switch was closed and locked and the main line in order, the white wings were perpendicular to the main track, and the red wings were parallel to the main track, green lights alone showing. When the switch was open for a train to take the siding, the red wings were perpendicular to the main track, and the white wings parallel thereto, red lights alone showing. In throwing the switch the top part of the switch would move through an angle of 90 degrees. The rules and regulations of the transportation department of the defendant company then in force were well known to the above-named employés, Lincoln and Dunn. Subdivision B of article 142 of those rules was as follows:

> "After a regular train clears the main track and switches are properly set for the main track, the conductor must step to the side of the track opposite the switch stand until after the opposing train has passed, keeping his hand lantern at night in full view of the approaching train, but giving no proceed signal."

Rule 112 was as follows:

> "Trainmen must not accept a proceed signal as against fixed signals, until they are fully informed of the situation and know they are protected. When fixed signals are in operation, trainmen must not give proceed signals against them."

On the occasion in question, in order to let a through train from Los Angeles pass a local car, the crew of the local car stopped at the switch between Fifteenth and Fourteenth streets. It was the duty of Dunn, conductor of the local car, to operate the switch for the passing of these cars. Dunn stepped to the ground, holding in his hand a red and a white lantern. He gave to the motorman of the through train, Lincoln, a signal with his red lantern requiring Lincoln to stop or slow down until the local car should have been taken out of the way. Dunn then went forward on the ground to the switch to open it so that his local car might get off the main line. The lamp of the switch stand then showed a green light northward and southward in conformity with a closed switch. Dunn opened the switch and the signals changed accordingly. The Willowville car proceeded and entered the switch, going ahead therein until its rear stood at the curb line between the railroad right of way and the westerly division of American avenue, about 138 feet from the switch point. Conductor Dunn, his local car having entered the switch, should then have thrown the handle of the switch westward again to close the switch, which would have caused the red light to disappear on the switch lamp and the green light to throw its rays northward toward the approaching through train. Both parties contend and the evidence tends to show that Dunn did not completely close the switch, but the parties do not agree upon the fact as to what Dunn actually did do. Appellant contends that Dunn left the scwitch entirely open in front of the through train, and that he closed it to cover up his fault immediately after the through train had passed into the curved track and the accident had happened. Respondent contends that Dunn closed the switch in front of the through train at least so far as to change the red light to green, and that the through train got into the curve in spite thereof. At any rate, it is the fact that the train swung into the curve without cutting, bruising, or marking either of the switch points or any of the rails, and crashed into the rear end of the Willowvville local car, whereby the plaintiff was injured.

Immediately behind the three-car train which had just entirely passed into the curved track, the switch was found set for the main track and with the green light showing properly northward and southward. Dunn, the conductor of the local car, denied that he had so set the switch after the collision. Two witnesses testified that they saw the light change its north and south rays from red to green immediately behind the train. Counsel in their briefs agree as to what were the respective theories upon which the case was tried. Respondent's theory is that Conductor Dunn left the switch partly open so that the flange of the right-hand front wheel of the first car engaged with the west point of the switch, which extends northerly 1¾ inches farther than the east point of the switch, and threw the switch instantly fully open and thus allowed the train to swing into the curve without derailment. Appellant's theory is that Conductor Dunn left the switch entirely open, and the respondent brought his train into the curve against a red light and into an open switch.

[1] Appellant concedes, of course, the rule that this court will not disregard a finding of fact by the trial court, or the implied finding of a jury, that is supported by evidence tending to support such finding, and that, if the evidence is conflicting, the finding based thereon will not be disturbed. But appellant contends that the physical facts shown, and against which there is no evidence, compel the conclusion that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence directly and proximately causing the accident. Under this general contention counsel for appellant urge four propositions: (1) That plaintiff was negligent in driving his train toward and into the switch, in disregard of the danger indicated by the lamp thereon, and the company's rules concerning same; (2) that plaintiff was negligent in approaching the switch point not under control, prepared to stop, as required by the rules of the company; (3) that if plaintiff approached said switch under full control, prepared to stop, then he negligently failed to stop within the distance intervening; (4) that the evidence is insufficient to establish any negligence against defendant, except in the failure of Dunn to close the switch, and plaintiff was equally negligent in that event.

[2] 1. The evidence is sufficient to support the implied finding against defendant on the first proposition. The plaintiff did not run into an open switch, with a red signal displayed against him. But it is argued that the switch could not have been entirely closed; for then the train would have remained on the main line. Let this be admitted. Then it is said by appellant's counsel that it is inconceivable that the switch could have been sufficiently open to have allowed the train to enter it, without a corresponding misdirection of the rays of the lamp signal; that to run toward a signal imperfectly displayed is as such negligence as to run against a full red light. In this connection out attention is directed to rule 125 of the company:

> "A signal imperfectly displayed * * * must be regarded as a stop signal."

In accordance with this rule the court instructed the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that as the plaintiff approached the switch stand the lamp signal thereon was imperfectly displayed, such imperfectly displayed signal or absence of signal was then and there, according to said rule, a stop signal, requiring plaintiff to stop his train before reaching the switch, and that a violation of that rule by the plaintiff would constitute negligence. To find a verdict for the plaintiff under this instruction, the jury must have believed from the evidence that the signal was not imperfectly displayed. Is the evidence of the physical facts so far beyond doubt that this finding could not be true? Appellant relies upon the evidence which shows the construction and mode of operation of the switch, and ecrtain photographs which were taken on April 23, 1913, which show the appearance of the switch and its signals in three positions, to wit, when the switch is open, when the switch is closed, and when the switch is half open, and contends that from that evidence the flange of the front right-hand wheel, which would touch the switch first, could not have passed to the right of the point of the switch rail, unless there was an opening of at least one inch at the switch point, which obviously could not be done without affecting the position of the switch lamp and causing its lights to become imperfectly displayed. These facts are relied upon to overcome the testimony of the several witnesses who testified that as the train approached the switch the green light was fully displayed; the contention being that it was physically impossible for this testimony to be true. But there are facts which impair the conclusiveness of this argument. Conductor Dunn, in describing what he did after his Willowville car had gone beyond the switch, said:

> "Then I picked up the switch lever and swung it around and threw it down, and looked up at the light, and it was green, and I stepped across the track and gave the high ball. I could not say whether I locked that switch when I threw it back or not, nor could I say whether I lowered the lever all the way down over the dog or not. After Mr. Lincoln answered me by two toots, his train came on down the line and took the switch without any warning."

Lee Higgins was conductor of the front car of the three-car train. He had been conductor on the Willowville line some time before the time of this accident and had operated the switch referred to herein; it having then the same system of locks and keys as at the time of the accident. He testified:

> "That the points of the switch do open, the one opening on the west and the other on the east closing, when the lever is begun to be moved, just begun to be moved, and yet the sign shows green."

There thus appears to be some testimony, which the jury was entitled to believe that the red light would not necessarily begin to show instantly at the beginning of the motion of the lever which was closing the switch, and that the accident may have been caused by failure of Dunn to effectually close and fasten down the switch towards which plaintiff's train was moving. It is therefore entirely conceivable that on account of the jarring of the train immediately before it reached the switch, or from some other cause, the switch opened enough to throw the train over to the curved track, and yet that the plaintiff would never have seen anything in the signal contradicting its first message to him indicating that the switch was safely closed.

[3, 4] 2. Rule 146 was as follows:

> "Trains must approach all * * * meeting and passing points, under full control, and prepared to stop."

There is no exactly prescribed definition of the conditions amounting to full control, nor of the precise limitations of a preparation to stop. These elements would differ according to the machinery and weight and length of trains or cars, and according to local conditions of tracks and grades. Of course, it means a control and a preparation appropriate to the probable emergencies, and has for its purpose the avoiding of accidents. The plaintiff testified:

> That when the Willowville car stopped, to go over to the curved track, his train was running at the rate of 1 or 2 miles per hour, and was 1,000 feet behind the local car. Then when the train advanced, he picked up speed. "I was going when I struck the switch about 12 to 15 miles an hour; 15 miles would put it to the limit." At that time "I had no electricity on at all." "The Willowville car was then standing at the curb line, between the right of way and the street, with the back end of it at that point, which is 138½ feet in a straight line from the switch stand. Going at 12 or 15 miles an hour, it would be impossible to stop a three-car train in that distance."

Plaintiff's testimony as to speed of his train on arriving at the switch was confirmed by numerous witnesses. Counsel for appellant call attention to the fact that six expert motormen testified that even at 15 miles an hour this train could have been stopped in 50 to 75 feet. There is no other evidence to the contrary, other than plaintiff's testimony showing how he used the stopping devices, and that nevertheless he failed to stop within the distance required to avoid the collision. The testimony of those motormen may favor appellant with respect to the next proposition which we are to discuss, but it really confirms the verdict as to the present question; for it entitled the jury to find that plaintiff had his train under full control and prepared to stop, if they believed that his speed did not exceed 15 miles per hour.

[5] 3. Then why did the plaintiff not stop his train in time to avoid the collision? His failure to do so is urged by appellant as establishing beyond doubt the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. In discussing this proposition we will assume that plaintiff had complied with the rule above stated, and that he came to the switch with his train under full control and prepared to stop. If this were not so, the plaintiff would have been negligent; for in view of the purpose of that rule it would be entirely beyond reason to hold that a properly managed train, if under full control and prepared to stop, would meet the emergency which this train faced, by running 138 feet into the rear of a loaded car, and going 35 feet further after the collision, before the train stopped.

What, then, was the defect in management which caused this train to go on as far as it did go? The train was equipped with devices for reversing the current through the motors, and also was equipped with air brakes. There is no claim that any of these were defective or insufficient. It follows as the night the day, that something was wrong with the plaintiff's management of the machinery committed to his care. His testimony was:

> That when he reached the switch he felt the car raise up and bump, like it had struck something, and immediately he realized that something was wrong, as his train went in on the siding. "The second I felt the jar or raising up, I reversed the current to check the train as quick as I could. and I held it there until I felt the train begin to go ahead again, and it felt like the breakers went out, and I then turned on the emergency brake. I figured that was the quickest way to check the train. * * * If it gets too heavy a charge—for instance, reversing the train—the breakers are put on there expressly to keep the motors from being burned up; and it felt like when I reversed it that it went out; and just the minute I felt the resets or breakers had begun to go, I put it in the emergency, as I thought that was the quickest way to stop the train." "I did all that was possible to stop the train, and I did not stop it until the collision came." "I put on the air as soon as I felt the train give way to the breakers or it felt like the breakers were gone."

All of the six motormen who said that a train of the kind in question and operating under the stated conditions could be stopped within 80 feet or less specified that this would be done by using the air brakes. A train moving at the rate of 12 miles per hour will travel 138 feet in about eight seconds. There is no statement in evidence showing how much time was consumed by the plaintiff in using the "reverse" before he applied the air brakes. Assuming, since the testimony on the point is not contradicted, that the train must have stopped within 80 feet after the air brakes were applied, and remembering that even when retarded by the collision the train did not stop until it had traveled 173 feet from the switch, it must be true that the plaintiff traveled 93 feet and used up five seconds of his precious time before he applied the air brakes. But, although defendant's witnesses declared that by full and instant use of the air brakes the train could have been stopped within 80 feet, they admitted a high degree of efficiency in the method of stopping a train, in emergencies, by reversing the current, a process which also reverses the direction of motion of the car wheels. It was admitted by one of these men, who had been employed as an instructor for the motormen that the motormen were sometimes instructed to use the reverse, in emergencies, "under certain conditions," to stop trains; also, "after applying the power and finding the power would not stop it, then applying the air under those conditions, he could do nothing else." Under the testimony, the jury may have believed that it was a mistake of judgment for the plaintiff to have tried the effect of the "reverse" before using the air brakes, and yet that this error did not amount to negligence.

[6, 7] And even if the jury found that the plaintiff was negligent, this fact did not necessarily require that the verdict be in favor of the defendant. At the time when this accident occurred there was in force a statute which changed in important respects the law relating to the liability of employers for injuries sustained by their employés while engaged in the line of duty of their employment. In section 1 of that act we find:

> That in actions to recover damages for personal injuries thus sustained, "in which recovery is sought upon the ground of want of ordinary or reasonable care of the employer, or of any officer, agent or servant of the employer, the fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé." Stats. 1911, p. 796.

The court instructed the jury in accordance with these provisions of the statute, and it is not suggested that there was any error in the instructions given. It is entirely inconsistent with the verdict that, although the jury might have attached the taint of negligence to the conduct of the plaintiff, yet that under the evidence they believed that his negligence was slight, and that the negligence of the defendant "was gross, in comparison." If so, it is to be presumed that in assessing damages the jury made due allowance in accordance with the facts found and as required by the statute.

4. The fourth point is that, if the defendant was negligent by reason of the failure of Dunn to close the switch, then the plaintiff was equally negligent. For reasons which are made apparent by what we have said in discussing the other points considered, this court cannot say that the plaintiff was "equally negligent" with the defendant. The evidence was such that the jury's finding upon the facts must be accepted as final.

[8] On cross-examination of the plaintiff, after the plaintiff had testified that as he approached the switch the light signal facing him was green, he said:

> "And then as I came along, going 10 or 15 miles an hour, my entire train entered that switch. I do not account for it at all."

Defendant's attorney then asked:

> "There is no way to account for it, is there?"

Plaintiff's attorney objected to this question as improper cross-examination and calling for a conclusion of the witness, and the objection was sustained. Appellant suggests that the witness had testified as to his long experience as a motorman, as to speed, stopping of trains, interpretation of signals, and so on, and contends that it was error to refuse permission to ask him how he could account for the fact that the train entered the switch. While the objection might very well have been overruled, we do not think that the defendant was seriously prejudiced by the contrary ruling. The further testimony elicited on the same cross-examination seems to have covered all of the matters which probably would have been developed by or followed upon an answer to the above quoted question. Several other alleged errors in rulings upon evidence are pointed out by appellant, but in their relation to the record they seem even less important than the objection which we have discussed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GOLDSTONE v. COLUMBIA LIFE & TRUST CO. (Civ. 1637.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 27, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1917.)

1. INSURANCE ⚷94—LIFE INSURANCE—LIABILITY OF INSURER—STATUTE.

Pol. Code, § 633, provides that no person shall act as the agent or solicitor of any insurance company in the state until he has filed with commissioner a duplicate power of attorney from the company, or its authorized agent, authorizing him to act as such agent or solicitor, and providing also for the issuance by said commissioner of a license to such agent. Held, that a life insurance company, by its violation of the statute, may not absolve itself from liability on an insurance contract that it has authorized or ratified, though the contract may have been secured by a person not an agent or solicitor in the full meaning of the statute; such statutory provisions as to agents do not change the rule of law as to principal and agent between the insurer and the policy holder, and the insurer, attempting to evade such statute, is nevertheless bound to a policy holder as though the statute had been complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 124.]

2. Insurance 🔑74—Life Insurance—Authority of Agent.

Where the general agent of a life insurance company requested L. to act as the company's agent in certain territory, but was informed by L. that he could not do so on account of his connection with another company, and the general agent proposed that the contract should be made in the name of L.'s wife, and that L. should be the active man in obtaining the business, which was done, L. was authorized by the insurance company to solicit life insurance.

3. Insurance 🔑655(2)—Life Insurance—Action on Policy—Evidence.

In an action on a life insurance policy, insurer setting up false answers of insured to questions material to the risk, and plaintiff claiming that such answers were falsely written in the application by the agent of the insurer, the trial court was technically in error in sustaining objection to the questions on the matter asked of the agent, who was not the agent of the company in full compliance with Pol. Code, § 633.

4. Insurance 🔑112—Life Insurance—Duty to Read Policy—Adoption of Agent's Fraudulent Act.

Where agent of life insurance company wrote false answers material to risk into insured's application, after delivery of the policy to insured it was the latter's duty to notify the insurance company of the fraud that had been attempted by the agent, and, by silence, he fraudulently approved of the agent's fraudulent act, and became responsible for it, so that the company was not liable on the policy, since it was insured's duty to read the policy upon delivery, and the court, in an action on it, must assume that he did so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 134.]

5. Insurance 🔑142—Life Insurance—Repudiation of Agent's Fraud—Duty of Insured.

Where the holder of a life policy containing false statements material to the risk fraudulently inserted in the application by the agent died within four months without repudiating the agent's fraud to the insurer, such delay was fatal to recovery; it being the duty of the insured to act promptly.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Beatrice Goldstone against the Columbia Life & Trust Company, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Albert Jacoby, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wood, Montague & Hunt, of Portland, Or., and Gavin McNab and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. By direction of the court and on motion of respondent a verdict in favor of the company was rendered by a jury, and the appeal is from a judgment entered thereon.

Plaintiff, widow of one Jacob Goldstone, brought the action as beneficiary named in a life insurance policy issued by respondent to said Jacob Goldstone on September 26, 1913. It appears that one of the conditions of the policy was as follows:

> "This contract of insurance is made in consideration of the application for this policy, a copy of which is hereto attached, and which application is hereby made a part of this contract."

In said application, signed by said Goldstone appears this covenant:

> "I hereby agree that the statements herein contained, together with the statements made by me to the medical examiner and contained in part 2 of this application, are hereby warranted to be true, full, and correct as facts, and that this application, together with the policy which may be issued, shall constitute the contract between me and the company."

It is the claim of respondent, fully set up in its answer, that, in violation of said agreement and for the purpose of defrauding the company, the insured gave false answers to certain questions that were material to the risk, and that therefore the company was relieved of any liability under said policy. On the other hand, appellant contended at the trial that the answers were written in by an agent of the company without the knowledge or connivance of the insured, and therefore the insurer cannot take advantage of its own wrong, but is charged with the same responsibility as though the answers were true.

The questions were as follows:

> (1) "Have you ever applied to any company or society or order for insurance without receiving a policy or certificate of the exact kind, rate, and amount applied for, or for reinstatement of a lapsed policy or certificate without being reinstated?" and (2) "Is any negotiation or application for other insurance now pending or contemplated?"

Each question was answered in the negative, whereas, admittedly, the truth is that on September 22, 1902, Goldstone had made an ineffectual application for life insurance to the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company of Milwaukee; likewise, in November, 1903, to the Guardian Life Insurance Company of New York; similarly, in August, 1913, to the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States; also to the New York Life Insurance Company, in August, 1902, and another to the same company in 1905; furthermore, in July, 1913, he made another application to the said New York Life Insurance Company, which application was still pending at the time the application herein concerned was made.

In pursuance of her contention plaintiff called as a witness one S. J. Levy from whose testimony it appears that he solicited from said Goldstone the said insurance; that he was the duly authorized agent of the said New York Life Insurance Company and had issued to him, pursuant to section 633 of the Political Code of this state, as such agent, a power of attorney; that prior to his interview with Goldstone he was visited at his office at 14 Montgomery street, San Francisco, by one B. F. Bernsten, then the acknowledged and admitted general agent of defendant for the state of California; that said Bernsten requested Levy to act as the agent of respondent in and around the territory of San Francisco, but was informed by the latter that he could not do so on account of his connection with the New York Life, a competing company, whereupon Bernsten, in order to get around and evade the law, proposed as follows:

> "Well, make the contract in the name of your wife, make her the agent, and you can be the active man in obtaining the business whatever it is."

Levy continued:

> "Under those circumstances, we entered into an agreement whereby the business was to be solicited by myself, but Mrs. Levy was to be known as the agent, in order not to conflict with the contract that I had with the New York Life Insurance Company."

Mrs. Levy was thereupon appointed such agent, and Mr. Levy, in accordance with his agreement with Bernsten, proceeded to solicit, procure, and write insurance for the defendant company, and among others he approached Goldstone, submitted to him for his signature said application for insurance, collected the premium, and subsequently delivered the policy in question to said deceased. Appellant then attempted to show by said witness that he wrote in the answers to said questions without the knowledge of the insured, but the court sustained an objection, and it was not permitted. The ruling was based upon the court's understanding of the force and effect of said section 633 of the Political Code, providing that:

> "No person shall in this state act as the agent or solicitor of any insurance company doing business in this state until he has produced to the commissioner, and filed with him, a duplicate power of attorney from the company, or its authorized agent, authorizing him to act as such agent or solicitor" —and providing also for the issuance by said commissioner of a license to such agent. The court, in holding that the case falls within said section, declared that it was enacted to the end that, if a broker or anybody else comes to one selling life insurance, there may be a safe way for the one solicited to find out whether the company is authorized to do business in the state, and also whether the solicitor is authorized to solicit insurance, and the court seemed to be of the opinion that no one acting as an agent could bind the company unless he was so commissioned, and that a person dealing with a solicitor not so authorized does so at his peril.

[1] Said section, no doubt, was enacted for the protection of the public as well as of the insurance companies, and its provisions, of course, should be complied with. No company should knowingly fail to regard its requirement, nor should any person assume to act as agent or solicitor without said power of attorney and said license. However, as far as the company is concerned, we do not understand that by its violation of said statute it may absolve itself from liability for a contract that it has authorized or ratified, although the contract may have been secured by a person not an agent or solicitor in the full meaning of the statute. The reasonable rule, we think, and one sustained by the authorities is that such statutory provisions as to agents do not change the rule of law as to principal and agent between the company and the policy holder, and that the company attempting to evade such statute is nevertheless bound to its policy holders, as though the statute had been complied with.

[2, 3] We think also that there is justification in the record for the contention that said S. J. Levy was authorized by the company to solicit said insurance, and also that his act in so doing was subsequently ratified. It would follow that the court was technically in error in sustaining the objection to the questions asked of the witness. It would seem almost incredible that one of some standing, as Levy must have been would be guilty of such reprehensible and even despicable conduct as to attempt deliberately the perpetration of a fraud upon the company and the deceased, but we must assume that his answers, if given, would have presented such a situation.

However, we need not go into that at length; as, notwithstanding such error, under the admitted facts, it must be held, we think, that the law demands the verdict that was rendered.

[4] As already seen, the policy was immediately delivered to Goldstone. It was his duty to read it, and we must assume that he did so. Long v. Newman, 10 Cal. App. 430, 102 Pac. 534. He knew, therefore, that his application as well as the certificate of the physician, each of which was an integral part of the policy and the consideration therefor, contained two material and vital statements that were false. His legal and moral duty was then to notify the company of the fraud that had been attempted. By his silence he virtually approved of the fraudulent act of the agent and became responsible for it. By his conduct he made Levy his agent as well as the agent of the company, and the forfeiture of the policy is the price of his folly. If he had pursued the course required by good conscience the company might have excused the misrepresentation, but, of course, that is merely problematical. He could at least have secured a return of the premium paid, but by his acquiescence he denied himself any relief from the wicked act of the agent of the company.

This feature of the case is covered by the decision of the Supreme Court in Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 142 Pac. 51, wherein one Graff, a soliciting agent for defendant, solicited the insurance from plaintiff, who was very deaf, as was well known to said Graff. The application for the policy was filled out by Graff, and, without being signed or read to or by plaintiff, was sent to the general agent of defendant. It contained a warranty to the effect that plaintiff was neither partially nor totally deaf. A policy was issued by the defendant and sent to plaintiff through the mail. In reversing the case the court said:

> "By accepting and retaining the contract without objection plaintiff was bound by its terms and cannot now be heard to say that he did not read it or know its terms."

Many cases are therein cited in support of the principle. We call specific attention to only two of them. One is the familiar case of New York Life Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 6 Sup. Ct. 837, 29 L. Ed. 934, wherein the court, through Mr. Justice Field, said:

> "There is another view of this case equally fatal to a recovery. Assuming that the answers of the assured were falsified, as alleged, the fact would be at once disclosed by the copy of the application, annexed to the policy, to which his attention was called. He would have discovered by inspection that a fraud had been perpetrated, not only upon himself, but upon the company, and it would have been his duty to make the fact known to the company. He could not hold the policy without approving the action of the agents, and thus becoming a participant in the fraud committed. The retention of the policy was an approval of the application and of its statements. The consequences of that approval cannot after his death be avoided."

In Quinlan v. Providence, etc., Insurance Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645, it is said:

> "In determining the question of liability in this case it is immaterial whether the plaintiff read the policy or not, or that he had no actual knowledge of the conditions or of the limitations of the power of Kelsey. The conditions and limitations were a part of the contract, and he was bound to take notice of them, and is not excused upon the plea that he omitted to acquaint himself with the provisions of the policy."

Nor do we think there is any force in the contention that the Madsen Case should not be considered controlling for the reason that therein the agent was a mere soliciting agent and the time during which the policy was in possession of the insured was a period of several years. S. J. Levy was no more than a soliciting agent here. At least, he had no authority to waive warranties for the company, and was therefore in no better position in that respect than a soliciting agent. This question of the authority of an agent to waive conditions is learnedly discussed in Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 117, 138 Pac. 708, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 670, and we need not further consider it.

[5] As to the time, a delay of four months in repudiating the fraud is as fatal as a delay of four years. It is the duty of the insured to act promptly. He cannot speculate with death. It is, of course, always imminent, and at any moment it may claim even the most robust. The situation of the insured and the nature of the contract made it his imperative duty to act immediately. The importance of such speedy action is certainly emphasized by the circumstance of his death within a little less than four months from the time the policy was issued. In the absence of any claim that the delay was caused by any act of respondent or that it was unavoidable for any reason, we consider it fatal to a recovery.

The cases generally seem to take it for granted that the insured must act with great promptness in such contingency. We may refer specifically to only one, decided by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, Bostwick v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 116 Wis. 392, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246, reported with an exhaustive note in 67 L. R. A. 706, wherein a similar question was involved. Therein it was held that:

> "If a person receives a policy of insurance ostensibly in response to an application therefor, which he signed and parted with in the belief, induced by the fraud of the agent taking the same, that it called for a policy different from that which it called for in fact, he is bound, as a matter of law, to examine the policy within a reasonable time after it comes to his hand, and to discover obvious departures therein from the one which he supposed he was to get, and promptly, upon discovering the same to rescind the transaction, give the company due notice thereof, and do all on his part which justice requires to restore the former situation, or he will be held to have accepted the policy as satisfying his application, so as to be precluded from rescinding the same."

And it was further held that the "reasonable time" began to run when he received the policy, and that a delay of four months and a half before moving to rescind is too long a time.

We think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

FOLEY v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (Civ. 1950.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 28, 1917. Rehearing Denied March 29, 1917; Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1917.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑126—OFFICES—COUNCIL'S POWER TO ABOLISH.

The act of a city council in abolishing an office is an exercise of legislative power.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑191 — OFFICERS — COUNCIL'S POWER OF REMOVAL — CHARTER.

One appointed assistant sanitary inspector under city of Oakland ordinance could be removed by ordinance abolishing the office, the council being empowered by Charter, § 31 (St. 1911, p. 1551), to discontinue offices, and section 39, providing that council shall be vested with all powers of legislation "adequate to a complete system of local government," and the charter not limiting that power; and section 80, providing that persons employed by the city on September 1, 1910, may retain their employment subject to reclassification by the civil service board unless removed for cause, or because the civil service board determines "that their employment by the city is unnecessary," did not deprive the city council of authority to abolish the office itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by J. G. Foley, against the City of Oakland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Paul C. Morf, City Atty., and W. H. O'Brien, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant. Charles A. Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an adverse judgment. The case involves the proper construction of certain provisions of the charter of the city of Oakland.

[1, 2] The facts of the case may be summarized as follows: The city of Oakland is a municipal corporation governed by a freeholders' charter (Stats. 1911, pt. 2, p. 1551). The health department is under the direction of a commission of public health and safety. Ordinance No. 350 N. S. created the position, among others, of assistant sanitary inspector in that department. The plaintiff was in the employ of the city on September 1, 1910, and was appointed to said office of assistant sanitary inspector. On July 20, 1915, said ordinance was repealed by Ordinance No. 885 N. S. with the consequent abolition of the position held by the plaintiff. Section 31 of the charter (found at page 1575 of the Statutes of 1911) provides:

> "The council shall have the power by ordinance to creat, consolidate and discontinue offices, deputyships, assistantships and employments other than those prescribed in this charter * * * and also the method by which * * * such office, deputyship, assistantship or employment * * * shall be declared vacant."

Section 39 of the charter (Stats. 1911, p. 1577) reads:

> "The council shall be the governing body of the municipality. It shall exercise the corporate powers of the city, and, subject to the express limitations of this charter, shall be vested with all powers of legislation in municipal affairs adequate to a complete system of local government consistent with the Constitution of the state."

The act of a city council in abolishing an office is an exercise of legislative power. Downey v. State, 160 Ind. 578, 582, 67 N. E. 450; 5 R. C. L. 614. There is no express provision in the charter limiting the legislative power of the council to create or abolish offices or positions other than that contained in that part of section 31 above quoted; in fact it is not contended that the city council has not the general power to create and abolish clerkships and offices. Respondent's position is based on the latter part of section 80 of said charter (Stats. 1911, p. 1605), which section, after enumerating the employés of the city excepted from the civil service provisions of that act, reads:

> "Provided, that persons employed by the city * * * on September 1, 1910, may retain their employment under the city, subject to classification and reclassification by the civil service board without further examination, unless removed for cause, or unless it shall be determined by the civil service board that their employment by the city is unnecessary."

Respondent argues that, while the city council may have the general power to abolish offices, such power, under the above-noticed portion of section 80, is vested in the civil service board so far as those persons are concerned who were in the employment of the municipality on September 1, 1910.

We think this position cannot be maintained. The civil service board is given power to determine that an employé is unnecessary, and it may perhaps remove him and leave the office vacant, but still existing; but the provision of the charter conferring this power fails far short of depriving the city council of its authority to abolish the office itself. On September 1, 1910, the date referred to in section 80 of the charter, the board of freeholders were engaged in framing the present organic act; and doubtless it was deemed expedient not only to give the persons who were at that time in the employ of the municipality civil service standing without examination, but also to subject them to removal only for cause or upon a showing that their employment was unnecessary, instead of leaving them, as are other civil service employés, subject to removal by the heads of the different departments of the city, with a right to appeal to the civil service board. But the charter did not go farther in this behalf; and section 80 thereof does not give to the civil service board the power to abolish offices, such power being lodged only in the council.

The judgment is reversed.

PLEASANT VALLEY HOTEL CO. v. HENDERSON. (Civ. 1955.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 24, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1917.)

Limitation of Actions ⟹46(1)—Contracts—Ratification of Transactions.

Where corporate directors in January, 1912, borrowed money from the corporation agreeing to repay it when certain purposes should be accomplished, and those purposes were accomplished in April, 1913, at which time each of the two directors was charged with one-half the loan on the books of the corporation, the corporation may maintain an action for such sum in November, 1914; for, as the corporation ratified the transaction in April, 1913, the cause of action did not accrue until then, and the two-year period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, had not expired in November, 1914.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by the Pleasant Valley Hotel Company, a corporation, against E. A. Henderson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant. C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an adverse judgment. The question for determination in this case is as to whether or not, of the several causes of action alleged in the complaint, the demand therein set forth for $1,000 was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The record shows that the action was commenced on November 19, 1914; that on January 6, 1912, defendant and one George F. Patterson, who were directors of the Pleasant Valley Investment Company, plaintiff's assignor, borrowed from that company $2.000 for certain purposes, and agreed to repay the same when those purposes should be accomplished; that those purposes were accomplished so far as they could be in April, 1913, at which time, in compliance with their agreement, each was charged on the books of the company with $1,000, and that at that time each agreed to pay to the investment company such sum; that George F. Patterson paid the money so borrowed by him; but that the defendant has failed and neglected to repay the amount so charged against him.

Assuming that the circumstances under which the $2,000 were obtained from the Pleasant Valley Investment Company stamped the transaction as a conversion of the funds of that company, still the company could waive the conversion, and, repudiating the action of defendant and Patterson, could perhaps have brought an action immediately for money had and received. However that may be, it appears from the record that the Pleasant Valley Investment Company elected to ratify in detail the transaction as negotiated by those directors; it chose to adopt their acts as its own, to regard them as valid, and to enforce the performance of the obligations arising therefrom. Therefore the statute of limitations did not commence to run against the plaintiff's cause of action on January 6, 1912, the time the money was obtained by defendant and Patterson, but from the time the obligation to repay was fixed, to wit, in April, 1913. The action therefore, having been filed in November, 1914, was brought before it was barred by the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. JOHNSON et al. (Civ. 1615.)

1. Husband and Wife 🔑270(10)—Findings to Support—Fraudulent Conveyance of Community Property.

A wife, suing her husband for separate support and maintenance, and joining certain of his relatives on the theory that they had, by means of a fraudulent conspiracy with him, acquired certain real estate alleged to be community property, was not entitled to a decree against the grantees, there being no finding of fraud and the evidence showing that they had paid full value and consideration for the conveyance of the property by the husband to them.

2. Husband and Wife 🔑301—Community Property—Fraudulent Conveyance by Husband—Judgment for Wife for Attorney's Fees.

If there was fraud in the husband's conveyance to his relatives, there was no authority, statutory or otherwise, under which the court was warranted in rendering judgment against the grantees for $150 attorney's fees in favor of the wife.

3. Husband and Wife 🔑267(1)—Community Property—Decree for Support and Maintenance—Marital Relation.

A decree for permanent support and maintenance in favor of a wife did not affect the marital relation, and until such relation is dissolved, the husband is entitled to control the community property, with absolute power of disposition other than testamentary, though, without the wife's written consent, he cannot make a gift or conveyance without valuable consideration under Civ. Code, § 172.

4. Husband and Wife 🔑286—Wife's Suit for Separate Maintenance—Effect.

The purpose of a wife's suit for separate maintenance is specifically to enforce her husband's general duty by directing him to make certain definite payments at regular intervals for her support, and, subject to such provision, the relations of the parties to each other and the community estate is the same as if no such action had been brought or an award made.

5. Husband and Wife 🔑299(1)—Suit for Separate Maintenance—Community Property—Judgment.

In a wife's suit against her husband for permanent support and maintenance, wherein she joined some of his relatives on the theory that, by means of a fraudulent conspiracy, they had acquired certain community realty, where the court found that a trust company should be appointed trustee of half the amount of the community estate, to receive and disburse the same on the wife's order, the judgment giving such fund to the wife absolutely, and without limitation, was improper.

6. Husband and Wife 🔑298½—Separate Maintenance—Findings.

In a wife's suit for separate maintenance and support, wherein she joined her husband's relatives on the theory that he had fraudulently conveyed certain community realty to them, defendants were entitled to findings on issues presented by their answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Sarah Johnson against Nels Johnson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles (Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants. J. H. Ryckman, of Los Angeles, Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff, without asking for a divorce, sought a decree awarding her permanent support and maintenance, as provided in section 137, Civil Code. Upon the theory that they had, by means of a fraudulent conspiracy with her husband, acquired certain real estate alleged to be community property of the couple, and thus deprived her of her interest therein, she joined as defendants with him his father and mother, Frank and Beda Johnson, and his brother, Bayard Johnson. Plaintiff obtained a judgment, from which all of the defendants appeal upon a record presented in accordance with sections 953, 953a, and 953b, Code of Civil Procedure.

By the decree it was adjudged that plaintiff, Sarah Johnson, do have and recover of and from defendants Beda Johnson, Frank Johnson, and Bayard Johnson the sum of $1,787.50, together with attorney's fees of $150, which sum of $1,787.50 the court adjudged to be one-half of the proceeds of the community property so conveyed by Nels Johnson. It was further adjudged that Nels Johnson pay to plaintiff the sum of $20 per month as an allowance for the support and maintenance of Frances Johnson, the minor child of plaintiff and her husband. As stated, the theory of the complaint as to the defendants other than the husband was that they had, by means of fraud, acquired community property of plaintiff and her husband.

[1] Waiving any question as to the sufficiency of the allegations of fraud, as to which, however, we entertain grave doubt, there is no finding of fraud on the part of any of the defendants; nor is there any evidence whatsoever tending in the slightest degree to justify a finding that would warrant a judgment such as that here rendered against defendants Frank, Beda, and Bayard Johnson. For aught that appears in the findings to the contrary, they paid full value in consideration of the conveyance of the property so made by Nels Johnson to them, and the evidence without substantial contradiction shows the payment of such consideration. Briefly stated, the evidence shows that after his marriage Nels Johnson obtained a contract for the purchase of a lot at the price of $1,800. In making the first payment he borrowed $500 from his father, which sum he paid thereon at the execution of the contract. Of the deferred payments $750 was paid out of his earnings after marriage. Being unable to keep up the payments and being largely indebted to his father, he, in payment of such indebtedness and $150 cash at the time paid to him by his father, conveyed the property to his mother, who paid the balance of $550 due upon the contract for the purchase thereof and took a deed to the property, which she afterwards conveyed to her son Bayard Johnson for $2,500, and he, under an arrangement with his father, conveyed it in exchange for an equity in other property which was subject to a mortgage of $7,500. The court found this equity to be of the value of $4,125 which, after deducting the $550 paid by Beda Johnson, left $3,575, all of which the court declared to be community property of plaintiff and her husband. It thus appears that, at most, $1,250 represented the community interest in the lot, and since it is conceded that Beda Johnson in acquiring the deed thereto paid $550 of the purchase price, it would appear in any event that she was entitled to such proportionate share of the $4,125 as her payment bore to the purchase price of the lot. In her complaint plaintiff alleged that the first payment of $500 made upon the contract of purchase was paid out of the separate funds of Nels Johnson. If her allegation be accepted as true, then only $750 paid in the purchase of the lot constituted community funds.

[2] Assuming the existence of fraud, we know of no authority, statutory or otherwise, under which the court was warranted in rendering the judgment against defendants other than Nels Johnson for the sum of $150 attorney's fees.

[3] Moreover, the decree did not affect the marital relation (McKay on Community Property, § 410; Kusel v. Kusel, 147 Cal. 57, 81 Pac. 295), and until dissolved, the husband was entitled to the control of the community property, with absolute power of disposition other than testamentary, provided that without the written consent of the wife he could not make a gift thereof or convey the same without a valuable consideration (Civ. Code, § 172), and we know of no principle of law under which a wife without obtaining a divorce can be awarded one-half of the community estate. The case of Cummings v. Cummings, 14 Pac. 562, was an action for divorce wherein the plaintiff, alleging that the husband had conveyed community property with the intent on the part of both the grantor and grantee to defraud plaintiff of her rights therein, sought a decree annulling the same and awarding her a one-half interest therein. It was there held that an action to set aside a conveyance of community property made by a husband, on the ground of fraud, cannot be maintained by the wife while the marriage bond exists. In support thereof the court cited the case of Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 115, where it was likewise held (quoting from the syllabus):

> "A wife cannot maintain an action while the marriage bond exists, to set aside a transfer of the common property, made by the husband for the purpose of defrauding her."

See, also, Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 312; Kusel v. Kusel, supra; Tibbetts v. Fore, 70 Cal. 245, 11 Pac. 648; Valensin v. Valensin (C. C.) 28 Fed. 602.

[4] The purpose of the suit for separate maintenance is to specifically enforce the general duty of the husband by directing certain definite payments to be made at regular intervals for the wife's support. Subject to such provision, their relations to each other and to the community estate is precisely the same as though no such action had been brought or an award made. The status of the parties may be restored by reconciliation, in which case the necessity for the separate maintenance would terminate. Notwithstanding this fact, however, or other conditions which might be mentioned, a judgment of this character would give to the wife one-half of the community property.

[5] Another objection made to the judgment, which seems to be well founded, is that the court found that the Title Insurance & Trust Company should be appointed as trustee of one-half of the amount of the community estate, to receive and disburse the same upon plaintiff's order, but in the conclusions of law, as well as in the judgment, the court gave said fund to plaintiff absolutely and without any limitation thereon. It is not awarded as maintenance, but the judgment awards it to plaintiff absolutely, to be dissipated, given away, lost in speculation, or used in any manner which her fancy or whims might dictate.

[6] The answer of defendants alleged that in a former action brought by plaintiff against Nels Johnson for divorce, a trial of which was had, the matters alleged in this action had been adjudicated and determined by the court, wherein the divorce was denied, but an order was made under section 136 of the Civil Code, allowing plaintiff $25 per month for maintenance. The answer also alleged that defendant Frank Johnson had loaned to defendant Nels Johnson the sum of $500 for the purpose and used by the latter in making the initial payment upon the contract for the purchase of said lot. The court made no finding as to either of these issues tendered. Clearly, defendants were entitled to findings upon both issues.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Zanona Matchette and another against the California Fruit Canners' Association. Defendant appeals from judgment for plaintiffs and from order denying new trial. Reversed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant. Preston & Preston and Barrett & Thomas, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. Charles C. Matchette, a brakeman in the employ of the harbor commissioners of the state of California on its belt line railroad in the city and county of San Francisco, met his death while in the performance of his duties as a member of a switching crew on the premises of the defendant, the California Fruit Canners' Association. This action was brought by his widow and minor daughter to recover damages for his death, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant for the sum of $5,000, and from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The first contention of the appellant is that the evidence fails to establish that any duty owed to the deceased by the appellant was left unperformed, or that it was guilty of any negligence whatever, but that, on the contrary, the evidence affirmatively shows that the death of Matchette resulted from his own negligence. From the correctness of this contention we see no escape.

The record discloses the following facts: The defendant at the time of the injury complained of owned and maintained certain buildings situated in San Francisco which it used in the operation of its business of canning fruit and for warehouse purposes. Between these buildings was a space of some 72 feet or thereabouts upon which were constructed two spur tracks from the Belt Line Railroad owned and operated by the state of California. These spur tracks were standard gauge, and their length on defendant's property was approximately 210 feet. At the point where these tracks entered the defendant's property they were built on a curve, the curve continuing a distance of some 120 feet, from which point the tracks ran straight for a like distance upon said property. Parallel to the track throughout its entire length and on the westerly side of the cannery building there had been erected a platform, varying in width from the point where the track was straight to the place of the accident, and the edge of which was about 4 feet 8 inches from the outer rail of the easterly spur track. The tracks were laid upon a trestle about 14 feet high, which rested upon the basement of the building, and the platform was about 3 feet 6 or 7 inches above the level of the track. On the morning of February 23, 1911, the day of the accident, the switching crew of which deceased was a member had switched one car onto the westerly spur track on defendant's premises, and then pulled their train back into Beach street, which bounds the south side of defendant's plant, and switched a large box car loaded with cans upon the easterly spur track. The switching equipment of the railroad consisted of an engine and a flat car called a trailer. The crew was composed of the engineer and fireman, two switchmen, and a foreman. The deceased was one of the switchmen, and it was his duty on this occasion to spot the car that was being delivered; that is, to put it at a place on defendant's spur track indicated by the foreman. When the train which caused the accident was being backed in it consisted of an engine, next the trailer, and the box car that was being delivered. The trailer had a running board at one end, upon which the other switchman, Conway by name, took a position where he could receive and transmit to the fireman or engineer the signals given by the deceased. In the performance of his duties deceased took a position against the platform before mentioned, and as the train came in over the easterly spur track and swung on the curve the middle of the large box car struck him and pressed him against the edge of the platform, causing his death. The evidence conclusively shows that the deceased had been in the railroad business for a number of years and was an experienced brakeman, that at the time of the accident he had been employed on the belt line road for several months as a member of the switching crew, and had been upon the defendant's premises many times before, and that he had on former occasions been accustomed to deliver large box cars, such as the one that crushed him, upon this identical spur. The evidence further shows that the position which the deceased took was not necessary for the performance of his duties. The engine was in such a position that he could not signal directly to the engine crew, and it was his business only to instruct his fellow switchman, who was on the trailer, and who in turn would pass on the signal to the engine crew. There was no object to be served by his being upon the ground, the chief purpose of a switchman taking such a position being to couple or uncouple cars, or to give signals directly to the engine crew or throw switches, none of which acts were required of the deceased at this time, Conway being there for that purpose. The duty of deceased was merely to spot the car. In the performance of that duty he had free choice of several positions where he could have stood. He could have stood upon the platform, or he could have signaled from the side or top of the car, or he could have stood between the tracks.

Under these circumstances it is argued by the appellant that the deceased selected a place of obvious danger to perform his duties; that he knew, or ought to have known, that while a space of less than 5 feet between the outer rail and the form on a curved track might leave room enough in the case of a flat car, when a large car with its additional overhang such as caused his death was being switched in it was impossible for a man to stand there and avoid being struck by the car.

[1] The duty of an employer to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place to work is fulfilled when he exercises ordinary care for that purpose. Deceased was properly upon defendant's premises under an implied invitation. It was the defendant's duty to use reasonable care in providing a reasonably safe place for decedent to work, and, so far as the evidence shows, it fully discharged that duty. Deceased was an employé of the belt line railroad, and under the control of his superiors. The appellant could not instruct him as to the manner in which he should do his work. The deceased had assisted in bringing up the car which crushed him, knew its dimensions and was an experienced brakeman, and he had a free choice as to where he should stand to spot from, and he chose a place of obvious danger. The location by defendant of the permanent structures necessary and convenient to accommodate its business near the tracks did not of itself constitute a danger; and even assuming that it did, it was obvious to the deceased, who, as we have said, was an experienced railroad man.

[2] The recent case of Hontz v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 161 Pac. 971, is, in our opinion, on all fours with the case at bar. There the deceased was an experienced brakeman, and while a member of a switching crew engaged in moving cars in the lumber yard of the defendant company was killed. Over a spur track in the lumber yard there was a drawbridge which was raised to an upright position when switching was in progress. At times when raised the drawbridge sagged and leaned a trifle over a pit. This fact constituted no peril when flat cars only were being handled, but it brought the bridge close to the side of box cars. The bridge at the time of the accident was raised, and it leaned slightly toward the track. Decedent knew the position of the bridge, but for some unexplained reason in broad daylight, and without any necessity for so doing, he started to climb the ladder on the side of a moving box car, and before reaching the top came into collision with the bridge and was killed. Mr. Justice Henshaw, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> "It is a universal principle that, when a safe way has been provided for an employé for the performance of an act, and another and dangerous way exists, if the employé chooses to take the dangerous way and is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law."

[3] It is argued by plaintiffs, however, that the questions of negligence and contributory negligence were for the jury, and that, as those questions were resolved in plaintiffs' favor, this court should not disturb the verdict and the judgment based thereon. The case last cited effectively disposes of this contention also, for it is there said:

> "But if, in cases such as this, it is to be said that the question of contributory negligence is one of fact, it is extremely difficult to conceive of a case where it could be one of law."

This statement of the law is applicable with equal force to the present case; for the facts and conditions upon which the question arises are identical. Here, although the distance between a car of ordinary size and the platform was not great, still it was perhaps sufficient for a brakeman using great care to stand there, but when large cars were switched in he could not do so without being struck; and, as before stated, the deceased was familiar with the premises, experienced, and had switched in like cars before, at which times he spotted from other positions. The entire evidence thus shows conclusively that the deceased was killed through his own negligence.

[4] Untenable also is the contention of the plaintiffs that the defendant created a trap by failing to comply with the terms of a contract it had entered into with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, under which the track was built, which in part provided that defendant was not to erect or maintain a platform nearer to the track than 4 feet 8 inches. The rights of the parties hereto, as the trial court correctly instructed the jury, are in no manner measured by or dependent upon such contract. The obvious purpose of the provision in that contract was to leave a space that would accommodate large cars; and even if the provision had been complied with, the space would have been increased but a few inches, and the danger, for aught the evidence shows, would have been equally great, because any person who stood between the car and the platform when large cars were switched in was certain in any case to be struck.

In view of the conclusion we have thus reached it becomes unnecessary to notice the question of the proximate cause of the injury and further questions presented by the briefs.

The judgment and order are reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 1, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 30, 1917.)

1. ELECTIONS 🔑51—OFFICERS—TRANSFER OF OFFICER.

Where the civil service commission failed to obey the mandatory provision of Charter of Los Angeles County, art. 9, § 34, whereby it was not only authorized, but required, to prescribe a general rule pursuant to which all transfers from one position to a similar position in the same class and grade should be made, there was no law in the charter or elsewhere authorizing such a transfer, and the act of the commission in attempting to transfer a deputy county clerk to the office of registrar of voters did not vest him with any title to the office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 44, 45.]

2. ELECTIONS 🔑51—OFFICERS—REGISTRAR OF VOTERS.

The registrar of voters is an appointive county officer, and, the office not being in the unclassified service named in Charter of Los Angeles County, art. 9, § 33, appointment to it must, as required by express provision of section 11, subd. 1, be made by the board of supervisors from the eligible civil service list, consisting of three persons certified by the commission as standing highest in accordance with the general rule prescribed by the commission for the creation of such eligible list.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 44, 45.]

3. Elections 🔑51—Officers—Transfer by Civil Service Commission.

The office of registrar of voters of the county of Los Angeles being an independent office, as distinct and separate from that of county clerk as that of auditor or recorder, and being specified by the charter as an office to be filled by appointment to be made by the board of supervisors from the eligible list, it could not, under the pretense that it was of like grade and class of that of deputy clerk, be filled by act of the civil service commission under guise of transferring such clerk to such independent office.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Proceedings in the nature of quo warranto by the People of the State of California, on the relation of David B. Lyons, against Thomas McAleer. From a judgment for respondent, relator appeals. Reversed, and trial court directed to enter judgment on the findings in favor of relator.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John Beardsley and A. B. Shaw, Jr., both of Los Angeles (David Evans, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. W. J. Ford, Percy V. Hammon, and Oscar Lawler, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The subject of this proceeding, in the nature of quo warranto brought in the superior court of Los Angeles county at the relation of David B. Lyons, is the title to the office registrar of voters of Los Angeles county. Upon the trial in the court below judgment was entered declaring the respondent, Thomas McAleer, entitled to the office, and that the relator, David B. Lyons, had no right thereto, from which judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The facts out of which the proceeding arose are as follows: Pursuant to the provisions of section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution, the electors of the county of Los Angeles duly adopted a charter for the government of said county, which upon being approved by the Legislature and as provided therein, took effect on June 2, 1913. Among other offices created by the charter and which the board of supervisors was authorized to fill by appointment was that of "registrar of voters." While the charter, save as to services to be rendered in connection with petitions for the recall of officials as provided in article 11 thereof, is silent as to the duties of the official holding such position, we may assume that they are identical with those which were imposed upon the county clerk by general laws, and for the performance of which such clerk was allowed a deputy in charge of the registration department at a salary of $150 per month (section 4230, Pol. Code), which position, as such deputy in charge of said department, McAleer as the duly appointed, qualified, and acting deputy, had held from the date of his appointment on June 2, 1911. By subdivision 1 of section 11 of the county charter the board of supervisors is authorized to appoint the registrar of voters, the appointment of whom (since the incumbent does not fall with the unclassified service hereinafter referred to) must, as provided by said section, be made from the eligible civil service list submitted to said board by the civil service board created by secton 30 of article IX of the charter, which subdivision 1 of section 11 also provides that the board of supervisors shall by ordinance fix his compensation. Section 33 of the charter divides the civil service of the county into the unclassified and classified service, and provides that the classified service shall include all positions now existing or hereafter created, excepting certain positions mentioned as belonging to the unclassified service, which, however, does not include the registrar of voters; that being included in the classified service. Section 34 of said article IX provides that the civil service commission, consisting of three members to be appointed by the board of supervisors (section 30), "shall prescribe, amend and enforce rules for the classified service, which shall have the force and effect of law," which rules, among other things designated in 16 subheads, shall provide:

> "1. For the classification of all positions in the classified service. 2. For open, competitive examinations to test the relative fitness of applicants for such positions. 3. For public advertisement of all examinations. 4. For the creation of eligible lists upon which shall be entered the names of successful candidates in the order of their standing in examination. * * * 6. For the appointment of one of the three persons standing highest on the appropriate lists. * * * 10. For transfer from one position to a similar position in the same class and grade. * * * 11. For promotion based on competitive examination and records of efficiency, character, conduct and seniority. * * * An advancement in rank or an increase in salary beyond the limit fixed for the grade by the rules shall constitute promotion. Whenever practicable vacancies shall be filled by promotion. * * * 16. For the adoption and amendment of rules only after public notice and hearing" —followed by the provision that:

> "The commission shall adopt such other rules, not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this section, as may be necessary and proper for the enforcement of this article."

Section 37 provides that:

> "All persons in the county or township service holding positions in the classified service as established by this article, at the time it takes effect, whether holding by election or by appointment, and who shall have been in such service for the six months next preceding shall hold their positions until discharged, reduced, promoted or transferred in accordance with the provisions of this article."

Section 38 provides that:

> "The auditor shall not approve any salary or compensation for services to any person holding or performing the duties of a position in the classified service, unless the pay roll or account for such salary or compensation shall bear the certificate of the commission that the persons named therein have been appointed or employed and are performing service in accordance with the provisions of this article and of the rules established thereunder."

It is further provided by section 50, which relates to the recall of officials and specifies certain duties in connection therewith to be performed by the registrar of voters, that:

> "Until such time as the board of supervisors shall appoint a registrar of voters under the provisions of this charter, the powers and duties by this section conferred upon the registrar of voters shall be exercised and performed by the county clerk."

On June 2, 1913, the day the charter became operative, the board of supervisors by ordinance fixed the salary of the registrar of voters at $150 per month.

No rules whatever were adopted by the commission until January 1, 1914. On October 15, 1913, the county clerk of Los Angeles county addressed a communication to the civil service commission, recommending that Mr. McAleer be transferred to the position of registrar of voters, which communication, on October 16, 1913, was transmitted to the board of supervisors, together with a letter from the civil service commission stating that:

> "This commission holds that under the civil service provisions of the charter it may authorize the transfer of Mr. McAleer upon recommendation of the board of supervisors, and that, in the event the board fails to recommend the transfer, then the position should be filled by open competitive examination."

On October 27th the board of supervisors made an order authorizing the transfer of McAleer from the position as deputy county clerk in charge of registration department to the office of registrar of voters; and on November 4, 1913, the civil service commission, as shown by its minutes, made an order as follows:

> "Upon the joint request of the county board of supervisors and county clerk Lelande, the transfer of Thomas McAleer from service as registration clerk, in the office of the county clerk, to the office of registrar of voters, was authorized."

It thus appears that, in the absence of rules which the commission was by section 34 to prescribe and enforce for the classified service, and without any competitive examination therefor, Thomas McAleer, who was a deputy county clerk in charge of the registration department, was by the civil service commission transferred therefrom to the newly created office of registrar of voters. The recommendation of the county clerk that such transfer be made is entitled to no weight whatsoever; neither did the order of the board of supervisors authorizing the making of the transfer confer any power upon the commission to make the same. We must therefore, in order to sustain the action of the commission, look for some provision of the charter which empowered it to make the transfer. By subdivision 10 of section 34 the commission was not only authorized, but required, to prescribe rules under which it might make transfers from one position to a similar position in the same class and grade. Assuming, but not holding, that the office of registrar of voters created by the charter was in the same class and grade as that of deputy county clerk in charge of the registration department, nevertheless, until adopted, there was no rule having the force and effect of law under which such transfer could be made. The provision of the charter was not self-executing, but contemplated the adoption of a rule having the force and effect of law to make it operative, and the power to enact such legislation was delegated to the civil service commission. In other words, the charter, which may be termed the organic law of the county, conferred upon the civil service commission the power to enact a law for the transfers designated in subdivision 10 of section 34; but until such legislation there was no law authorizing the commission to take any action in such cases. Counsel for respondent insist that the jurisdiction of the commission to make the transfer did not depend upon the adoption of such rule; that in making the transfer it had the same power to act in the absence of the rule as though it had been made. In support of this contention they direct our attention to section 3 of article XII of the charter of San Francisco, which provides:

> "The commissioners shall make rules to carry out the purposes of this article, and for examinations, appointments, promotions and removals, and in accordance with its provisions may from time to time make changes in the existing rules."

In construing this provision (Cook v. Civil Service Commission, 160 Cal. 589, 117 Pac. 663), the Supreme Court said:

> "The section of the charter requiring the adoption of general rules for examinations, etc., by the commissioners, expressed, not a mandatory, but a directory, admonition. There is nothing in the language of the act which makes the adoption of such rules a jurisdictional prerequisite to the holding of examinations by the board. These rules were merely 'to carry out the purposes of this article,' i. e., those relating to civil service. The rules were to be a part of the scheme of testing the fitness of candidates for promotion, but the right to examine candidates was not made to depend upon the adoption of these general rules. * * * The commissioners' failure to pass general rules, and the errors, if any, in establishing the possible percentages in the awarding of credits, were not matters of judicial fibre, and in no wise affected the jurisdiction of the commission."

In that case, which was a proceeding in certiorari, the question involved was the power of the board to hold a competitive examination in the absence of general rules authorized by the section of the San Francisco charter. In the case at bar no competitive examination was held; nor was there any observance of the civil service scheme adopted, which was clearly intended to prevent transfers or appointment to office, other than in accordance with rules which the commission in express terms was required to adopt. Moreover, the provision of the San Francisco charter which the Supreme Court was called upon to construe in the case referred to was almost identical with the provision in the Los Angeles charter which provides that:

> "The commission (in its discretion) shall adopt such other rules, not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this section, as may be deemed necessary and proper for the enforcement of this article."

[1] The commission failed and neglected to obey the mandatory provision of section 34, whereby it was not only authorized, but required, to prescribe a general rule under and pursuant to which all transfers should be made. Until such rule was adopted there was no law in the charter or elsewhere authorizing the purported transfer; hence the act of the civil service commission was without authority, arbitrary, and insufficient to vest in McAleer any right or title to the office. While it is true, as claimed by respondent, that the commission, under subdivision 1 of section 34, was authorized to make a rule providing for the classification of all positions in the classified service, it does not follow that said commission, by making the transfer on November 4, 1913, legally adjudged the position of deputy county clerk in charge of the registration department was in the same class and grade as that of registrar of voters, for the reason that, since the commission had adopted no rule for the classification of positions in the classified service, which includes the office of registrar of voters, there was no law under and pursuant to which the commission could determine said positions to be in the same class and grade. To sustain respondent's position would remove all limitations upon the power of the commission to make transfers, and, in the absence of general rules for guidance, leave it free to act arbitrarily in each particular case, thus nullifying the purpose for which the civil service provision was adopted.

[2] The registrar of voters, as we have seen, is an appointive county officer (section 14), and since it is not in the unclassified service named in section 33, the appointment to the office must, as required by the express provision of subdivision 1 of section 11, be made by the board of supervisors from the eligible civil service list, consisting of three persons certified by the commission as standing highest in accordance with a general rule prescribed by the commission for the creation of such eligible list. Subdivision 4, § 34.

[3] In our opinion, the office of registrar of voters was an independent office, as distinct and separate from that of county clerk as is that of auditor or recorder, and since it is specified as one of the offices to be filled by appointment to be made by the board of supervisors from the eligible list, it could not, under the pretense that it was of a like grade and class with that of deputy county clerk, be filled by act of the commission under the guise of transferring such deputy clerk to such independent and distinct office. To hold otherwise would violate the plain import of the language contained in the charter and be subversive of the purpose which the electors had in adopting the provision.

The claim of relator, Lyons, to the office is based upon the following proceedings: On November 20, 1914, pursuant to an order of the civil service commission, an examination was held in accordance with rules theretofore adopted for the purpose of filling the office of registrar of voters. As a result of this examination Lyons was rated highest, and, with others, placed on the list of those eligible for appointment to said office. On January 6, 1915, the commission certified to the board of supervisors the names of Lyons and two other persons standing highest, as shown by said examination, any one of whom was eligible for appointment to the office, and on August 10, 1915, the board of supervisors duly appointed Lyons as registrar of voters. Upon receiving a certificate of his appointment to the office, he duly qualified as such official and demanded from McAleer, the incumbent, possession of the office, books, and equipment, with which demand McAleer refused to comply. The action of the commission in holding the examination, certifying to the board of supervisors the list of eligibles for appointment, and the action of said board of supervisors in appointing Lyons seems to have been had and taken in strict accordance with the provisions of the charter, from which we conclude that McAleer had no right or title to the office, and that David B. Lyons was entitled to the same. And since the facts upon which our conclusion is reached appear from the findings, the judgment in favor of McAleer is not only reversed, but upon the going down of the remittitur the trial court is directed to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of David B. Lyons.

CHENOWETH v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1644.)

1. STATUTES 🔑188—CONSTRUCTION—GENERAL RULES.

Where the words of a statute are not ambiguous and their effect is not absurd, the court will not give it other than its plain meaning, although it may appear probable that a different object was in the mind of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 266, 267, 276.]

2. OFFICERS 🔑30—INCUMBENCY OF TWO OFFICES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—"TERM."

Const. art. 4, § 19, providing that no legislator shall during the term for which he shall have been elected hold or accept any office, trust, or employment under the state, became effective December 21, 1916. Petitioner was elected as representative for the term beginning January, 1915, and ending January 8, 1917, but resigned on December 19th to accept another office. Held, that the word "term" referred to the period for which the petitioner was elected, and not merely to his incumbency, so that petitioner did not evade such provision by resignation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 37–43.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Term.]

3. OFFICERS 🔑19—INCUMBENCY OF TWO OFFICES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—"SHALL."

Such provision, though it employs the words "who shall be elected," does not have a wholly prospective effect as to the time of election of the assemblymen, since the word "shall" neither legally nor grammatically denotes mere futurity, but conveys the idea of obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 22, 23.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Shall.]

4. OFFICERS 🔑19—INCUMBENCY OF TWO OFFICES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Nor does the expression "during the term for which he shall have been elected" imperatively demand construction so as to apply only to assemblymen elected after passage of the amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 22, 23.]

Mandamus by Walter W. Chenoweth against John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State. Writ denied.

Garret W. McEnerney and A. F. Burke, both of San Francisco, and Downey, Pullen & Downey, of Sacramento, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Petitioner seeks the writ of mandate to compel respondent to issue his warrant for the payment of a portion of petitioner's salary. Petitioner was elected a member of the assembly for the Fourteenth assembly district at the general election of November 3, 1914. His term of office began on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1915, and ended, by operation of law, on January 8, 1917. He duly qualified as such assemblyman and performed his duties as a member of the assembly at the Forty-First regular session thereof, and also at the special session held in January, 1916. He resigned his office as assemblyman on December 19, 1916, and his resignation was duly accepted by the Governor. He had previously, but since his election as assemblyman, been appointed auditor of the state board of prison directors, and served in that capacity during the entire month of December at the Folsom state prison. He was paid for his services prior to December 19, 1916, but was denied a warrant for the balance of that month's services.

The action of the controller is based upon amended section 19, art. 4, of the Constitution, which took effect December 21, 1916, and reads as follows:

> "No senator or member of the assembly shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, hold or accept any office, trust, or employment under this state; provided, that this provision shall not apply to any office filled by election by the people."

"It is the contention of the petitioner," reads his brief, "that the amendment is inapplicable to him for two reasons: (1) The amendment is prospective only in its operation, and therefore does not affect senators or members of the assembly who, like the petitioner, were elected before the amendment took effect; and (2) the petitioner had ceased to be a 'member of the assembly' before the amendment took effect, and therefore at no time during the operation of the amendment was within the subject matter of the amendment or affected by it."

Section 19 of article 4 formerly provided that:

> "No senator or [assemblyman] shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office of profit under this state which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which have been increased, during such term, except such offices as may be filled by election by the people."

The amended section is much more sweeping than its progenitor, for it applies to all offices, other than elective offices, and forbids the holding or accepting by a senator or assemblyman of any office, trust, or employment under this state "during the term for which he shall have been elected." The purpose of the amendment, as stated by one of its proponents in the official argument addressed to the electors, was to bring the Constitution into harmony with the American theory of government that "those who execute the laws should not be the same individuals as those who make the laws," and for the further reason "that a legislator who is holding a position on the state pay roll is too apt to allow the wishes of the one responsible for his appointment to decide the manner in which his vote shall be cast. A man in such a position is, to say the least, not in that independent frame of mind which should be possessed by the ideal legislator."

The question here is: Was it intended to apply to petitioner whose term of office began before the adoption of the amendment and had not expired at the time it went into effect? And, if so intended, could he evade its operation by resigning before the amendment took effect?

[1] We may safely accept as rules of construction what was said in Smith v. Union Oil Co., 166 Cal. 217, 135 Pac. 966, cited by petitioner:

> "Where the words of a statute are not ambiguous and their effect is not absurd, the court cannot give it other than its plain meaning, although it may appear probable that a different object was in the mind of the Legislature."

No question arises here as to what the people desired to accomplish by adopting this amendment. Its object is plain enough and is manifest on its face.

[2] The word "term," used in the section, refers, we think, to the period for which the petitioner was elected, and not merely to his incumbency. Rice v. National City, 132 Cal. 354, 64 Pac. 580. When we speak of the "term" for which an officer has been elected, we mean the period of time fixed by statute during which he may serve, and not to the time he may happen to serve. Said the court, in Ellis v. Lennon, 86 Mich. 468, 49 N. W. 308:

> "The term for which respondent was elected is clearly defined by the charter, and the language 'the term for which he was elected' has a clear and well-defined meaning. He was elected to serve for two years, whether he served that time or not. The language used in the statute fixes the period of his ineligibility, and excludes a construction which would have attached in the absence of that language."

In the instant case the statute fixed the term of petitioner's office as assemblyman.

We need not consider the effect of petitioner's resignation prior to the going into effect of the amendment. If the section applies to a senator or assemblyman whose term of office had not expired on December 21, 1916, we do not think that petitioner succeeded in evading its force by his resignation prior to December 21st; for the section deals with a fixed period of time, to wit, the "term" of the officer, and not to the period of his incumbency.

The House of Representatives of the state of Maine submitted certain questions to the Supreme Court of that state, but the interrogatories did not reach the court until after the Legislature had adjourned. For this and other reasons a majority of the court declined to respond to the request. Three of the judges dissented from this refusal, and, in answer to one of the interrogatories, said:

> "The Constitution in terms (article 4, pt. 3, § 10) prohibits the appointment of a senator or representative, during the term for which he shall have been elected, to any civil office of profit under this state, which shall have been created or the emoluments of which increased during such term; i. e., the term for which he was elected. As to such officers the appointment itself is prohibited, and the prohibition continues, not only while the member retains his seat in the Legislature, but continues until the expiration of the term for which he was elected. He cannot, therefore, be appointed to such office during that term, even though he has resigned his seat in the Legislature." Advisory opinion to Governor, 49 Fla. 269, 39 South. 63; Ellis v. Lennon, 86 Mich. 468, 49 N. W. 308; People ex rel. Sherwood v. State Board of Commissioners, 129 N. Y. 360, 29 N. E. 355.

[3] Respondent concedes that the amendment was not intended to nor does it operate retroactively. His contention is that it should be given prospective effect from and after December 21, 1916. There is no disagreement among counsel as to the fact that the amendment went into effect on that date. Petitioner's contention is that it was intended to apply only to senators and assemblymen thereafter to be elected, and that this is made manifest by the language employed; that the amendment speaks only in terms of futurity; that it disqualifies only those "who shall be elected, and further provides that the disqualification shall operate only during the term for which they shall have been elected"; thus "expressly and in two ways indicates the intention of the framers that it should have a prospective operation only." This interpretation means that senators chosen when petitioner was elected are not disqualified for two years from and after the first Monday in the year 1917. If the amendment had been proposed by the Legislature, a possible inference might arise that the members did not intend to disqualify themselves. The amendment, however, was proposed by the people at large, through the initiative, and we may safely assume what was common knowledge that it was intended to reach a practice in state administration of many years' standing and which the people believed should be presently eradicated. The amendment had its origin in a spirit for reform that permeated the state and was intended to cure what the people believed to be a present existing evil, and not merely one likely to arise in the future. Did they so express their intent as to make it imperative on the court, under accepted rules of construction, to hold, as is now contended, that "grammatically (and hence legally) the amendment is limited in its operation to such senators and assemblymen as shall be elected after it takes effect"?

The stress of the argument requiring us so to hold rests upon the presumption that the grammatical construction of the language "during the term for which he shall have been elected" compels the conclusion that "the prohibition is expressed in terms of simple futurity, and the class of officers to be affected is grammatically limited to such as should be elected after the amendment becomes operative." It is urged that "the verbs are all in the future tense"; that the word "shall" the simple future; that the class of senators and assemblymen to which the act shall apply "is expressed in the future perfect tense as senators or assemblymen who shall have been elected"; that in employing the future perfect tense the amendment limits its application to senators and assemblymen who shall be elected after the amendment takes effect.

We are quite satisfied that the word "shall" where first used lends no force to petitioner's contention. Neither legally nor grammatically does it denote mere futurity. It is used here as a word of command, in accordance with the Constitution, that its provisions "are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise." Const. art. 1. In Fernald's Working Grammar of the English Language, p. 141, the distinction between "shall" and "will" is pointed out, and the author says the difference between these two auxiliaries "in the expression of future action or state is one requiring careful study." The author states that primarily "shall" denotes obligation. "In the first person it simply denotes future fact. In the second and third person the idea of obligation remains, and is felt to be imposed by the person speaking; hence, you 'shall' or 'they shall' means, I will compel you or them to act. * * * Consequently you (he or they) shall, expresses command or necessity, never simple future action." In the amendment the word "shall" must be read in connection with its context. "No senator or member of assembly shall," etc., which is a command that senators and assemblymen shall not hold or accept any office. There is here no suggestion of futurity. The language is imperative and is directed to every member of the Legislature in the present tense. We do not think that the word "shall" where first used in the provision conveys the idea of futurity at all. On the contrary, it carries with it an implication which should aid us in giving the proper construction to what follows.

[4] The expression "during the term for which he shall have been elected" presents a question of more difficulty. In a strictly grammatical sense the phrase, standing alone, conveys the idea of futurity. Reading the section in its entirety, it does not appear to us imperatively to demand a construction contrary to what we have the right to assume the electors, in voting on the amendment, understood to be its purpose and the class of officers to whom it was intended to apply. The phrase or its equivalent is frequently found in statutes and Constitutions, and the cases show that it is applied to past as well as to future acts or conditions. As was said, in Norris v. Sullivan, 47 Conn. 474:

> "The words 'shall have levied' are susceptible of both past and future application; they furnish a convenient form for legislative use when it is desired to give all-inclusive force to a single expression. Therefore, as they may mean future, or past and future, it becomes a question of legislative intent in each statute."

Respondent points out that such expressions are so frequently found in statutes that the Code of Wisconsin (section 4972) established the following among other rules of construction:

> "1. The words 'shall have been' include past and future cases."

In a Missouri statute with respect to the time of commencing an action, there was a proviso:

> "That if any action shall have been commenced within the time prescribed in this section, and the plaintiff therein suffer a nonsuit, * * * such plaintiff may commence a new action," etc. Rev. St. 1899, § 2868, amended by Laws 1905, p. 138.

This statute was before the court in Clark et al. v. Kansas City, etc., R. R., 219 Mo. 524, 118 S. W. 40, and it was there contended that the grammatical construction of the statute made it inapplicable to actions commenced before its passage. We venture to quote at some length from the opinion, which seems to us not only sound law, but good, ordinary common sense:

> "Courts have no right, by construction, to substitute their ideas of legislative intent for that unmistakably held by the Legislature and unmistakably expressed in legislative words. 'Expressum facit cessare tacitum.' We must not interpret where there is no need of it. * * *
> "Therefore, if the law says that it is to operate only upon cases to be brought thereafter, if it in terms excludes pending cases, then we have nothing to do but to enforce it. Attending to that view, we do not read the statute as contended by counsel for the respondent. Its use of the future form of the verb 'commence,' as developed in the phrase 'shall have been commenced,' in correct usage in the discourse of good writers and speakers, includes the past as well as the future. That phraseology in a statute has been held by the Supreme Court of Connecticut to be 'susceptible of both past and future application; they [the words] furnish a convenient form for legislative use when it is desired to give all-inclusive force to a single expression. Therefore, as they may mean future, or past and future, it becomes a question of legislative intent in each statute.' * * *
> "Our own statute on construction (R. S. 1899, § 4160) requires that 'words and phrases shall be taken in their plain or ordinary and usual sense.' With that rule in mind, let us illustrate: If a rule were bulletined on a given Tuesday by the headmaster in charge of teaching grammar in a school, as follows: 'No pupil shall be whipped twice for a mistake which shall have been made in parsing'—would any boy in the school take the rule to apply only to future mistakes in parsing? Could he not well plead the rule (with high hope of its allowance) if his mistake and one flogging occurred on the Monday prior and another flogging was threatened on the Wednesday subsequent to the rule for the same mistake? Or if C, a plantation owner, is building barns and writes his overseer: 'Paint all barns red that shall have been commenced'—would B, his overseer, take that command to mean that only barns commenced after the order should be painted red? Nay, if a very stickler for grammatical precision—a John Horne Tooke, a Lindley Murray, or a Dr. Marsh—should make a New Year's rule for his self-guidance, viz.: 'If my reading of any book shall have been commenced, I will finish it'—would he construe his own rule not to include Anatomy of Melancholy, or the Decline and Fall, put in reading on the prior Christmas?
> "We may presume all legislators grammarians, but that presumption would not drive us to the conclusion that they meant only future action when they wrote 'shall have been commenced.'"

Section 19, art. 5, of the Constitution was amended in 1908 and relates to the compensation of state officers. It reads:

> "The Governor * * * and surveyor general shall, at stated times during their continuance in office, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which they shall have been elected, which compensation is hereby fixed for the following officers, as follows: * * * Such compensation to be in full for all services by them respectively rendered in any official capacity or employment whatsoever during their respective terms of office: Provided, however, that the Legislature may, by law, diminish the compensation of any or all of such officers, but in no case shall have the power to increase the same above the sums hereby fixed by this Constitution."

The salaries of the officers named were materially increased by the amendment. It went into effect November 3, 1908. Kingsbury, the then surveyor general, demanded of the controller a warrant for the unpaid balance due him for the month of November, 1908, calculated at the rate fixed for his salary as surveyor general by the amendment. His demand was denied, and he brought mandate in this court, reported in the case entitled Kingsbury v. Nye, 9 Cal. App. 574, 99 Pac. 985. Both parties seek support in this case. The point now under discussion was distinctly raised, and it was contended by respondent:

> "The amendment must be deemed to have a prospective operation and to apply to the offices enumerated, upon the expiration of the terms of the present incumbents, and not before."

In reply we said:

> "The point made that the rule requiring that the amendment be given a prospective effect necessarily postpones its operation until after the present terms expire, and that any other view would be to give a retroactive effect to the amendment, we think, cannot be sustained. The amendment, as we apply it, is in no sense given a retroactive operation; it is simply given force from and after its ratification, and it operates prospectively thenceforward. If, as we have held, the amendment took effect upon its ratification, and operated, as respondent admits, prospectively, we know of no authority for holding that its operation must be postponed until the terms of the incumbents have expired."

The rules of grammar were not invoked in that case. The decision favorable to petitioner turned largely on the view we took that the inhibition to the increasing of salaries was addressed to the Legislature. Said the court:

> "The amendment under review having gone into operation from the date of its adoption, it must be given effect thenceforward, unless we can say that some restriction has been put upon its operation, either by the terms of the amendment or by implication derived from the terms so used. We can find nothing in any of the terms, and nothing is claimed to be found therein, except the provision as to the increase or diminution of the compensation, which we hold was addressed to the Legislature alone. Had such intention dwelt in the minds of the proponents of the amendment, it would have been easy and simple to restrict its effect and withhold its benefits from present incumbents."

The case is not directly in point, but it must be admitted that the value of the decision would be greatly impaired if the strict rule of grammar now urged should be held to prevail instead of the more reasonable rule of construction adopted by the courts.

Petitioner cites many cases in support of his contention where the word "shall" is used or verbs are expressed in the future perfect tense. For example:

A statute conferred certain rights upon a person who had paid an assessment in the event that such assessment "shall be set aside, altered or reduced," and it was held:

> "That such assessments only should be embraced as should be vacated, altered, or reduced after the act took effect." City of Elizabeth v. Hill, 39 N. J. Law, 555.

A statute provided that:

> "Whenever a married man shall be deserted by his wife, or a married woman shall be deserted by her husband, for the space of one year, * * * he or she may bring an action," etc. Laws 1874, c. 66, § 1.

An action was brought July 21, 1874, alleging desertion July 17, 1873. The court held that the language of the statute evidenced an intention that it should have a prospective operation only. Giles v. Giles, 22 Minn. 348.

A statute read:

> "All and singular the goods and chattels, lands, tenements and real estate of every person against whom any judgment shall be obtained in any court of record either at law or in equity," etc. Laws 1891, p. 246.

The court held the statute to apply only to judgments entered subsequently to the passage of the act. Jones v. Stockgrowers' Nat. Bank, 17 Colo. App. 79, 67 Pac. 177.

Section 5, art. 6, of the California Constitution of 1879 provided that:

> "All actions for the recovery of the possession of * * * real estate shall be commenced in the county," etc.

It was held in Gurnee v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 88, that:

> "Neither in its language nor in its spirit does it apply to actions already commenced."

These cases are cited as examples of the simple future tense. Aside from the element of futurity said to influence the decisions, it seems to us that the character of the statutes and the purposes contemplated by them would have required that they be given a prospective operation unless a contrary intention was made clearly to appear. Take, for example, the Minnesota case, giving an action where the husband or wife, as the case may be, "shall be deserted for the space of one year." Obviously it would violate the rules of construction to give such a statute a retroactive operation. So also it may be said of a Michigan statute (cited as an example of the future perfect tense) giving the court power to grant a divorce when the defendant "shall have become an habitual drunkard." Comp. Laws 1857, § 3227. The court, in reversing the judgment granting the wife a divorce, said:

> "To bring the case within the fair intention of this statute, we think the defendant must have become an habitual drunkard after the marriage."

The evidence was that the habits of the husband with respect to drink were substantially the same prior to his marriage, and that the complainant was well aware of this when she married him. Porritt v. Porritt, 16 Mich. 140. Another example given as showing the weight accorded to grammatical construction is the case of State v. Boyd, 21 Wis. 210. The section of the Constitution of Wisconsin is quite similar to section 19, art. 4, of our Constitution before its amendment in 1916. The relator was elected to an office existing previously to his being chosen a member of the Legislature. The emoluments of the office had not been increased when he was elected to it, but were increased by a subsequent enactment while he was a member of the Legislature, but subsequent to his election to the office of county judge. The Constitution provided:

> "No member of the Legislature shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed or elected to any civil office in the state which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased, during the term for which he was elected." Const. art. 4, § 12.

The court said:

> That, according to the most natural grammatical construction of the provision, it "only forbids a member of the Legislature, while such member, from being appointed or elected to any civil office which shall have been previously created, or the emoluments of which shall have been previously increased, during the term for which he was elected."

It was said arguendo:

> "The future perfect tense is used—an office 'which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased,' etc. —indicating a future action done and completed before the appointment or election, the other future action to which it refers."

The writer of the opinion stated:

> That this construction is not the one he was at first disposed to place upon the provision; that it seemed to him "that the purity and fidelity of the representative, as well as of the public interest, would be most effectuallly secured by excluding those persons from office who had been concerned in creating it or rendering it more lucrative. But the author of the Constitution did deem it expedient to adopt such a rule of disqualification, and a much more restricted one has found its place in that instrument."

We are not quite sure but that the learned justice's first impressions would have led to a safer solution than was finally reached. However, the question there was as to Boyd's right to an office which he held when elected a member of the Legislature, and rules of construction, perhaps, would not have justified ousting him from that office under a provision which plainly provided that the office to which he was forbidden to be elected or appointed was an office created during the term he was serving in the Legislature, and not an office to which he was previously elected. The court said that the case was "not within the language of the provision, according to its most natural grammatical construction." But suppose Boyd had been elected to and was holding a civil office after (i. e., during the term for which) he had been elected a member of the Legislature; a different case would have arisen. And it is just such a different case as is presented by the amendment we are considering—no member of the assembly shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, hold or accept any office. Under the old section the disqualification came about by his participating in the creation of the office or the increase of its emoluments. Under the new section he is forbidden to hold or accept any office during the term for which he shall have been elected. His participation in creating the office is no longer the evil to guard against. The evil intended to be combated by the amendment was the holding or accepting by members of the Legislature any office under this state during the term of office as such members. No possible reason can be suggested why the amendment did not operate upon every member of the Legislature at the moment it took effect. Nor can any good reason be given why its operation should be limited to members only who shall have been elected after December 21, 1916, since without question the mischief which it was designed to remedy was present and quite as menacing as it would be two or four years thereafter, and since the class upon whom it was to operate was the same on that date as it would be at some future date. That it was so intended when submitted to the people there can be no doubt, and we do not think the language used to express that intention compels us, under settled canons of construction, to nullify that intention, or would justify its nullification.

Respondent cites several cases illustrative of the fact that expressions in statutes in the future perfect tense are not necessarily required to be given a strictly grammatical interpretation. One of these examples is found in Lane v. Lane (Q. B.), reported in volume 65 N. S. Law Journal Reports (1896) p. 63. The statute involved was section 4 of the Married Woman Act, 1895, reading as follows:

> "Any married woman whose husband shall have been convicted summarily of an aggravated assault upon her within the meaning of section 43 of the Offenses against the Person Act, 1861, or whose husband shall have been convicted upon indictment of an assault upon her, and sentenced to pay a fine of more than £5, or to a term of imprisonment exceeding two months, or whose husband shall have deserted her, or whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her, or willfully neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance for her or her infant children whom he is legally liable to maintain, and shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, may apply to any court of summanry jurisdiction * * * for an order or orders under this act."

The act took effect January 1, 1896. The wife applied to the justices of Glamorganshire for an order under said section, alleging the persistent cruelty of her husband. All the acts complained of were committed previous to January 1, 1896. The justices held that the section was not retrospective in its effect and they had no jurisdiction. The wife appealed. Reversing and remanding the case there were separate opinions of the judges. The president, Sir F. H. Jeune, said:

> "But upon the language of the section and the reason of the thing the matter seems to be extremely clear. The words 'shall have been' are hardly ambiguous; in my view, they deal with all offenses, past and future (considered with regard to the date of the act), and not only to future offenses."

Justice Barnes said:

> "Looking at the wording of the section and at the whole act, the question seems free from any doubt, and in my judgment the language used in section 4 is not at all ambiguous. It seems > quite clear to me that the expression 'any married woman whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her may apply,' etc., deals with all cases of persistent cruelty which have happened prior to the decision of the court."

They not only looked to the language employed, but also "to the reason of the thing."

The case of Queen v. The Inhabitants of Christ-Church, reported in Law Journal 1849, Michaelmas Term, 12 Victoria, p. 28, is cited. There the court was considering a statute providing, among other things, that a pauper who "shall have resided" within the parish for a period of five years fixed by the statute shall thereafter be irremovable. The controversy arose in an attempt of St. John's parish to deport one Mary Sweeny and her four children to the parish of Christ-Church. The order of removal was sustained, Lord Denman delivering the opinion. We cannot give his reasoning in full. Referring to the statute, he said:

> "The word 'shall' denotes rather the happening of the event, on which the exception is to apply, within the time assumed to have been before computed, than the future relation of such event to the time when the statute passed. It denotes the subjunctive mood rather than the future time."

He stated:

> That the claim that there is a presumption against a retrospective statute being intended "is founded on a misconception. The statute is prospective only. Its direct operation is only on removals; after it has passed it does not alter existing rights in respect of completed removals. A space of time is an essential ingredient in the case to which it applies, and this space of time may consist in part of time passed before the statute passed, as is the case with statutes in limitation and prescription, but they are not therefore classed with the retrospective statutes."

A Minnesota statute which provided:

> "That every dwelling house or other building, for the construction, erection or repairs of which any person shall have a claim for materials furnished or services rendered, shall, with the land," etc., "be subject." Pub. St. 1849–1858, c. 86, § 14.

In Mason & Craig v. Heyward, 5 Minn. 74 (Gil. 55), the court said:

> "The words 'shall have a claim' mean and refer to the time of the passage of the act, and subsequently, and comprehend claims of such nature existing when the act was passed."

Further reference to cases seems unnecessary. The future form of verbs is so frequently used by writers of statutes and Constitutions and literary productions to include the past as well as the future that we must regard it as correct usage.

We do not think that the amendment is couched in such language as to make it impossible or unreasonable for us to hold, without violating settled rules of construction, that it was intended to apply to a member of the Legislature whose term began before December 21, 1916, and did not terminate until after that date.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Benjamin West against Jesse A. Linney & Co. and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robt. T. Linney and Ralph W. Schoonover, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action it was alleged by the plaintiff that he was employed by the defendants as a house painter upon a certain house in the city of Los Angeles; that, while working in the course of that employment upon a scaffold supplied and erected by defendants and suspended by ropes and hooks from the building, the scaffold suddenly and without warning and through the negligence of the defendants fell and precipitated plaintiff to the ground below, whereby he received the described injuries. It was pleaded that the negligence of the defendants consisted in failure to provide plaintiff a secure and sufficient scaffold upon which to work and proper and sufficient supports for said scaffold. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

It is conceded that the ropes, hooks, jacks, and platform constituting the scaffold were supplied by the defendants to the plaintiff and two other workmen who were co-operating with him as fellow workmen in painting the house. It was also shown without conflict in the evidence that the scaffold fell suddenly and without warning and thereby the plaintiff received his injuries. The scaffold was erected by workmen of the defendants who put the materials in place and swung the platform into the position where it was when it fell. It was clearly shown by the evidence and is not disputed that the scaffold was of a kind commonly used and well approved in the painting business, and that the particular materials were superior of their kind and in first-class condition. The method of erecting the scaffold was as follows: The ropes were hung from hooks which were fastened to roof jacks which rested upon the shingles of the roof. The upper end of each jack was thrust under an upper course of shingles, and the jacks were prevented from slipping by certain rows of screws the points of which were arranged so as to catch upon the shingles of the roof. Two shingles at the lower side of the roof and upon which one of the jacks rested slipped out of place and fell to the ground. At the same instant the jack and hook slipped off, thereby causing the rope and platform to fall.

[1] In his testimony the plaintiff described the staging and the materials by which it was upheld, and stated that when the staging was put up he tested the falls by swinging upon each of the ropes attached to two of the hooks "before we put the scaffolding on." Lee Wilson, a witness for the defendants, was one of the men working with the plaintiff. Wilson testified that, with the assistance of one Doremus, he placed the hooks on the roof and tested them; that he waited at each hook until it was tested, and this one looked perfectly safe; that in this particular case he had no doubt of its safety, but because of the appearance of the shingles he made an extra test; that he made an examination of the shingles to see if they were nailed or loose, and they were not loose at the time he put down the jack. The plaintiff did not take part in placing the hooks on the roof or share in putting up the apparatus, except that he tested the falls as above stated. As to the safety of the shingles and of the placing of the hooks thereon, he relied upon the defendants and upon his fellow workmen; also a member of defendant partnership was present when the scaffold was put up. The roof was old and weather beaten. Immediately after the accident some pieces of shingle of that character, apparently corresponding to the shingle space left vacant on the edge of the roof, were found lying on the ground where the scaffold fell. These were exhibited to the court in connection with the testimony, but are not before us.

It was possible to have secured the scaffold against slipping of the shingles and a consequent fall by fastening a rope to the hooks and tying it to a chimney on top of the roof. This actually had been done while they were painting another side of the house. Under the circumstances shown, we cannot say that there is no evidence tending to prove that the defendants negligently failed to provide plaintiff a safe scaffold upon which to work.

[2, 3] The accident occurred on the 16th day of October, 1912. At that time there was in effect a statute relating to the liability of employers for injuries of this kind. Stats. 1911, p. 796. Section 1 of that act provided that in actions of this class:

> "The fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé."

It was further provided that it shall not be a defense that the injury was caused in whole or in part by the want of ordinary or reasonable care of a fellow servant. Negligence of the defendants having been shown, the burden was upon the defendants to establish their plea of contributory negligence. In order to establish such plea, it must have been made to appear not only that the plaintiff was negligent, but that such negligence was a proximate cause of the accident; and even if these conditions were established, the plaintiff's cause of action could not be entirely defeated if the court or jury found from the evidence that the contributory negligence of the plaintiff "was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison." Applying the evidence in this case to the rules governing contributory negligence under this statute, we cannot say that the court was not justified in its finding that plaintiff's injuries were not proximately caused or contributed to by his own negligence or fault. There is some testimony tending to show that the plaintiff, in some of his movements to and fro upon the scaffold, violated certain rules current among painters which are usually observed for the purpose of avoiding accident. But these acts of the plaintiff had been completed prior to the time of the accident, and were not such as to require the court to find that they were the acts which caused the scaffold to fall.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1151—APPEAL—REVIEW—VERDICT.

Where it does not appear that prejudice resulted to defendant from the refusal of his request for a postponement of the trial, and the evidence amply sustains the verdict, the conviction will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

James Kitley was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter Stingley and J. C. Thomas, both of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Upon an investigation of the record, and after listening to the oral argument of the appellant, we are not satisfied that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's request for a postponement of the trial, and at any rate it does not appear to us that any prejudice resulted to the defendant.

As to the appellant's criticisms of the charge of the court, that charge is in our opinion clear and correct; nor do we find any merit in the point that the testimony of the prosecutrix is inherently improbable and therefore insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. On the contrary, an inspection of the record convinces us that they are amply sustained by the evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

LEWDNESS 🔑10—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for the felony defined by Pen. Code, § 288, which punishes lewd and lascivious conduct with minor children, evidence held to sustain a conviction of an attempt to commit the act charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lewdness, Cent. Dig. § 15.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

William Smith was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Knapp Orton and W. C. Tupper, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with the commission of the felony defined by section 288 of the Penal Code, which punishes lewd and lascivious conduct with minor children; and the point that the appellant makes in his appeal from the judgment and order appealed from is that, because defendant's conviction was of an attempt to commit the act charged, there is no evidence warranting the verdict, for the reason that the information charges that the defendant placed his hands upon certain parts of a minor female child, and there is no direct evidence to that effect. It is argued that he could not be convicted of an attempt, because the prosecution did not show specifically that he had made any move to place his hands upon the parts in question. The appellant also contends that the evidence does not show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Considering the latter point first, we think it sufficient to say that the jury by its verdict has decided it contrary to appellant's contention. As to the first point urged, the evidence introduced at the trial was direct and circumstantial. There is circumstantial evidence of the defendant taking the child into a barn or vacant house, and that the child's clothing was disarranged. There is the admission on the part of the defendant that he did touch the child's clothing, and there is the testimony of the police officer that the defendant stated to him that he allowed his passion to get the best of him and that he played with the child. Upon the whole evidence the jury rendered its verdict of an attempt to commit the act charged; and we are satisfied from a review of the record that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

For that reason the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⚿18(4)—OPTION TO PURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action to remove cloud from title by the Compton Land Company against John A. Vaughan and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Henry S. Woolner appeals. Affirmed.

Albert M. Norton and Henry S. Woolner, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. John G. Munholland, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. In the complaint facts were set out showing that plaintiff, on or about the 14th of December, 1911, executed in favor of defendant John A. Vaughan a certain writing, which is in the complaint called "an option agreement." This agreement related to certain realty. It is alleged that defendant Vaughan failed to comply with the terms and conditions of the agreement and failed to complete the purchase of the real property which was described. It was then alleged that the defendants "claim an estate or interest in said premises adverse to plaintiff by and through said option agreement, which in truth and in fact is void and of no effect." Allegation is made that the option agreement was recorded in the office of the county recorder and remained as a cloud upon plaintiff's title. The prayer was that the option agreement be adjudged void and canceled and satisfied of record, and "that the cloud created thereby be removed," and for general relief. An answer was filed and the case proceeded to trial, with the result as stated.

There was no dispute as to the terms of the writing, which was set out in full, together with certain extension indorsements, as an exhibit in the complaint. The agreement was dated December 14, 1911, and recited that the plaintiff had received from Vaughan the sum of $300 "as part payment for the following described real property." (Here follows a description of the realty affected.) The agreement then contained the following recitations:

> "The entire price to be paid for the above described real property is $28,500 and to be paid as follows: $300 cash as hereinbefore mentioned. $6,200 on or before ninety days after date. The balance of $22,000 to be divided in six equal payments."

The time of the maturity of the notes was then set forth, and further on in the document it was recited as follows:

> "It is distinctly understood that this instrument is an option exclusively, and that the holder of said option has no right to enter on or in any manner assume ownership or possession of any part of said above-described property until above-mentioned $6,200 is paid and said John A. Vaughan has executed above-mentioned notes, and the agreement for sale of real estate as herein called for is duly escrowed. A good and sufficient agreement for sale of real estate, with a resolution of the board of directors, deed to be executed and delivered by the said Compton Land Company, * * * on or before the 14th day of March, 1912. * * * If the said payment of $6,200 is not paid or tendered on or before the said 14th day of March, 1912, then this contract to be void and of no effect, and both parties released from all obligations herein, and in that event the said $300 paid on this date is to be retained by the Compton Land Company as liquidated damages."

The alleged option agreement was duly signed by the plaintiff corporation and by John A. Vaughan, defendant. On March 11, 1912, an indorsement was made on the writing, signed by both parties, which recited that:

⚿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"The within option agreement is hereby amended by mutual consent of both contracting parties, as follows, viz.: First, in lieu of $6,200 cash payment on March 13, 1912, that upon the receipt of $300 cash on or before March 13, 1912, $5,900 being balance of the $6,200 cash payment, together with the interest on said $5,900 and on the $22,000 from March 13/12 at 7% per annum, to be extended to June 13, 1912, on which date $5,900 and all accrued interest to be paid."

Some additional conditions were stated affecting the notes, and the indorsement concluded with the following words:

"All the items and terms mentioned and referred to in the within original option to obtain as therein written."

Again, on June 13, 1912, the following indorsement was made and signed by the parties:

"The foregoing amendment to option is hereby continued to December 1, 1912, by mutual consent of both parties thereto, in consideration of the receipt this day of $1,000 by the Compton Land Company; the cash payment of December 1, 1912, to be $4,900, and all interest accrued on the above-mentioned $1,000 and $4,900, and on $22,000 from March 13, 1912; the six semiannual notes of equal amounts, aggregating $22,000, are to be dated December 1, 1912."

A further indorsement, dated 11-25-12, being one of assignment of the rights of the option holder to the defendant H. S. Woolner, appeared. There was no contention, as shown by the testimony heard, that on December 1, 1912, the person in whose favor the option was issued, or his assignee, had made the payment required, and it was admitted that no money was paid, except that shown by the writing and the indorsements appearing as before mentioned. More than two months after the expiration of the last mentioned date this action was filed. Defendant Woolner first asserted by his answer that certain incumbrances existed against the land which made it impossible for the plaintiff to comply with its agreement; and, secondly, set up a counterclaim contending that there should be returned to him all of the money paid under the agreement. It is sufficient to say that the findings of the trial court which determined that there was no incumbrance which would prevent full compliance being made by the plaintiff with its agreement, are supported by the evidence. As to whether the defendant was entitled to have returned any part of the money paid upon the written agreement depends altogether upon the determination as to whether the contract as drawn constituted of itself or by the indorsements made thereon, an agreement of sale or a mere option to purchase. It will be noted that the proposed vendor sedulously asserted in the agreement that the instrument was an "option exclusively." It further appeared that it was contemplated that only after the $6,200 had been paid was the vendor to execute "a good and sufficient agreement for sale." The contract in its original form, and without the indorsements, purported only to extend to Vaughan an option to have later executed in his favor an agreement of sale which would bind both parties. It is said in the agreement that, in the event the payment of $6,200 was not made on or before the 14th of March, 1912, "then this contract to be void and of no effect and both parties released from their obligations herein."

Quite plainly it appears that if Vaughan, at the time the $6,200 payment became due, had failed to pay and no extension had been granted to him, the vendor would not have had the right to sue Vaughan to recover that payment, or to compel him to purchase the property at the price and according to the terms set forth in the agreement. If the vendor had not this right, then, as there was no mutuality of remedy, the contract is at once given the impression of being an option merely, the benefits of which Vaughan might or might not, at his election, take advantage of. The mere fact that the initial payment was to be applied upon the purchase price does not change the condition of the contract in the respect just considered. Such was also the case in the contract before the court in White v. Bank of Hanford, 148 Cal. 552, 83 Pac. 698. And see, also, Briles v. Paulson, 170 Cal. 196, 149 Pac. 169. Neither can it be gathered from the indorsements made upon the contract, whereby it was extended upon the consideration of the payment, first of $300, and then of $1,000, that there was any intent upon the part of the parties to change the character of their contract relations. It was merely provided that the dates of payment should be changed, and that portion of the contract remained in force which postponed the execution of a formal agreement of sale until the time when the $6,200 payment, or the reduced amount thereof, should fall due. If the money paid was, and we so hold, the consideration upon which the option to purchase only rested, then upon the lapse of the time fixed by the contract and the extension indorsements, the vendor meanwhile holding itself ready to fulfill its obligations, the option holder would have received all the consideration bargained for. He got what he paid for, and there was nothing to be returned to him. It is even held, where there have been considered contracts which admittedly constitute agreements to purchase and sell realty binding upon both parties, that the vendee in default may not recover payments made by him under his contract, although in that case the remedy of the vendor, where he chooses to be the actor in the litigation, is generally that of foreclosure. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The foregoing propositions are the only ones which are properly presented by this appeal, or which require or merit attention of the court. We think that the trial judge was correct in the findings and judgment as made.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⚷159(6)—APPEAL—SURETY—EXCEPTIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, referring to undertakings on appeal from justices' courts and exceptions thereto, declares that the adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties, and, unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party to the amount stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no undertaking had been given. Section 948, referring to exceptions to sureties on appeals from the superior court, in terms requires that notice of exception to sureties be served upon the appellant. Held, that notice of exception to sureties on appeal from justice court must be filed with the justice and served on the appellant, and in case of failure to serve the same on the appellant, such exceptions are unavailing, and, though the sureties do not justify, furnish no ground for dismissing the appeal.

Original petition by the Consolidated Lumber Company, a corporation, for a writ of prohibition against Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others. Alternative writ discharged, and petition for peremptory writ denied.

McClure & Turner, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. H. E. Gleason, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. An alternative writ of prohibition was issued herein under which the respondent superior court was required to show cause why it should not be prohibited from proceeding further in a certain action entitled Consolidated Lumber Company v. F. A. Shorey, where, after judgment in a justice's court, the defendant appealed to the said superior court. Within five days after the defendant Shorey had filed in the justice's court his undertaking on appeal, the plaintiff filed in the justice's court a notice of exception to the sureties who executed the undertaking on appeal, but did not serve upon the defendant or his attorney any notice of such exception. No justification of sureties was had, and upon that ground the plaintiff moved the superior court to dismiss the appeal. The superior court denied the motion, and has set down the case upon its calendar for trial.

Section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure, referring to undertakings on appeal from justices' courts and the exceptions thereto, states that:

> "The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party, to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given."

The same words were formerly contained in section 978. It will be observed that the statute is silent as to the manner in which the exception shall be taken, and if the matter had not been determined by decision, we would be inclined to hold that such exception might be taken in a justice's court orally, and that it would be sufficient to have the fact noted in the justice's docket without service or filing of any notice whatever. The corresponding provision (Code Civ. Proc. § 948), referring to exceptions to sureties on appeals from the superior court, in terms requires that notice of exception to sureties be served upon the appellant. The omission to state any such requirement in section 978a strongly argues that a less formal mode of exception was intended in the case of an appeal from a justice's court. However, this question was before the Supreme Court in Reynolds v. County Court of San Joaquin County, 47 Cal. 604, where the court said:

> "The mere filing of such an exception with the justice of the peace after appeal taken does not seem to be authorized by the statute, and it is of course unreasonable to hold the appellant in default when he had no notice, in law or fact, that further justification of sureties had been required by his adversary."

In Budd v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 256, 111 Pac. 628, this court held that the notice of exception to sureties must be filed with the justice, and that no such exception will be deemed to be complete until such notice is filed. With that ruling and the reasons for it as there stated, we are satisfied; but it is not inconsistent therewith to further hold that the notice must be served upon the appellant. In Budd v. Superior Court it was intimated that such service upon the opposite party of the notice of exception to sureties is not essential, and we repeated that suggestion in McCarty v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 1, 159 Pac. 736. But in these decisions the only question directly at issue was upon the contention that the notice of exception must be filed. Basing our decision upon Reynolds v. County Court, supra, we now hold and determine that the notice must be served as well as filed, but that the exception is not complete until both served and filed.

The alternative writ is discharged, and petition for peremptory writ is denied.

SACRAMENTO COUNTY v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1645.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 1, 1917.)

1. COUNTIES 🔑1—STATES 🔑119—POLITICAL FUNCTIONS — USE OF STATE MONEY FOR COUNTIES.

Counties are not municipal corporations, or, strictly speaking, corporations of any kind, as they are obviously lacking in the essentials which chiefly characterize and distinguish municipal corporations, but are local subdivisions of the state created by the sovereign power of the state without consent or action of the people who inhabit them, although they may be classed as quasi corporations and may be within the inhibitions of Const. art. 4, §§ 22, 31, relating to use of state money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 1; States, Cent. Dig. § 118.]

2. STATES 🔑119—FUNDS—USE — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

St. 1915, p. 1530, providing for a bureau of tuberculosis under the direction of the state board of health and the granting of state aid to cities and counties for the support and cure of persons afflicted with tuberculosis, and giving the state board of health authority over all institutions, public and private, where tuberculosis patients are treated, is not violative of Const. art. 4, § 22, providing that no money shall be appropriated or drawn from the state treasury for the use or benefit of any corporation, association, asylum, hospital or other institution not under the exclusive management or control of the state as a state institution, although Pol. Code, § 4223, gives county supervisors authority to establish and maintain a county hospital, section 4041, subd. 7, gives such board power to purchase and acquire water rights, and section 4307, subd. 7, enumerates county charges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118.]

3. STATES 🔑119—LOAN OF CREDIT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

St. 1915, p. 1530, is not violative of Const. art. 4, § 31, providing that the Legislature shall have no power to lend or authorize the lending of the credit of the state or of any county or other political corporation or subdivision of the state, etc., for the payment of the liabilities of any individual, association, municipal or other corporation, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑60—DELEGATION OF POWER—BOARD OF HEALTH.

St. 1915, p. 1530, is not violative of Const. art. 11, § 13, providing that the Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, or individual any power to appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any county, city, or other municipal government, money, property, or effects.

5. HEALTH 🔑21—POLICE POWER.

St. 1915, p. 1530, is a valid exercise of the sovereign power and police power of the state to take all necessary steps for the promotion of the health and comfort of its inhabitants and to make regulations essential to the protection of the state and the people thereof against the prevalence of disease, as the true purpose of county government organizations is to perform functions which belong to the state itself, and the state may employ them jointly with itself or alone as instrumentalities in aid of the administration or carrying out of its own general governmental functions and policy.

Original application for a writ of mandate by the County of Sacramento against John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California. Writ granted.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for petitioner. Kemper B. Campbell, of Los Angeles, for State Board of Health. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as state controller, to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $2,299.30, in payment of the claim of said petitioner arising under an act of the Legislature of 1915, entitled:

> "An act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a bureau of tuberculosis under the direction of the state board of health; defining its powers and duties; providing for the granting of state aid to cities, counties, cities and counties and groups of counties for the support and care of persons afflicted with tuberculosis; making an appropriation therefor; and repealing certain acts of the Legislature of the state of California." Stats. 1915, p. 1530.

The first section of said act provides:

> "The state board of health shall maintain a bureau of tuberculosis for the complete and proper registration of all tuberculosis persons within the state; for supervision over all hospitals, dispensaries, sanatoria, form colonies and other institutions for tuberculosis, both public and private; for advising officers of the state penal and charitable institutions regarding the proper care of tuberculosis inmates, and for such educational and publicity work as may be necessary; for administration of the fund for state aid to cities, counties, cities and counties and groups of counties for the care of patients who are county charges in city, county, or city and county tuberculosis wards or hospitals or in tuberculosis wards and hospitals maintained by any group of counties, and for the performance of such other duties as may be assigned by the said board."

The second section provides that the state board of health shall appoint a director, who shall be duly qualified and trained in public health work. In addition to the administration of the bureau, under the supervision of the said state board, it is by said section made the duty of the director, "and he is hereby vested with full power," to inspect and investigate, and have access to all records and departments of all institutions, both public and private, where tuberculosis patients are treated. "He shall prepare annually for each institution a report of its rating on sanitary construction, enforcement of sanitary measures, adequate provision for medical and nursing attendance, provision for proper food, and such other matters of administration as may be designated. Administration of the fund for the care of patients who are county charges in city, county, and city and county tuberculosis wards and hospitals and the tuberculosis wards and hospitals maintained by any group of counties shall be based upon his reports and under the rules and regulations of the board."

Section 3 provides that any city, county, etc., establishing a tuberculosis ward or hospital shall receive from the state $3 per week for each person in the active stages of tuberculosis, cared for therein at public expense, who is unable to pay for his support, and who has no relatives legally liable and financially able to pay for his support, and who has been a bona fide resident of such city, county, etc., for one year; provided, that the city, county, etc., shall not become entitled to receive such state aid unless the tuberculosis ward or hospital conforms to the regulations of and is approved by the state bureau of tuberculosis. "The medical superintendent of each hospital receiving state aid under this act shall render semiannually to the state bureau of tuberculosis a report under oath showing, for the period covered by the report, (1) the number of patients in the active stages of tuberculosis cared for therein at public expense, unable to pay for their own support and having no relatives legally liable and financially able to pay therefor, and (2) the number of weeks of treatment of each of such patients."

The refusal of the respondent to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the amount named in the petition is based entirely upon the claim that said statute, in so far as it authorizes the payment of the sums specified therein to cities, counties, etc., for the purposes stated in the act, is in violation of sections 22 and 31, art. 4, and section 13, art. 11, of the Constitution. His position, more specifically stated, is that the maintenance and support and the control of county hospitals constitute duties and burdens which the law casts upon the supervisors and the taxpayers of counties, and that the expense necessary to be incurred in supporting such hospitals is a county charge, citing sections 4223, 4041, subd. 7, and section 4307 of the Political Code. It is hence argued that, since county hospitals are not under the exclusive management and control of the state as state institutions, the proposed payment of money drawn from the treasury to counties, etc., for the purpose mentioned in the said act is in contravention of section 22, art. 4, of the Constitution; (2) That counties are municipal corporations, and that therefore the payment of such moneys to counties would involve a gift of the same, contrary to section 31 of said article; (3) that the act, in violation of section 13, art. 11, of the Constitution, attempts to delegate to the bureau of tuberculosis or the state board of health the power to control and supervise, and thus interfere with the affairs of a county, to the extent to which the bureau or board may require the tuberculosis ward or hospital of such county to conform, in the management thereof, to the regulations established by said bureau, and to make reports thereto, as prescribed by the act.

[1] Referring first to one of the several points made by the petitioner in support of the claim that the act in question impinges upon none of the provisions of the Constitution within the inhibitions of which the respondent insists the act in question falls, it may be remarked: That it is well settled that counties are not municipal corporations or, strictly speaking, corporations of any kind. They are obviously lacking in the essentials which chiefly characterize and distinguish municipal corporations, and it has often been said that they do not come within the latter class of corporations. It is true that both municipal corporations and counties are governmental agencies, but the manner and source of their creation and the purposes, respectively, to subserve which they are brought into existence and activity are entirely at variance. "Municipal corporations proper are called into existence either at the direct solicitation or by the free consent of the persons composing them, for the promotion of their own local and private advantage and convenience. On the other hand, counties are local subdivisions of the state, created by the sovereign power of the state, of its own sovereign will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit them. The former (municipal) is asked for, or at least assented to, by the people it embraces; the latter organization (counties) is superimposed by a sovereign and paramount authority. * * * With scarcely an exception, all the powers and functions of the county organization have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are, in fact, but a branch of the general administration of that policy." 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 35. Counties, however, possess some corporate characteristics. Like all involuntary political or governmental subdivisions of the state, they are classed as quasi corporations. But whatever may be their proper classification, we are not prepared to say that counties are not within the inhibitions of sections 22 and 31 of article 4 of the Constitution against the drawing or appropriation of money from the state treasury for the benefit of a corporation or any institution not under the exclusive control and management of the state and against the making of any gift of such money to any individual, municipal or other corporation of whatsoever kind or character. It is undoubtedly true that the design of the sections of the Constitution invoked against the act in question was to prevent the appropriation of the moneys of the state for any purpose other than that which pertains to the state, and that an appropriation by the Legislature of money from the state treasury for a purpose wholly foreign to any of the essential functions of the state government would clearly and unquestionably amount to a gift within the plain meaning and intent of section 31, art. 4. Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 651, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230; Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. 951, 15 L. R. A. 431, 27 Am. St. Rep. 203.

[2-4] But we do not hesitate to express the opinion that the provision of the act in question, authorizing the payment to counties of the sums to be used for the purpose therein specified, is not in contravention of the sections of the Constitution just adverted to. Nor are we impressed with the argument that said provision of said act is obnoxious to the objection that it offends section 13, art. 11, of the Constitution, in that it involves an attempt by the Legislature to delegate to "a special commission," etc., the power to interfere with or supervise the affairs of counties or to "perform any municipal function whatever."

[5] It has never been, nor will it ever be, questioned that among the first or primary duties devolving upon a state is that of providing suitable means and measures for the proper care and treatment, at the public expense, of the indigent sick, having no relatives legally liable for their care, support, and treatment, those who are infirm and helpless from the ravages of advancing years and without means of their own or relatives upon whom the law places responsibility for their care and support, and the insane, likewise situated as to means necessary for their care, support, and safe-keeping. Cooley on Taxation, p. 204. Nor can it for a moment be doubted that it is the duty of the state to take all necessary steps for the promotion of the health and comfort of its inhabitants and to make such regulations as may be conceived to be essential to the protection of the state and the people thereof, so far as such result may be attained, against the visitations and prevalence of deadly epidemical and endemical diseases, and to take and prosecute such health and sanitary steps and measures as will result in stamping them out, or, by recognized methods of scientific treatment, reducing to the lowest possible minimum the percentage of fatalities following therefrom. These are duties which the state owes to its inhabitants for the protection, promotion, and the preservation of their general happiness and welfare; and, as is true of the duty of the state in the matter of taking proper care of the impecunious or indigent who are afflicted with disease and who have no means for caring for themselves or relatives legally responsible for such care, they are duties which the state may perform in the exercise of its sovereignty, even in the absence of direct constitutional authority therefor—indeed, duties which it may discharge under its inherent power of police.

But we do not understand that it is claimed by the respondent that the duties to which we refer do not rest upon the state, or that the state is without the power to execute them. In fact, as we understand the position of the respondent, it is not claimed by him that the sections of the Constitution invoked against the validity of the legislation involved in this dispute were intended to have the effect of prohibiting the state from performing the duty or exercising the power of which we have been speaking. In such a case, these questions may arise, however: Whether the state has shifted the burden of those duties upon the counties, and, if not, whether, in the exercise of the power whereby it may perform those duties, the state has adopted a mode or method of doing so which is not discountenanced by any of the provisions of the Constitution. In this case, the fundamental proposition upon which the respondent builds up his argument against the constitutional propriety of that provision of the act in question which authorizes the payment of certain sums to the counties for the purpose stated therein is that the state has made it the duty of counties to maintain hospitals for the care, support, and treatment of the indigent sick, and that therefore the burden of supporting such hospitals is upon the counties and not upon the state. The Constitution nowhere places the burden of maintaining, supporting, caring for, and treating the indigent sick upon the counties of the state. The Legislature, however, in the exercise of its duty and power to establish a system of county governments (section 4, art. 11, Const.), has, in fixing and enumerating the powers of boards of supervisors of the counties, authorized said boards to establish and maintain county hospitals, prescribe rules for the government and management thereof, and appoint county physicians and the necessary officers and employés thereof, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the board (Pol. Code, § 4223), to build or rebuild, furnish, or refurnish hospitals and almshouses (Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 7), and has further provided that the necessary expenses incurred in the support of the county hospitals, almshouses, and the indigent sick and otherwise dependent poor, whose support is chargeable to the county, constitute county charges. Pol. Code, § 4307, subd. 7.

As stated, upon the foregoing provisions of the Political Code the argument is erected that, the state having transferred to counties the duty and burden of maintaining hospitals for the care, support, and treatment of the indigent sick, an appropriation of any moneys from the state treasury for the support of such afflicted persons amounts to a gift, and is therefore in violation of the Constitution, and that the statute in question not only runs up against that inhibition of the Constitution, but violates the other sections of the organic law above referred to for the reasons heretofore stated. There is no doubt that the Legislature, by the legislation above referred to, intended to and did transfer from its own shoulders, and so placed upon the counties, the duty and burden of caring for, supporting, and treating the classes of persons mentioned. But this does not mean that the state has thus forever surrendered all control over those matters or the right itself to exercise full and complete and exclusive jurisdiction and control over hospitals for the indigent sick and helpless paupers. As before stated, the Constitution does not require this burden to be borne by the counties. The state may so transfer it to counties, however, in the exercise of its sovereignty. As we have seen, counties are mere agencies of the state, the functions of whose organization are, to the extent of the territorial limits of their geographical divisions, concerned with the administration of the general governmental policy of the state, "and are, in fact, but a branch of the general administration of that policy." All the people of the state, while not directly interested in the administration of the affairs of municipal corporations of which they are not members, are so interested in the administration of the governmental affairs of a county, whether they reside or own property therein or not, because, as stated, such administration involves, to the extent of the geographical limits of a county, the administration of the affairs and policy of the state. The state may, through its Legislature, and in the exercise of its sovereign power and will, in all cases where the people themselves have not restricted or qualified such exercise of that power, apportion and delegate to the counties any of the functions which belong to it. On the other hand, the state may take back and itself resume the exercise of certain functions which it had delegated to those local agencies; and, in some cases, particularly those having reference to the state's police power, we know of no reason, constitutional or otherwise, why the state and the counties may not act conjointly and synchronously in carrying out the policies of the former. Indeed, an analogy to the latter situation may be found in the matter of the regulation by the state of the right to pursue and kill wild birds and animals. By an act of the Legislature of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 663), the authority to issue licenses for such hunting and killing is vested, not only in the state board of fish commissioners, but also in the county clerks of the various counties of the state. The act requires the last-named officials, upon application therefor, to issue such licenses, to receive the fees therefor, to account for the same to the state controller every three months, and pay all sums so received into the state treasury, they (the clerks) to receive as their compensation for the services so performed out of the state "game preservation fund" 10 per cent. of the amounts accounted for. County of Sacramento v. Pfund, 165 Cal. 84, 130 Pac. 1041. This so-called "game law" does not, it is true, make the collection of the licenses therein provided for a function of the county organization. But it is very clear that it does employ a part of that organization's machinery for carrying out its policy with respect to a branch of its own functions, and we doubt not that it could have devolved that duty upon the counties themselves, designating the particular officers thereof to discharge it, and have provided that the compensation for such service should be paid into the treasury of the county from the state fund mentioned in that act, in which case it would not be contended or held, as it has never been contended or held under the provisions of the present game law, that the payment for the service so performed for the state out of moneys in the state treasury would involve a gift of such moneys within the inhibition of section 31, art. 4, of the Constitution or an appropriation or the drawing of money from said treasury in violation of section 22 of said article. The game law, however, as before suggested, stands as a concrete example of the proposition above explained, viz.: That the true purpose of county government organizations is to perform functions which belong to the state itself, and that the latter may employ them, either jointly with itself or alone, as instrumentalities in aid of the administration or the carrying out of its own general governmental functions and policy.

The act in question does not, it seems to us, go any further than the act regulating the right to pursue and kill wild game and animals, above referred to. It does not purport to nor does it involve an appropriation of money for the support or in aid of the support of county hospitals. As a matter of fact, there is no such institution as a county hospital as a separate entity. As has been shown, the Legislature has authorized, or empowered the supervisors of counties to establish and maintain, at the expense of taxpayers of counties, hospitals at which the indigent sick and infirm, otherwise eligible to the public bounty in that particular, may receive proper care, support, and medical treatment. The power to maintain such establishments, like that whereby the counties may build and maintain public roads and highways, or administer public justice, is only a part of the general scheme established by the Legislature, whereby those political subdivisions are required to exercise and perform certain of the functions of the state which the latter, for convenience and economy, has elected to commit to them. As above declared, the state may, if it so elects, assume entire control of the matter of caring for and supporting and administering aid to the classes of persons for whose benefit county hospitals are established and maintained. It has the right and the power to establish and maintain, under its own exclusive control and management, hospitals for such purposes, and so entirely relieve counties of that duty and burden. And, having the right and the power to take upon itself entire responsibility for the support and the treatment of all such persons, it has the undoubted right and power to take exclusive or only partial control and assume corresponding liability for the care, treatment, and support of a portion or a certain class of such persons, or those only who are afflicted with a particular kind of malady. By establishing state hospitals, under its exclusive control and management, where the insane and feeble-minded are maintained and given medical treatment, the state has exercised this very right and power. And it is in effect what it has done in this case.

Tuberculosis is a deadly disease, fatal almost in every instance, unless, in its earliest stages, its progress is arrested and the tubercle bacilli are destroyed. That it is a contagious disease, or one that is by contact transmissible from a victim of the malady to one not so afflicted, is a thoroughly established scientific fact. By health statistics and data gathered and published by the public health department of the state government, it has been shown that over one-seventh of all the deaths in California, prior to the passage and enforcement of the law here under attack, were caused by this dread and justly dreaded disease, and that, down to the time mentioned, the ratio of deaths from tuberculosis was constantly increasing. Incidentally, it may be observed that, according to verified and authentic statistics gathered and prepared by the same official authority, there has been in California a marked and readily noticeable decrease in deaths from said cause since the passage and enforcement of this statute.

There are still in California, however, as we learn from the official reports of the said health department, large numbers of persons suffering from this deadly disease, mostly in the form of attacks upon the pulmonary organs, very many of whom are without financial means to pay for their own support and medical treatment and without relatives legally liable or financially able to give them support and the care and treatment indispensable in such cases. The existence of such conditions is obviously a positive menace to the health of the inhabitants of the state.

But it has been demonstrated that by special scientific treatment, under favorable sanitary and general health conditions, tuberculosis, when not advanced to its final stages, may be cured, but that, unless such conditions are established and uniformly maintained, the difficulty of securing restoration of the patient, however able, persistent, and scientific may be the medical treatment, becomes in most cases insuperable.

Considering and finding all these facts, as we must assume that it did, the Legislature has adjudged that drastic or at least more than the usual or ordinary precautions taken to guard and protect and preserve the public health should be provided for and taken against the spread of this well-nigh implacable destroyer of human life. That body conceived, as certainly there was real, substantial, and alarming occasion for conceiving, that measures should be adopted requiring the subjection of the disease to the strictest surveillance, to the end that spread of the disease by the indiscriminate intercommunication of its victims with the public at large might be prevented, and to special medical treatment and scientific nursing, under such scientifically arranged and maintained conditions as the latest and most scientifically conducted investigations and experiments have demonstrated to be all-essential to successful treatment of the malady. The manifest purpose of the statute is therefore twofold: (1) To succor those indigents who are afflicted with tuberculosis and who have no relatives legally liable for their support, maintenance, and treatment, or, if legally liable, having no financial means to discharge the liability; (2) to prevent the spread of the disease.

The state, to attain these ends, has, by the statute in question, and in the exercise of its sovereignty—indeed, in the exercise of its police power—assumed the right and authority to control the matter of the care and treatment of those indigents who are legally entitled to be cared for and treated at public expense, and who are afflicted with tuberculosis; but, in the place of erecting and maintaining hospitals or sanatoria for that purpose in various parts of the state, which it would have a right to do, it has employed the counties, its agents in the administration of certain of its functions of government, as instrumentalities for or aids in controlling and managing that branch of its governmental duties and policy. That this is the true analysis and exposition of the object and intent of the statute in controversy here is evidenced by the provisions that, as conditions to the payment to the counties of the money therein provided for, the latter must establish tuberculosis wards or hospitals in compliance with regulations established by the state bureau of tuberculosis, that the medical superintendent of such wards or hospitals must render, semiannually, to the said state bureau, a report under oath, showing the number of patients in the active stages of tuberculosis legitimately cared for therein at public expense and the number of weeks of treatment of each of such patients, and that the director of the state bureau may have full power to inspect and investigate, and have access to all records and departments of all institutions, both public and private, where tuberculosis patients are treated, and must prepare annually for each institution a report of its rating on sanitary construction, enforcement of sanitary measures, adequate provision for medical and nursing attendance, provision for food, and such matters of administration as may be designated, etc. The latter provision, giving the state's agents the authority to inspect and investigate private tuberculosis hospitals, is indicative of the importance attached by the state to the exercise of special care in the matter of the treatment of tuberculosis and the maintenance of the most favorable sanitary conditions and surroundings wherever victims of that disease may be cared for and treated. The state undoubtedly has the right, under its police power, to adopt sanitary or other appropriate regulations, applicable to the whole state and to private as well as to public tuberculosis sanatoria, looking to the stamping out of the disease and the prevention of its increase, and thus to the protection of the public health. With respect to county tuberculosis wards or hospitals, it proposes by the law in question to do no more than this. In authorizing the payment by the state of the sum named in the act to counties maintaining such wards or hospitals according to regulations formulated and promulgated by its health department, the Legislature did not intend nor was it the object of the act to appropriate the state's money to or for the benefit of counties, but only to facilitate the proper execution of its scheme to control in part or itself supervise the matter of the treatment of indigent tuberculosis patients, legally entitled to be taken care of at public expense. Obviously, the counties, to which these moneys are authorized to be paid, are, as to such money, mere trustees of an express trust, with absolutely no authority or right to divert the use of the same to any other than the purpose or object for which it has been expressly appropriated by the state. As repeatedly herein declared, we can perceive no sound reason for holding that it is not within the competence of the state to enter into such an arrangement with the counties under its broad and comprehensive and essential sovereign power, that power, unhampered by constitutional restrictions, except, perhaps, as to the mode and manner of its exercise, under which the state is not only authorized, but it is its duty, to make and enforce all such reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary and conducive to the promotion and preservation of the general health, happiness, and welfare of its inhabitants. Thus it is very clear that, in enacting the law with which we are here concerned, and thereby making an appropriation of the state's money for the proper carrying out of the plan therein set forth for the cure and suppression of a dangerous contagious disease, the state has not transcended, but has remained within its rights as a sovereign commonwealth. Thus it does not make a gift of the public money in contravention of the thirty-first section of article 4 of the Constitution, nor appropriate the money of the state to the use or benefit of the corporations or associations or institutions specified in section 22 of said article. Nor, under our view as above set forth as to the nature of the power under which the state has proceeded in the enactment of the law in question, should it be necessary to suggest that the provision of the last-named section of article 4 of the Constitution expressly authorizing the state to grant aid to institutions conducted for the support and maintenance of certain classes of persons (minor orphans, half orphans, etc.), even when viewed by the light of the rule of construction, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," does not preclude the state from the exercise of the right to apply its police power on all proper and appropriate occasions, and to pass laws, such as the one before us, whose purpose is to protect the lives, health, and general happiness of its inhabitants. And it is equally patent, for reasons already given, that the act does not authorize the state bureau of tuberculosis or the state board of health to interfere with or supervise counties, their property or affairs. As stated, the supervisory control exercised by the state under the act is over the tuberculosis patients in the hospitals of those counties conforming in their treatment of those cases to the regulations of said state bureau.

It is conceded that the petitioner maintains a tuberculosis ward in connection with its county hospital conforming in all particulars to the rules established by the state bureau of tuberculosis for the regulation thereof.

In accordance with the foregoing views, the demurrer interposed by the respondent to the petition is hereby overruled, and a writ of mandate is hereby ordered to issue out of this court directed to said respondent, commanding him to issue to and in behalf of the petitioner his warrant for the amount named in the petition.

Ex parte SMITH. (Cr. 531.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 3, 1917.)

LICENSES ⚿6(5) — SUBJECT OF LICENSE — "BUSINESS TRANSACTED IN CITY."

For one engaged in carrying passengers between two points, both outside a city, along a route extending through the city, to drive through it, without therein stopping or doing any of the other incidental acts of such transportation, does not constitute "a business transacted and carried on in such city," which under the Charter of Cities of the Sixth Class, section 862, subd. 10 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1123), it may license for purpose of revenue and regulation; but is a mere incident of the business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 6.]

Application by F. L. Smith for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

C. E. McDowell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Hartley Shaw, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. An ordinance of the city of Tropico, which is a city of the sixth class, among other things, contained a provision in effect making it unlawful, without first obtaining a license so to do, for any person to operate or carry on the business of operating any auto bus or motor vehicle over the streets of said city in carrying passengers for hire from one point to another, both of which points are outside the boundaries thereof. Upon a complaint charging petitioner with the violation of this ordinance, in that on November 21, 1916, he did "unlawfully operate a motor vehicle engaged in the business of carrying passengers for hire, which said motor vehicle was then and there operated and run over a particular route and between particular points, to wit, between the city of Bakersfield and the city of Los Angeles, through the city of Tropico and over San Fernando boulevard, a public street in said city, without first paying a license fee and obtaining a license therefor from said city of Tropico, contrary to the provisions of ordinance No. 119 of said city," a warrant was issued upon which he was arrested and held in custody by the city marshal.

Petitioner contends that the provision of said ordinance with the violation of which he is charged is invalid for a number of reasons, chief among which is the claim that a city of the sixth class is not vested with authority to enact an ordinance imposing a tax by license or otherwise upon motor vehicles conducting the business of transporting passengers from Los Angeles to Bakersfield over public highways a small part of which extend through the city of Tropico, where, as here conceded, no stops are made for the purpose of either taking on or discharging passengers in such city, nor any soliciting of business had therein. While under its police power such city may adopt and compel the observance of all reasonable measures intended for the regulation of traffic over the streets by all persons operating motor vehicles thereon, its sole power to levy a tax of this character is found in subdivision 10, section 862, of the charter for cities of the sixth class (Deering's Gen. Laws, Ed. 1915, p. 1123), which provides that the board of trustees of said city shall have power "to license, for the purpose of revenue and regulation, all and every kind of business authorized by law and transacted and carried on in such city or town, and all shows, exhibitions and lawful games carried on therein; to fix the rates of license tax upon the same, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise." Under this provision the power of the city to impose a license upon a business is clearly limited to that only which is "transacted and carried on in such city." That by virtue of this section the city of Tropico may require persons, companies, or corporations who therein conduct the business of transporting passengers for hire to be licensed, admits of no question. It is the occupation, however, not an act which is merely incidental thereto, which is subject to the tax. Merritt v. State, 19 Tex. App. 435; Weil v. State, 52 Ala. 19; Merced County v. Heim, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399. Business is defined as that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of men for the purpose of profit or improvement. Trustees of Columbia College v. Lynch, 47 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 273. It may be said to embrace all things necessary to be done to fully accomplish the purpose implied by the undertaking. The business conducted by petitioner, as alleged in violation of the ordinance, is that of transporting passengers for hire, not in the city, but between termini both of which are outside thereof, incidental to, connected with, and as a part of which a number of acts other than transportation, such as soliciting business, taking on and discharging passengers, collecting fares, and caring for their welfare en route, are necessary to be performed. The transportation of the passengers over any particular part of the public highway is one of the incidents of the business, but it no more constitutes the business than does the collection of their fares. Hence it cannot be said that the carrying of passengers for hire from Los Angeles to Bakersfield by means of a motor vehicle operated over the public highway, a part of which extends through Tropico where no stops are made, nor any of the incidental acts of such transportation performed other than traveling along the streets, constitutes a business "transacted and carried on in such city." Adopting the contrary view urged by respondent, the conclusion must logically follow that a physician, grocer, plumber, indeed, every one engaged in a professional calling or business in one city, having occasion to make a professional call or deliver goods to a purchaser, to do which required him to travel upon the highways through other cities, could under a like provision of the ordinance to that here involved be subjected to a tax in the guise of a license levied upon the theory that such use of the streets constituted "a business transacted and carried on" in the different cities through which he passed. While the use of the streets may be regulated, the city has no power to convert them into toll roads, and thus exact tribute from those who in the conduct of business elsewhere have occasion to use them solely as highways.

For the reasons given, the provision of the ordinance in question, for the violation of which petitioner is deprived of his liberty, is invalid. It is therefore ordered that he be discharged from the custody of the city marshal.

STEWART et al. v. STEWART HOTEL CO. et al. STEWART ESTATE CO. v. STEWART HOTEL CO. (DETWILER et al., Interveners). (Civ. 1620.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 5, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1917.)

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑60 — CAPITAL—CONVEYANCES.

Where a corporation transferred to its stockholders a leasehold and personal property, the conveyance was a transfer of the corporation's capital or assets within Civ. Code, § 309, which is equivalent to capital stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 162.]

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑186—TRANSFERS—VALIDITY OF CONVEYANCES.

Under Civ. Code, § 309, declaring that directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof, nor must they create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock, nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders or any of them any part of the capital stock, nor reduce or increase the capital stock, but that nothing shall prevent division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon the dissolution or expiration of its term of existence, a corporation, to save itself from loss, may, in view of section 343, allowing corporations to acquire their own stock under the assessment scheme provided by law, transfer assets in consideration of a delivery to it of its own stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 695–701.]

3. CORPORATIONS 🔑186 — TRANSFER OF ASSETS TO STOCKHOLDER.

A corporation conducting a successful hotel business acquired a lease upon other hotel property and equipped it at a large expense. The venture proved unprofitable; the second hotel being conducted at a loss which practically equalled the profit derived from the first hotel. Most of the equipment was unpaid for, and creditors were pressing the corporation, threatening it with ruinous litigation. Thereupon stockholders of the corporation who owned the demised premises offered upon assignment of the lease and transfer of the furniture and equipments to surrender their stock and assume all indebtedness incurred by reason of the equipment of the second hotel. Held that, as the venture had proved a loss and was threatening the corporation with ruin, and as the value of the property did not exceed the amount of the debts assumed by the stockholders, the transaction was not subject to attack under Civ. Code, § 309, declaring that directors shall not divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders any part of the capital stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Suit by Charles A. Stewart and another against the Stewart Hotel Company and others, in which Caroline B. Detwiler and others intervened, and, together with the defendant, cross-complained, consolidated with an action by the Stewart Estate Company against the same defendants, in which similar cross-complaints were filed. There were judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants and cross-complainants appeal from the same and an order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Detwiler, De Etta A. Detwiler, A. K. Detwiler, and J. R. Harrison. Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for appellants J. W. Mason and Rose Mason. Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant John G. Barker. Brittain & Kuhl, of San Francisco, for respondents Charles A. Stewart, Margaret Stewart, and Stewart Estate Co.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The transcript concerns two actions, commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, namely, one numbered 39900, Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart v. Stewart Hotel Company et al., and one numbered 39901, Stewart Estate Company v. Stewart Hotel Company et al. The actions were consolidated and tried together under stipulation that the evidence taken should apply interchangeably to each of said actions. Both are in form the ordinary actions to quiet title—the action 39900 to the title to a certain leasehold interest in the real estate referred to in and the subject of the action 39901 and also certain furniture and equipment constituting what is spoken of as the hotel plant of the Hotel Stewart, situated on Geary street between Mason and Powell streets, in said city. The controversy is between plaintiffs in both actions and the defendants, the Stewart Hotel Company and certain of its stockholders.

The Stewart Hotel Company was incorporated in June, 1906, for the purpose of conducting a hotel soon after the great fire and earthquake of April, 1906. The corporation acquired certain leasehold interests in some improved lots situated at the corner of Gough and Eddy streets, in said city. There were six incorporators, each of whom contributed $5,000, which appears to have been the only cash contributions to the corporation. They were plaintiffs Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, his sister, and defendants John W. Mason, John G. Barker, T. W. Nowlin, and A. K. Detwiler. Up to January 14, 1908, the Stewart Hotel Company had issued 6,000 shares of its authorized capitalization of 7,500 shares of the par value of $10 each. The buildings on these lots were reconstructed and put in condition for hotel purposes and were opened to the public under the name of Jefferson Hotel. Charles A. Stewart was president of the corporation, and both he and Margaret Stewart were at all times members of the board of directors until shortly after May 12, 1908, and jointly owned 2,000 shares or one-third of the issued shares of the Stewart Hotel Company. They also owned a lot on the southerly side of Geary street, near Powell, upon which they erected an eight-story building to be known as the "Hotel Stewart." During the progress of the construction of this building the Stewart Hotel Company entered into negotiations with the Stewarts, Charles and Margaret, for a lease of the Hotel Stewart, and in the latter part of September, 1907, the work of installing the furniture and equipment was commenced, and the hotel was opened for business the latter part of November or early in December, 1907. On January 2, 1908, a lease of the Hotel Stewart premises was entered into between the Stewarts individually and the Stewart Hotel Company "for the full term of ten years from and after the 1st day of January, 1908," at the monthly rental of $3,500, containing the usual covenants found in such leases, and requiring the lessees to furnish a surety bond in the sum of $15,000 to secure the payment of rents and the keeping of the terms of the lease. The books of the Stewart Hotel Company showed net profits of the Jefferson Hotel as follows: In January, 1908, $1,566.56; in February, $2,991.25; in March, $1,901.37; in April, $1,474.86. The Hotel Stewart was fitted out at an expenditure of $106,528.69 on account of which there had been paid by said company, prior to May 12, 1908, as found by the court, "only the sum of $24,328.12," and that on that date the company was indebted to various creditors about the sum of $90,000, and, in addition thereto, $2,000 on a promissory note to Ella R. Ransom and $3,528.60 to the Stewarts for rent of the Hôtel Stewart. It appeared that the Hotel Stewart, to the close of April, 1908, suffered operating net losses as follows: January, 1908, $5,516.45; February, $1,664.25; March, profit, $420.70; April, loss, $1,369.95. The statement of accounts payable showed an indebtedness at the end of January of $122,754.88 and at the end of April of $133,054.13.

The court made the following finding:

"XIII. The court finds that on the 12th day of May, 1908, and for two or three months prior thereto said defendant Stewart Hotel Company owed to W. & J. Sloane Company, one of its creditors, a sum in excess of $50,000 for furniture and carpets installed in said hotel; that said W. & J. Sloane Company, together with other creditors, had been pressing said defendant Stewart Hotel Company for some months previous for payment of their debts; that said W. & J. Sloane Company had shortly prior to the 12th day of May, 1908, threatened that unless their indebtedness was immediately or quickly adjusted they would institute litigation and either attach all the property of the defendant Stewart Hotel Company or involve it in expensive and ruinous litigation; that defendant Stewart Hotel Company endeavored to raise funds to meet the obligations of said W. & J. Sloane Company, but was unable to do so; that said defendant Stewart Hotel Company endeavored to obtain terms and time from said W. & J. Sloane Company and its other creditors, but was refused any and all concessions or indulgence or additional terms or time or credit; that said defendant Stewart Hotel Company was unable to obtain financial assistance from either its stockholders or from banks in San Francisco."

There had been much discussion in the board of directors as to the financial stress under which the Hotel Stewart was being operated, and on May 2, 1908, the president called a special meeting at which the minutes show the following, all directors being present except Barker:

"The purpose of the meeting was announced to be for the purpose of considering and acting upon a proposition for the disposal of this company's lease of the Hotel Stewart together with the hotel plant consisting of furniture and fixtures and all personal property, as a whole.

"Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, as individuals, asked the board if the company would accept a proposition from them to take the Hotel Stewart off the hands of the company and assume all the liabilities of the company incurred in promoting the same, in consideration of $20,000 of the capital stock of the company held by said Chas. A. and Margaret Stewart to be turned back to the treasury of the company.

"A general discussion of said proposition was had, and the board expressed a willingness to accept such a proposition, substantially as offered, if the details could be equitably adjusted between the parties, and in order to act intelligently it was suggested that the offer be put in writing and submitted to the board. Adjourned.

"T. W. Nowlin, Sec."

The minutes for May 12, 1908, show as follows:

"The board met pursuant to notice, at the office of the company, No. 848 Gough street, San Francisco, Cal., this 12th day of May, 1908, at 8 o'clock p. m. Present: Chas. A. Stewart, president; Margaret Stewart; John G. Barker; John W. Mason; T. W. Nowlin. Mr. Noah W. Gray met with the board. The minutes of the last regular and adjourned and special meetings were read and duly approved. * * *

"The following proposal, in writing, was submitted to the board by Chas. A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart:

"'San Francisco, Cal., May 12, 1908.

"'Board of Directors, Stewart Hotel Company—Gentlemen: The undersigned, Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, hereby offer and tender to the Stewart Hotel Company the following proposition: We will take an assignment of the lease of the Hotel Stewart on Geary street near Powell and a bill of sale of all the furniture and fixtures and hotel plant therein, from the company, and in consideration therefor will transfer to the company all of the capital stock which we own in the Stewart Hotel Company, being 2,000 shares of the par value of $20,000. We will assume and pay all the liabilities incurred and now outstanding in promoting and operating the Hotel Stewart and hold the company harmless therefrom and will assume and pay the note of Ella R. Ransom for the sum of $2,000. The company to assume and pay all the liabilities incurred and now outstanding on account of the Hotel Jefferson and hold us harmless therefrom, all accounts to be brought up to May 1, 1908, and this offer to take effect as of that date. Very respectfully, Chas. A. Stewart, Margaret Stewart.'

"Upon motion of Director Jno. W. Mason and second of Director T. W. Nowlin, it was resolved that the said proposal of Chas. A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, as submitted, be accepted by this company, and that the president and secretary be, and they are hereby, instructed and empowered to execute on behalf of the company whatever instruments may be required to effect the transfers covered by said proposal, and that the stock received from said Chas. A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart on account of said transfer be turned into the treasury of this company. Said resolution was unanimously adopted by the vote of the directors present, excepting the directors Chas. A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, who abstained from voting on said resolution. Adjourned. T. W. Nowlin, Secretary."

The transaction was consummated by bill of sale of the furniture and equipment of the Hotel Stewart executed by the corporation to the Stewarts, taking date, however, of May 1, 1908. The bill of sale recited that the conveyance "is made without reservation on the part of said first party [the corporation], but subject to all outstanding claims for the purchase of said described personal property or any part thereof, which said claims the second parties [the Stewarts] have assumed and agreed to pay holding said first party free from all liability therefor." The assignment of the lease declared that it was "intended as a cancellation of said lease and merger of the same in the said parties of the first part therein named [the Stewarts]." The proposition of the Stewarts was that "all accounts to be brought up to May 1, 1908, and this offer to take effect as of that date"; and this was the date at which the relation of the corporation to the business of the Hotel Stewart ceased. At this point it may be stated, as found by the court, that the Stewart Estate Company, plaintiff in action 39901, "since the 30th day of April, 1908, has been a corporation duly organized," etc., and that on May 20, 1908, the Stewarts conveyed to the Stewart Estate Company by grant deed the said lots and hotel buildings on Geary street and the leasehold property. The Stewarts, Charles and Margaret, hold all the stock in the Stewart Estate Company and went into possession and control of the Hotel Stewart at the date of the transfer by the Stewart Hotel Company, and ever since have been in possession and control of said property, receiving to its use the issues and profits thereof. Says the brief of appellants:

> "The principal legal question involved is whether the transaction of May 12, 1908, between the defendant Stewart Hotel Company, on the one hand, and the plaintiffs Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, on the other, while acting as directors and stockholders of that corporation, violated section 309 of the Civil Code."

This section provides as follows:

> "The directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; nor must they create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock; nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, except as hereinafter provided, nor reduce or increase the capital stock, except as herein specially provided. * * * Nothing herein prohibits a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution, or the expiration of its term of existence."

In their answers and cross-complaints it is sought to have the transfer of said lease to the Stewarts declared to be a nullity, that plaintiffs be required to account for the rents, issues, and profits of said real and personal property from the 1st day of May, 1908, for reasonable attorney's fees, for judgment against plaintiff Stewart Estate Company and the cross-defendants, Charles A. and Margaret Stewart, for the amount found due upon such accounting, and quieting the title of defendants to said leasehold and personal property.

The court adjudged the plaintiffs to be "the absolute owners of the property described in the complaint herein, and are entitled to the exclusive possession thereof," and that "defendants have not, nor has either or any of them, any right, title, interest, or claim in or to the property described in the complaint." Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the several motions for a new trial.

It becomes necessary to state such further findings of fact as formed the basis of the court's conclusions of law and judgment. We quote from the findings in action 39901. Following finding XIII, above quoted, the court found:

> "XIV. The court finds that if attachment proceedings had been instituted by said W. & J. Sloane Company or the other creditors, or bankruptcy proceedings had been instituted by them, it would have involved the defendant Stewart Hotel Company in heavy loss and possible ruin.
> "XV. The court finds that on said 12th day of May, 1908, and for some time prior thereto, the lease that defendant Stewart Hotel Company had of said Stewart Hotel property was proving a heavy burden and a liability, which said Stewart Hotel Company was at that time unable to meet."

The court found that at the time the Stewarts' proposal was acted upon all the stockholders of the Stewart Hotel Company were present "save and except (interveners) Caroline B. Detwiler and De Etta A. Detwiler," and as to them the court found that they "had notice and knowledge of said sale of said property and the assignment of said lease and the circumstances surrounding the same, within a short time, not exceeding 90 days, after the 12th day of May, 1908, and that said interveners, Caroline B. Detwiler and De Etta A. Detwiler, did not at any time protest or object thereto and did, by their failure to protest and object thereto, acquiesce in said transaction."

As to the motive for entering into the transaction the court found as follows:

> "XXI. The court finds that for the purpose of saving the defendant Stewart Hotel Company from financial loss and ruin, and for the purpose of relieving said Stewart Hotel Company from the burden of the indebtedness incurred in the equipment of the Hotel Stewart, and for the purpose of relieving said Stewart Hotel Company from the burden and liability of the lease held by it, and for the purpose of saving to the defendant Stewart Hotel Company the valuable and profit-paying asset of the Hotel Jefferson, and for the purpose of making said Stewart Hotel Company a going profit-making concern instead of a financially burdened corporation, the proposal made by said Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart, hereinbefore in these findings referred to, was accepted by the defendant Stewart Hotel Company after a full and fair discussion."

Also as follows:

"XXV. The court finds that the consideration paid by said Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart for the conveyance and delivery to them of said hotel plant, furniture, furnishings, and equipment, together with the assignment, cancellation, and surrender of said lease, was a full, fair, and adequate consideration, and was at the time believed by all the stockholders of said Stewart Hotel Company to be such.

"XXVI. The court finds that all the stockholders and directors present at the meeting of May 12, 1908, believed said proposal and its acceptance and the transfers made in pursuance thereof to be for the best interests of the defendant Stewart Hotel Company, and believed them to be absolutely necessary to save said Stewart Hotel Company from serious loss or financial ruin, and they acted upon said belief in accepting said proposal.

"XXVII. The court finds that immediately after the 12th day of May, 1908, there was a complete novation of all the indebtedness of the defendant Stewart Hotel Company arising out of the equipment, furnishing and operation of the Hotel Stewart, by and through which the Stewart Hotel Company was relieved of all of its debts aggregating, as hereinbefore found, more than $90,000; and said debts were, with the knowledge and consent and ratification of the creditors of the Stewart Hotel Company, assumed by said Charles A. Stewart and Margaret Stewart personally, and were fully paid by them prior to the time of the commencement of this action. * * *

"XXIX. The court finds that the capital stock of defendant Stewart Hotel Company was not reduced or withdrawn or divided or paid over in any manner, or in any sum, by reason of the proposal and acceptance of May 12, 1908, or by reason of the bill of sale, transfer, or delivery of the furniture, equipment, furnishings, and hotel plant, or by reason of the assignment, cancellation, or surrender of the lease or the transfer to the defendant Stewart Hotel Company of said 2,000 shares of stock, and further finds that it was not reduced, divided, or withdrawn in any manner or for any amount, by reason of any fact alleged in any of the pleadings in this action.

"XXX. The court further finds that neither the capital stock nor the assets of said corporation were divided, withdrawn, paid over, diminished or impaired in any manner, and further finds that the leasehold of said Hotel Stewart had no value of any kind."

It was further found that the Sewart Hotel Company continued in business for more than three years after said proposal and agreement, "and no objection was at any time made to said proposal and agreement and the consummation thereof by any of the stockholders of said corporation until the year 1912"; that all the terms and conditions of said proposal and its acceptance long prior to the commencement of this action "were fully performed, kept, discharged and executed"; that all the debts of the Stewart Hotel Company owing by it on May 12, 1908, have since said time and before the commencement of this action been fully paid and discharged; that all of the outstanding stock of said company amounts to 5,660 shares; that there is not now in the treasury of said company the 2,000 shares which were transferred to it by the Stewarts; and that said stock so transferred "has, since the transfer thereof, been in whole or in part reissued by defendant Stewart Hotel Company." It was further found that the transactions done under the proposal of May 12, 1908, "were not void nor voidable, but that each of them was duly and regularly and legally done without fraud or fraudulent intent and for a full, fair and adequate consideration"; that the Stewarts conveyed said property to the Stewart Estate Company on May 20, 1908; that said company acquired said property "with full knowledge of the facts in these findings made"; and that said conveyance to said company was not made in collusion with said Stewarts or either of them, "nor was it made to defeat the claims of defendants or interveners, or any one else."

[1] It cannot be disputed that in transferring to its stockholders Charles and Margaret Stewart the lease and plant of the Hotel Stewart the directors of the Stewart Hotel Company were disposing of the company's capital stock, that is to say, of its capital or assets. Among the numerous cases cited by appellants as explanatory of the statute are Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 309, 99 Am. Dec. 365; Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 378, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520; Tapscott v. Mexican Colo., etc., Co., 153 Cal. 667, 96 Pac. 271; Schulte v. Boulevard, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013.

[2] The general rule is so thoroughly well settled that any discussion concerning its application ordinarily would be superfluous. Meeting the position of respondents that the facts here furnish an exception to the rule, appellants say:

> "Let it be conceded for purposes of the argument only that the transaction by which a corporation attempts to exchange its assets for certificates of stock held by a stockholder might be beneficial from the standpoint of the corporation; yet nevertheless we insist as a proposition of law that it is no more valid than if such transaction were a detriment to the corporation, for the simple reason that it is a transaction prohibited by statute."

As we view the case, and as appellants seem to view it, this statement presents the principal question submitted for decision. Appellants cite Martin v. Zellerbach and Kohl v. Lilienthal, supra, as decisive of the question. On the other hand, respondents, while conceding the general rule to be as claimed by appellants, contend that, "like all general rules, however, it is subject to certain well-recognized exceptions," which, "instead of weakening or destroying the rule, indicate most clearly the philosophy of it"; that "in this state we have no law in terms forbidding a corporation to acquire its capital stock," i. e., its shares; that "the acquisition by the corporation of its capital stock is not ipso facto void." It is pointed out that the statute (Civ. Code, § 343) provides that a corporation may acquire its own stock under the assessment scheme provided by law; that a corporation may likewise acquire its own stock in payment of a debt owing by a stockholder to it, or to secure it from loss (Ralston v. Bank of California, 112 Cal. 208, 44 Pac. 476), and it may be compelled to buy back its own capital stock if at the time of its issue it contracted to do so. (Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. [N. S.] 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013).

In the Zellerbach Case, 38 Cal. 300, 99 Am. Dec. 365, two corporations, the Eureka Lake Company and the Miners' Ditch Company, owning in severalty several water ditches, and having no interests in common, agreed to form a new corporation, to be called the Eureka Lake Water Company, to which each should convey all its property; the stock of the new corporation to be distributed in certain proportions to the stockholders of said two old corporations. The Eureka Lake Company was indebted to plaintiff in the action, who obtained a judgment against it and became the purchaser of its property under execution sale, obtaining the sheriff's deed therefor. Before plaintiff obtained the judgment the defendant recovered a judgment against the new corporation and became the purchaser of the whole of its property upon execution and obtained a sheriff's deed therefor. Plaintiff sued to recover possession of the property which he had bought, and the foregoing facts were set up as an equitable defense. It was the property of the Eureka Lake Company that was in controversy. The court, after saying that the transaction as agreed upon and attempted to be carried out, if effectual in law, would of necessity have resulted in an alienation of the entire property and capital of the Eureka Lake Company, and that not a dollar would have remained to satisfy the demands of creditors, said:

> "The contract was that this stock [in the new corporation] was to be issued, and it was afterwards issued, directly to the stockholders of the Eureka Lake Company. It does not vary the principle that the consideration to be paid was stock instead of money. If the contract had been that, on the transfer of the property, the Eureka Lake Water Company would pay to the stockholders of the Eureka Lake Company $100,000 in cash as the price of the property, the legal proposition involved would have been precisely the same as in this case. In either case the consideration would have been paid, not to the trustees, as a fund primarily liable to creditors, but to the stockholders, for their own use."

It will be observed that the point decided was that the shares of the new company representing, as they did, the capital or assets of the corporation, could not be divided or distributed to the stockholders; for it would in effect be a distribution of the capital and was expressly forbidden by statute. The court said:

> "We wish it to be expressly understood that our decision is limited to the precise facts, as disclosed by the record. That it may not be regarded as covering broader grounds than intended, we deem it proper here to say that we express no opinion upon the question whether property of the kind in question may be transferred by parol and the delivery of possession, or whether, if there are two rival corporations, like the Eureka Lake Company and the Miners' Ditch Company, organized for the same purpose of supplying water to a mining region where the demand is limited, which, in consequence of the greater expense of managing the two separately, and the competition, are both doing business at a loss, and are liable to become insolvent, it would not be lawful, in pursuance of their interests, to form a new corporation for the same purpose, and convey the property of both to such new corporation in the manner pursued in this instance, provided the new corporation, as a part of the arrangement, should assume and become obligated to pay all the debts of the old corporation. Such an arrangement might be for the interest of all parties, creditors as well as stockholders, and, if lawful, would be valid as to all. The personal liability of the stockholders in such case would continue, and no property would be withdrawn from liability to the creditors' demands. The prohibition of the thirteenth section of the act concerning corporations is directed against the trustees, and seems designed to protect creditors as such, and also to protect the stockholders against their mismanagement in distributing capital stock in the form of dividends, with a view of holding out the idea that the corporation is more prosperous than it is, for the purpose of promoting some unlawful object. If all parties interested are secured from injury, and the purpose is a lawful one, the object of the provision would seem to be accomplished, and there would be no one entitled to complain. Such a transaction was regarded as lawful in Treadwell v. Salisbury Manufacturing Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 393 [66 Am. Dec. 490]. But we do not intend to express any opinion on these grave questions now, for no sufficient facts are presented in the pleadings or findings to require it, and we only allude to the questions in order to guard our opinion in so important a case, from misconstruction or misapprehension."

The Lilienthal Case, 81 Cal. 378, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520, involved a similar question. There two mining corporations, the Head Center Consolidated Mining Company, a California corporation, and the Tranquility Mining Company, a New Jersey corporation, owning contiguous mining claims, formed a new corporation, to which they severally conveyed their mines, the new corporation, called the Head Center & Tranquility Mining Company, paying therefor 100,000 shares of the stock of the new company to each of the two corporations. The case related to the shares issued to the Head Center Company. The ground conveyed by this company to the new company did not comprise all the property of the Head Center Company, and it still continued to carry on corporate business and reducing ores. It was not free from debt, and afterwards levied an assessment and paid up its then existing indebtedness. Its term of corporate existence had not expired, and the company had not disincorporated. Plaintiff Kohl and others commenced the action against the Head Center Company and certain of its officers, alleging ownership in certain of the 100,000 shares of the new company so received for the sale of the property of the Head Center Company. Defendants claimed that these shares were the property and assets of the Head Center Company, that the company had no right under the law to distribute them to its stockholders, and that its directors were entitled to represent and vote them at all meetings of the new company. Plaintiffs had judgment in the lower court, and on appeal the judgment was reversed. Among other things, the court said:

> "There is, however, one other fact found by the court necessary to the support of its judgment, if under the law it could be supported at all, but which finding we do not think is supported by the evidence. That finding is that it was 'mutually understood and agreed by and between the stockholders of both the old companies that the stock of the new company should be equally divided between and belong to the stockholders of the old companies.'"

It was not decided that the consolidation was illegal. The point decided was that the stockholders of the old Head Center Company (plaintiffs being such) were not entitled to have their proportion of the stock of the new company distributed to them for the reason, given in the Zellerbach Case, that it would in effect be distributing the capital or assets of the Head Center Company.

So it was held in San Francisco, etc., R. R. Co. v. Bee, 48 Cal. 398, 405:

> "It was certainly not competent to the members of that corporation to dissipate this fund and place it beyond the reach of creditors by merely going through the process of reincorporation, taking on a new corporate name, transferring the assets of the old corporation to the new one without consideration, and issuing the capital stock in the new corporation to the holders of the capital stock of the old corporation. This transaction involved a breach of positive statute law."

We will next notice two of the many cases cited by respondent.

In Ralston v. Bank of California, 112 Cal. 208, 44 Pac. 476, one Baum held a certificate for 60 of defendant's shares which provided that no transfer of the stock would be made on the books until payment of all indebtedness due the bank from the stockholder in whose name the stock might stand. In 1881 Baum transferred the stock to Sather, who on September 13, 1886, demanded the transfer of the stock. Baum was then indebted to the bank beyond the value of the stock. The demand was refused. Soon after Sather died, and in April, 1888, said shares were distributed to plaintiffs in trust under Sather's will. On March 10, 1887, the bank sold and transferred to Greenebaum & Co., at a large discount, the indebtedness held by it against Baum. On July 3, 1888, plaintiffs demanded registry of the transfer of the stock, which was refused unless plaintiffs would pay the balance of its claims against Baum above the amount received from Greenebaum & Co. The action was in trover for the conversion of the shares. Defendant recovered in the trial court, and on appeal the judgment was reversed, and a judgment directed in favor of plaintiffs for the value of the shares at the time the second demand was made and interest from that date. We quote from the opinion:

> "The argument that the corporation becomes the owner of the shares converted, and hence that its stock is reduced otherwise than in the manner provided by law (Civ. Code, § 359), and hence further that such conversion is legally impossible because contravening the policy of the law, has no great force. If necessary to save itself from loss, the bank might have contracted for and have received the title to these shares in payment of Baum's debts to it, and the transaction would have been perfectly legal. Ex parte Holmes, 5 Cow. [N. Y.] 426. With the same purpose in view the bank, apparently in good faith and under claim of right, refused the registry, and this had the undesigned effect of converting the shares; and it is not perceived how acquisition of title by this means can, though wrongful as regards the plaintiffs, be more obnoxious to public policy than by contract in the case supposed. The authorized capital is not reduced, for the shares are not extinguished, but may be reissued. Cook on Stocks & Stockholders, § 314; Morawetz on Corporations, § 434; Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Wickersham, 99 Cal. 655 [34 Pac. 444]."

The court said it would be legal for a corporation to take the shares of a stockholder in discharge of his indebtedness. Now, the stockholder's liability to the corporation is an asset—an account or bill receivable. If he is solvent and able to pay, the bank would have no more right to exchange this asset for his stock than to buy the stock outright. What the court meant and in fact said was that to save itself from loss the bank might do this, though under a strict application of the rule it would violate section 309 of the Civil Code. In short, here was an exception to the rule.

Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013, was a case where, coincidentally with his subscription to the stock of defendant company, a written agreement was entered into between the latter and plaintiff that the company would repurchase the stock subject to the terms stated. The action was on the contract; plaintiff offering and being in a position to restore the shares. Defendant had judgment on its demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment and ordered that the demurrer be overruled with leave to defendants to answer. As stated in the opinion:

> "The position of the respondent is that the contracts for the retaking by the corporation of its own shares are illegal and void, as in violation of the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, prohibiting directors of corporations from dividing, withdrawing or paying to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, or from reducing or increasing the capital stock, except as provided in the section."

After showing that the phrase "capital stock," as used in the section, means the assets and not the shares, and also pointing out that, "although the prohibition runs, in terms, only against the directors, the effect of the section is to deprive the stockholders as well of power to do the forbidden acts," citing cases, the opinion proceeds:

"In other jurisdictions the authorities show a sharp conflict over the question whether, in the absence of any statutory or charter restrictions, a corporation may employ its assets for the purchase of shares of its own stock. Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) § 311. But, in view of the Code provisions to which we have referred, it cannot be doubted that in this state a corporation is not authorized to make such purchase, since the result would be to illegally withdraw, and pay to a stockholder a part of the 'capital stock.' Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Wickersham, 99 Cal. 655, 661, 34 Pac. 444. The want of power to buy its own stock does not prohibit a corporation from taking the stock in satisfaction of a loan, or when otherwise necessary to save itself from loss (Ralston v. Bank of California, 112 Cal. 208, 213, 44 Pac. 476), but the general rule is, as above stated, that the purchase is unauthorized. Thus this court has condemned, as in violation of section 309, a bylaw assuming to give to any stockholder the right, upon 60 days' notice, to withdraw from the corporation, and to receive, upon surrender of his stock, the amount paid therefor. Vercoutere v. Golden State L. Co., 116 Cal. 410, 48 Pac. 375."

It would serve no useful purpose to review all of the many cases, English and American, cited by counsel in their elaborate briefs. The entire field of the law upon the question seems to have been swept clean of cases and text-books bearing upon it. The inquiry is simmered down, we think, to the basic question: Does the general rule, as to which there is no controversy, admit of no exceptions? If not, the decision of the lower court was wrong. If the rule admits of exceptions, the question is: Do the facts here constitute an exception?

We need go no further than to Ralston v. Bank of California, supra, and Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Co., supra, to find exceptions to the rule. In the Ralston Case the court said:

"If necessary to save itself from loss, the bank might have contracted for and have received the title to these shares in payment of Baum's debts to it, and the transaction would have been perfectly legal."

In the Schulte Case, after having stated the general rule, the court said:

"The want of power to buy its own stock does not prohibit a corporation from taking the stock in satisfaction of a loan, or when otherwise necessary to save itself from loss."

What did the court mean when it said that a corporation not only might take its stock in satisfaction of a loan or when otherwise necessary to save itself from loss? We feel authorized to assume that the court meant to say that circumstances might arise other than such as appeared in those two cases where the corporation would be justified in taking over the shares of one of its stockholders, and that each case must be governed by its own peculiar facts; that the general rule, though well settled in this state, is not inflexible and unyielding.

[3] The benefit or loss to the corporation in the present case must be determined from the situation of the parties and the property involved at the time the proposal of the Stewarts was accepted. The contract was fully executed, and no objection from directors or stockholders was suggested for nearly four years, and then only by the Detwilers, who, the court found, had notice of the contract shortly after it was entered into. And all liabilities existing at that time have been fully paid. Clearly the court, from its view of the contract, did not err in refusing defendants the right to go into the question of the profits and losses to the Stewarts in operating the Hotel Stewart. It is now quite impossible for defendants to place the parties back where they stood in May, 1908, and they do not offer to do so. They say that this is not required of them because the transaction was absolutely void ab initio. What, then, were the facts upon which the learned trial judge based his decision?

Briefly epitomized, the facts were as follows: The Stewart Hotel Company was operating the Hotel Jefferson at a large profit monthly. The net earnings for January, February, March, and April, 1908, amounted to about $8,000. Believing it could extend its hotel business profitably by operating the Hotel Stewart, it leased the premises from the owners, the Stewarts, and proceeded to equip the hotel at a cost of over $106,000. It opened the Hotel Stewart in the latter part of November, 1907, and operated it about five months at a loss of over $8,000. In April, 1908, it found itself indebted about $90,000 for furnishings, and one of its largest creditors, Sloane & Co., whose claim amounted to about $50,000 was pressing payment and threatening to close the hotel or otherwise proceed to collect its claim through suit. All efforts to obtain further extension of credit or obtain loans from banks had failed. The corporation also owed the Stewarts one month's rent and $2,000 on a promissory note past due. In this situation of its financial affairs the Stewarts made the proposal, which was consummated, to take over this lease and to assume the liabilities above referred to and surrender to the corporation their 2,000 shares of its stock, of the par value of $20,000. These shares were not extinguished nor were they distributed to the stockholders, but were placed in the treasury, and, as the court found, have since that time been "in whole or in part reissued or used by defendant Stewart Hotel Company." The testimony of Mr. Rich, manager of the Palace Hotel, was that the plant transferred to the Stewarts "might possibly have been worth $70,000." Mr. Woods, manager of the Hotel St. Francis, testified:

"In view of the conditions that obtained at that time, I would place the value of what the equipment cost, less 25 per cent. In other words, if the equipment cost $106,000, I would deduct from that 25 per cent, and I would call that the value of the entire plant, including the leasehold and everything of the kind."

There was evidence and the court found "that the leasehold of said Hotel Stewart had no value of any kind." The value of the equipment and the supplies on hand, according to the testimony of Rich and Woods, was several thousand dollars less than the amount of the liabilities which the Stewarts assumed and paid. The books of the company showed liabilities amounting to over $110,000, while the assets, as testified to by Woods and Rich, had a value of about $86,000. The Stewarts not only took over and subsequently paid these liabilities, but surrendered their 2,000 shares in the company. Had the Stewarts retained these shares, no possible question could have arisen as to the legality of the transaction; for it was within the powers of the corporation and apparently very beneficial. It is beyond question, too, that in the surrendering to the corporation by the Stewarts of their 2,000 shares the benefit to it was increased to the extent of their value. We cannot see that the transfer of this stock effected a diminution or reduction of the assets of the corporation, nor can it reasonably be said to have been a trafficking or bargaining by the company in its capital stock. The complexion of the transaction must be judged in its entirety. There was no evidence of overreaching or unfairness, no semblance of fraud in the transaction. Mr. Stewart, acting with other directors, made every reasonable effort without avail to obtain extensions of credit or effect a loan to tide over the emergency, and it was only by mortgaging the fee to the real property as well as the personal property that the Stewarts were able to make satisfactory arrangements with creditors. The principal asset of the corporation remaining after the transfer of the Hotel Stewart plant was the Jefferson Hotel, fully equipped and operating at a profit. The company was solvent. Its monthly profits about equaled its losses on the Hotel Stewart. Unquestionably the transaction not only brought a substantial benefit to the corporation, but was "necessary to save itself from loss" and threatened bankruptcy. The corporation relieved itself and its stockholders of a large indebtedness and of a losing venture, and had remaining its only asset of value, which value was increased by taking the Stewarts' shares. Without going further into the surrounding circumstances, we think the facts furnish an exception to the general rule and that the transaction was valid.

Other questions are presented in the briefs covered by the findings, but as all parties seem to agree that the case must turn upon the legality or illegality of the contract between the directors and the Stewarts, our conclusion on the point renders further consideration of the case unnecessary.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SWEETMAN. (Cr. 516.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Feb. 1, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1917.)

1. BURGLARY 🔑41(2)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—CORPUS DELICTI.

Evidence which, exclusive of confession of defendant, shows without contradiction that fixtures were taken from premises of owner without his knowledge or consent and were afterwards found installed in another house, is sufficient to establish corpus delicti on a charge of burglary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 95.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1172(2) — APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

Although it is the province of the court to determine whether a confession should be received in evidence, an instruction that jury should disregard confession if not voluntarily made is without prejudice to one indicted for burglary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3155.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1172(2) — APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

Conceding that there was no occasion for the instruction and no evidence showing that accused had stolen property in his possession, an instruction with reference to possession by defendant of stolen property unexplained and the effect of such proof held without prejudice to defendant charged with burglary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3155.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

George Sweetman was convicted of burglary, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

For opinion in Supreme Court denying rehearing, see 164 Pac. 628.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, and S. M. Johnstone, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of burglary, appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The subject of the larceny was certain plumbing fixtures, consisting of two laundry tubs and a kitchen sink, which had been installed in a house at No. 1211 North Mariposa street, in the city of Los Angeles, which was owned by the prosecuting witness. The evidence, exclusive of a confession made by defendant, without contradiction shows that the tubs, which were installed upon an uninclosed porch of the house, and the sink installed in the kitchen, the door of which was locked, were, without the owner's knowledge or consent, by some person unknown to him, taken and removed therefrom between 4:30 o'clock p. m. on June 21st and 8 o'clock a. m. the next day. The tubs were found installed in a house located at No. 803 North Wilcox avenue, in the city, the contract for the installation of plumbing fixtures in which had been let to defendant. This evidence was amply sufficient to show the commission of the crime (People v. Wagner, 29 Cal. App. 363, 155 Pac. 649); hence there is no ground for appellant's contention that the court erred in admitting evidence of his confession for the reason that the corpus delicti was not established.

Neither does any ground exist for the suggestion that the confession of defendant was procured by promise of reward or immunity. On the contrary, the evidence conclusively shows that defendant freely and voluntarily, and without menace, duress, or promise of any kind, made and subscribed a written confession wherein he stated that he entered the house at about 8 o'clock p. m. and took therefrom the tubs and sink, which he installed in the other house.

[2] The court instructed the jury:

> "That before an admission or confession of a defendant can be used against him as evidence it must appear that the statement was made voluntarily, and not under duress, menace, the hope of reward or the fear of punishment. If you find from the evidence that the confession admitted in evidence was made under the promise of reward, or menace, duress, or the fear of punishment, then you must disregard the confession entirely, and unless you find from the evidence, after disregarding the confession, that the defendant committed the offense charged against him, it will be your duty to acquit."

As an abstract proposition of law, the first sentence of the instruction is correct, but it is the province of the court, not the jury, to determine whether or not a confession offered in evidence should be received or rejected. People v. Cahill, 11 Cal. App. 685, 106 Pac. 115; People v. Gibson, 28 Cal. App. 334, 152 Pac. 316; People v. Barker, 60 Mich. 277, 27 N. W. 539, 1 Am. St. Rep. 501. Hence it was error to submit to the jury the question as to whether or not the confession was obtained by promise of reward, menace, or duress, and to submit to the jurors the question as to whether or not it should have been admitted in evidence; for, if not voluntarily made, as determined by the court, it was inadmissible. Conceding the instruction to have been erroneous, in no event could it have prejudiced defendant in his substantial rights. On the contrary, the jury might have overruled the court by finding that the confession was extorted from defendant by unfair means, and in such case, following the instruction of the court, disregarded it entirely, and acquitted defendant for want of sufficient evidence.

[3] Complaint is also made that the court instructed the jury with reference to the possession by defendant of stolen property, unexplained, and the effect of such proof; the objection to this instruction being that there was no evidence showing that defendant had the stolen property in his possession. If it were conceded there was no occasion for giving the instruction, and that there was no evidence tending to show that defendant had the property in his possession, yet the giving of it could not be prejudicial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SWEETMAN. (Cr. 2075.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 2, 1917.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

For opinion, see 164 Pac. 627.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People. Wm. M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, and S. M. Johnstone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District we deem it proper to say that our opinion is not to be taken as an approval of that portion of the opinion which holds that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury relative to the confession of the defendant. See People v. Thomson, 145 Cal. 717, 725, 79 Pac. 435; People v. Luis, 158 Cal. 196, 110 Pac. 580; People v. Profumo, 23 Cal. App. 378, 138 Pac. 109. The District Court of Appeal was undoubtedly correct, however, in holding that, assuming the instruction to have been erroneous in the respect referred to, the error was not prejudicial.

DEL MONTE RANCH DAIRY v. BERNARDO. (S. F. 6904.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—FINDINGS OF COURT — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — REVIEW.

Findings of the trial court, based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. SALES 🔑52(5)—FINDINGS OF COURT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to recover for breach of contract to deliver milk, in which defendant filed a counterclaim for milk delivered, evidence held to sustain a court finding that defendant sold to plaintiff 320 gallons per day for 13 days at 16 cents per gallon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 136, 137, 139.]

3. PLEADING 🔑142—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING TO SUPPORT FINDINGS AND JUDGMENT.

Complaint having been filed in July, an averment in counterclaim, filed in December, that milk was furnished within two years last past, together with evidence that transaction occurred in June of the same year, is sufficient as a basis for judgment that plaintiff is indebted to defendant for milk, as against objection that answer failed to state that counterclaim was existing at commencement of action, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2, where there was no demurrer to answer, and evidence of delivery and price came from plaintiff's witness without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 290, 291, 297, 300.]

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1056(4)—Exclusion of Evidence—Harmless Error.

Where court found against plaintiff on the contract set up, exclusion of evidence as to measure of damages for breach was without prejudice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4190.]

5. Witnesses 🔑275(2)—Cross-Examination of Party—Scope—Assignment of Cause of Action.

Where defendant in his counterclaim relied upon a claim for goods sold, refusal to allow plaintiff to show, on cross-examination of defendant, that claim had been assigned, is reversible error.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Del Monte Ranch Dairy, a corporation, against J. S. Bernardo, in which defendant filed a counterclaim. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying its motion for a new trial on bill of exceptions, plaintiff appeals, which appeal was ordered to be heard by this court after judgment of the District Court of Appeal. Judgment and order denying new trial reversed as to counterclaim, and affirmed in all other respects, and remanded, with directions.

Robert P. Troy, of San Francisco, for appellant. Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The appeal was ordered to be heard by this court after judgment in favor of the defendant by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District. Upon considering the points made by the petioner, we have adopted the following portion of the opinion:

"Plaintiff charges in its complaint that defendant, on or about April 4, 1910, entered into a contract with plaintiff whereby he 'agreed to furnish to said plaintiff, in the city and county of San Francisco, 360 gallons of pure milk on each and every day of the year immediately following said 4th day of April, 1910'; that, in accordance with said contract, defendant furnished plaintiff with 320 gallons of pure milk for a period of 69 days, commencing on the 4th day of April, 1910, and ending on the 12th day of June, 1910, and that ever since said last-named date defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to deliver any milk to plaintiff, though frequently called upon so to do; that plaintiff has performed its part of said agreement; that plaintiff is engaged in the business of selling and delivering milk at retail in said city and county, and by reason of the said failure of defendant has been unable to supply its customers with milk, and 'has suffered loss to the extent of $5,000, which said sum is due and owing and unpaid from defendant.' A general demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered the complaint, denying 'generally and specially all and singular each and every allegation therein contained,' and for a 'further and separate defense and counterclaim' alleged that within two years last past plaintiff became indebted to defendant in the sum of $669.76 'for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to said plaintiff by said defendant, at said plaintiff's special instance and request, for which said goods said plaintiff agreed to pay said defendant the said sum of $669.76; that, though demand therefor has been made, said plaintiff has refused, failed and neglected to pay said amount to defendant, and the whole thereof is now due, owing, and unpaid to defendant.' Defendant prays judgment for said amount.

"The cause was tried by the court without a jury. The court found as facts: 'That it is not true that defendant entered into the contract as alleged in the complaint; that it is not true that plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,000, or any other sum, by reason of any failure of defendant to furnish plaintiff with milk; that plaintiff is indebted to defendant in the sum of $669.76 for milk sold and delivered to plaintiff, at plaintiff's special instance and request, between the 1st day of June, 1910, and the 15th day of June 1910'; that said sum of $669.76 has not been paid, and the whole thereof is now due, owing, and unpaid 'from defendant to plaintiff' (sic). As conclusion of law the court found that defendant is entitled to judgment against plaintiff for the sum of $669.76 and his costs of suit. Judgment was accordingly entered. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial on bill of exceptions.

[1] "Upon the question of the existence of the contract as alleged in the complaint, the evidence is conflicting. There was evidence sustaining the finding, which, under the familiar rule, we are not at liberty to disturb. There was evidence that the parties entered into an oral agreement by which defendant was to furnish plaintiff with milk to June 1, 1910, at an agreed price, and that all milk delivered to that date had been paid for. There was evidence that after June 1st the price was to be the going market value, but that the agreement was temporary, and for no stated period. Witness Kelly, secretary of plaintiff corporation, testified, 'Mr. Bernardo was supplying that milk at 16 cents per gallon after the 1st of June;' and again, 'I received 32 tanks of 10 gallons of milk each during the time we received milk from Mr. Bernardo; we received these 32 tanks up to the 13th or 14th of June.' Elsewhere he testified, 'Mr. Bernardo sent his last consignment of milk to us on the 13th of June.' The complaint alleges that defendant delivered milk for 69 days from April 4, 1910, which would imply delivery in June to nearly the 13th day.

[2] "Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that plaintiff is indebted to defendant in the sum of $669.76 for milk sold and delivered by defendant to plaintiff. The evidence might, and perhaps should, have been more specific; but such as it was went to the court uncontradicted, and was, we think, sufficient to establish a sale to defendant of 320 gallons of milk per day, at the rate of 16 cents per gallon, for 13 days—the last consignment being on June 13th, amounting in all, as we figure it, to $665.60, instead of $669.76.

[3] "Appellant makes the point that the averments in the answer fail to state that the counterclaim was 'existing at the commencement of the action,' as required by subdivision 2, section 438, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The averment was that the milk was furnished within two years last past. The complaint was filed July 11, 1910, and the answer December 19, 1910, and the evidence was that the transaction occurred in June, 1910. There was no demurrer to the answer, and the evidence as to the delivery of the milk and the price to be paid came from plaintiff's witness without objection. Whether viewed strictly as a counterclaim, or as a common count by way of answer alone, as plaintiff claims it is, we think, under the circumstances shown, it was sufficient as a basis for the finding and judgment.

"Appellant makes the further point that the findings are contradictory; the last finding having stated that the amount 'is now due, owing and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff.' The findings show very clearly that this is a mere clerical error. * * *

[4] "Appellant reserved exceptions to a large number of rulings on the admission or refusal to admit certain testimony. Substantially all these rulings related to the measure of damages, and had reference to plaintiff's claim for damages arising out of defendant's breach of the alleged contract. The court found against plaintiff on the contract set out in the complaint. The question, therefore, as to the true measure of damages, had the contract as alleged been established, became immaterial. No such contract having been entered into, as the court found, there were no damages to be measured. * * *"

[5] It is claimed by the plaintiff that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in rejecting its offer to prove that the defendant had assigned the claim constituting the counterclaim to one D. A. Curtin, who, subsequent to the commencement of this action, had sued the plaintiff for the amount thereof. It was because of this matter that the order of transfer was made. The defendant appeared as a witness in his own behalf and gave testimony tending to establish his counterclaim. On cross-examination, the plaintiff propounded several questions seeking to elicit that the assignment had been made to Curtin, to which the objection that it was not proper cross-examination was, in each instance, sustained. The offer of plaintiff was thus stated:

> "I offer to prove that * * * this witness sold and assigned and transferred a claim against the plaintiff in this action to Mr. Curtin, and that this witness is now attempting to recover in this action as a counterclaim against the plaintiff the very claim that under the oath of Mr. Curtin it appears was sold to Mr. Curtin."

The refusal to allow this line of proof was clearly error, for it was proper, in response to the testimony of the defendant tending to establish his counterclaim, to cross-examine him as to whether he had parted with the claim. The inquiry was material to the issues and proper cross-examination. The assignment was referred to during the trial, and, touching the identity of the counterclaim with the claim sued upon by Curtin, this occurred between the court and counsel for defendant:

> "The Court: You admit that the claim is the same?
> "Counsel: Yes; it is an assignment which we will offer in evidence later."

But the assignment was not offered in evidence, and, as we have seen, the plaintiff was not permitted to elicit proof concerning it. The record plainly shows that enough was elicited by one statement of defendant, and the admissions of his counsel, to indicate that an assignment of the claim had in fact been made by the defendant to Curtin. It is true that in the same connection defendant said substantially that the assignment was only for purposes of collection; but if it was absolute in terms, was in fact an absolute assignment, even though the unexpressed purpose was to obtain collection, it of course transferred the claim, and left defendant without any right of action thereon against plaintiff. Clearly, therefore, the plaintiff should have been permitted to show all the facts in this connection, as it endeavored to do. It must be kept in mind, too, that Curtin had commenced an action against plaintiff on this very claim, and that such action was pending, and was in fact being tried at the same time before the same judge, and with a stipulation that the evidence in one case might be considered as evidence in the other. But it is not shown that the cases were actually consolidated. Nor does it appear in the record what disposition was made of the Curtin case by the lower court, or what, if anything, has since become of that case. It seems clear that, if the evidence actually introduced sufficiently showed an absolute assignment, the finding of indebtedness to defendant is not sustained by the evidence, and that, if it does not show such an assignment, the court erred to the substantial prejudice of plaintiff in refusing to allow the showing in that behalf attempted to be made. In either event there must be a reversal as to the alleged counterclaim. It is conceivable that on a new trial such a state of facts may be developed as will warrant a recovery by defendant; but as to that, of course, we cannot now express any opinion.

The judgment is reversed, as is the order denying a motion for a new trial, in so far as the issues made in regard to the counterclaim are concerned. In all other respects the order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court, after all issues regarding the counterclaim are determined, to enter judgment in favor of defendant on the cause of action set up in the complaint, upon the findings already made in regard thereto, and such judgment in regard to the matters set up in defendant's counterclaim as it may conclude to be proper in view of the showing made on the new trial.

O'BRIEN v. KING. (S. F. 7811.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1917. Rehearing Denied May 7, 1917.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑24(1)—STATUTE APPLICABLE—"FOUNDED ON INSTRUMENT IN WRITING."

A cause of action is "founded on an instrument in writing," within Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, limiting such actions to four years, when the contract, obligation, or liability grows out of written instruments, not remotely or ultimately, but immediately.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 112, 115, 117.]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑25(6)—INSTRUMENT IN WRITING.

An instrument reading, "Received from [plaintiff] * * * $450 in U. S. gold coin, at 5 per cent. interest," signed by defendant, is an instrument in writing, barred only after four years, under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 123.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—SCOPE OF REVIEW—FACT FINDINGS.

The trial court's findings of fact, on which the evidence is in sharp and substantial conflict, will not be disturbed.

4. WITNESSES 🔑275(5)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE—LIMITATIONS.

Where defendant, on direct examination, went into certain matters, allowing cross-examination relating to the same matters did not show abuse of discretion, merely because defendant was thereby confused.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Hannah O'Brien against Jeremiah King. Judgment for plaintiff, with order denying new trial, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; MELVIN, J., dissenting.

F. J. Kierce, of San Francisco (Walter Christie, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The appeals in this case were originally taken to the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District. There the judgment of the trial court, and its order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, were affirmed, on grounds stated in an opinion prepared by Richards, J. One of the questions discussed was the validity of the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. There being some doubt in our minds regarding this point, an order was made transferring the cause to this court for hearing. Upon further examination, we are convinced that the District Court of Appeal made proper disposition of the appeals. While agreeing with all the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice Richards, we have thought it well to treat the point of the statute of limitations somewhat more fully than he did. With respect to all other subjects the following statement and discussion is taken almost verbatim from the opinion filed in the District Court of Appeal:

In this action the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for the sum of $450, with interest and costs. The facts of the case, as shown in the plaintiff's proof and as briefly found by the court, are these:

The plaintiff is an unlettered working woman, who had saved up about $900 by working out. The defendant and one Cain Foley, the plaintiff's son-in-law, were desirous of becoming partners in the saloon business, but had no money. They went to the plaintiff, and persuaded her to let them have $900 with which to buy a saloon. She had the money in cash, and, dividing it into two piles of $450 each, delivered one of these to the defendant and the other to Cain Foley, taking from each a separate writing which they prepared in the following form:

> "San Fran., June 21st, '11.
> "Received from Miss Hannah O'Brien, on June 21st, 1911, $450 (four hundred and fifty dollars) in U. S. gold coin, at 5 per cent. interest.
> "[Signed] Jeremiah King,
> "987 Folsom St., San Fran."

The saloon was purchased, but its operation was not a financial success, and the plaintiff, as she testified and as the court found, was not repaid her money. Thereupon she brought suit against the defendant for the sum of $900. To her first complaint the defendant demurred, both generally and specifically, alleging a number of grounds of uncertainty, most, if not all, of which were good, and which demurrer the court sustained. The plaintiff then filed an amended complaint in three counts, which plunged the nature of the transaction between the parties into still profounder depths of uncertainty than before. The first two counts of this amended complaint were on motion stricken out by the court, which overruled a demurrer to the third count, although the latter was, if anything, more obscure as to the nature of the transaction than the former complaint or the counts which were stricken out of the amended complaint had been. The defendant then answered, and pleaded the bar of the statute of limitations. The case went to trial upon the issues as thus imperfectly framed, and the plaintiff and her witnesses testified in substance to the facts of the transaction as above set forth.

At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which the court refused to grant, a ruling which the defendant now asserts to be one of his grounds of error. Thereupon the plaintiff asked leave of the court to file a further amended complaint to make her pleading correspond with her proofs. The court granted this motion, and this the appellant also asserts was error. After some further testimony was taken the cause was submitted for decision, and the court presently filed its findings and judgment in plaintiff's favor, and also expressly found that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations.

The first of the appellant's contentions is that his motion for nonsuit should have been granted. This motion was made by the appellant for the reason and upon the theory that, as he says, the action as originally outlined in the plaintiff's first complaint, and as more dubiously shadowed forth in the third count of her first amended complaint, was an action to recover against one of two partners and upon a partnership liability; whereas, the proofs proffered by the plaintiff went to show an individual liability upon the defendant's part. It must be admitted that the plaintiff's pleadings in this regard are pervaded with a degree of vagueness which would have rendered them properly subject to a demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty; but, notwithstanding this, we think that the original complaint and the third count of the first amended complaint do dimly foreshadow the idea that the obligation and liability of the defendant was an individual rather than a partnership one. This being so, we think the court was justified in denying the defendant's motion for nonsuit, and also in permitting the plaintiff to make her proofs and pleadings correspond through the filing at the trial of her second amended complaint. And, for the reasons above set forth, we are also of the opinion that the plaintiff's second amended complaint was not subject to the objection that it set forth a new and different cause of action.

[1] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in not finding in his favor upon his plea of the statute of limitations. The loan was made on June 21, 1911. The action was begun on December 20, 1913, more than two years after the accrual of the cause of action. The question is whether the action was brought upon a "contract, obligation or liability founded upon an instrument in writing executed within this state." If it was, the period of limitation was four years (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1), and the action was not barred. If it did not fall within this description, the period was two years (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1), and the plea of the statute should have been upheld. A cause of action is "founded upon an instrument of writing" when the contract, obligation, or liability grows "out of written instruments, not remotely or ultimately, but immediately." Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 130, 137; Ashley v. Vischer, 24 Cal. 322, 85 Am. Dec. 65; Louvall v. Gridley, 70 Cal. 507, 11 Pac. 777; Lattin v. Gillette, 95 Cal. 317, 30 Pac. 545, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115; McCarthy v. M. T. L. & W. Co., 111 Cal. 328, 43 Pac. 956; Thomas v. Pac. Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899; Scrivner v. Woodward, 139 Cal. 314, 73 Pac. 863. "A cause of action is not upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing, within the meaning of the Code, merely because it is in some way remotely or indirectly connected with such an instrument, or because the instrument would be a link in the chain of evidence establishing the cause of action. In order to be founded upon an instrument in writing, the instrument must, itself, contain a contract to do the thing for the nonperformance of which the action is brought." McCarthy v. M. T. L. & W. Co., supra.

In Ashley v. Vischer, supra, there were two papers signed by the defendant. Action on one was held to be covered by the two-year statute, while the other fell under the statutory provision subsequently carried into subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first instrument read as follows:

> "Received of John Morrison, Esq., the sum of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. San Francisco, February 24, 1855.
> "($2,750.) Edward Vischer."

The holding was that this was a mere receipt for the amount of money specified, and that it neither expressed nor imported any obligation to pay. It was pointed out that "the presumption of law is that money, when paid, is in liquidation of an antecedent debt."

[2] The writing in the present case is more than the mere receipt embodied in the first paper under consideration in Ashley v. Vischer. It reads:

> "Received from Miss Hannah O'Brien, on June 21st, 1911, $450 (four hundred and fifty dollars) in U. S. gold coin, at 5 per cent. interest."

The words "at 5 per cent. interest" import into the writing an additional and significant element. The paper is not a mere declaration that money has been received by the defendant from the plaintiff. It embodies the statement that it has been received at a given rate of interest. The reasonable—indeed, the only reasonable—meaning of these words is that the money was received as a loan at the specified interest rate. A loan being established by the writing, a promise to repay is implied by necessary inference of law and fact. Such promise is embodied in the language of the writing, although not expressed in the words "I promise to pay."

It is generally held, in states having statutes similar to our own, that under similar facts the action is covered by the period of limitation applicable to suits founded upon written instruments. Thus, in Indiana, it has been held that an instrument reading: "Received of L. $1,600, on deposit, in national currency. [Signed] S. Bros."—is a written contract for the payment of money, and that the statutory limitation for actions on such contracts was applicable. Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 94, 6 N. E. 123, 7 N. E. 763, 57 Am. Rep. 87; De Vay v. Dunlap, 7 Ind. App. 690, 35 N. E. 195. The holding was likewise where the instrument read as follows: "Received of H. Doane for Samuel A. Reyburn, one hundred and eighty dollars. * * * [Signed] J. H. Casey." Reyburn v. Casey, 29 Mo. 129. "The broad and comprehensive language of the statute evidently embraces all kinds of written instruments, without regard to their mere form or phraseology, which imply a promise or agreement to pay money, and is not restricted to such as have the requisites of promissory notes, or to such instruments as contain an express promise or agreement upon their face to pay. It is sufficient if the words import a promise or agreement, or that this can be inferred from the terms employed." The theory of these cases was that the paper, in each instance, acknowledged the existence of facts necessarily and directly importing the obligation which was made the basis of suit, and this was held to be sufficient. See, also, Sannickson v. Brown, 5 Cal. 57; Ashley v. Vischer, supra.

None of the cases decided in this state, and cited above, will be found to conflict with this view. They all had to do with writings which did not, in and of themselves, express the obligation sued upon, or a state of facts from which such obligation necessarily and directly flowed. In each instance the obligation could be established only by evidence of facts and occurrences outside of those appearing on the face of the instrument. A situation of this kind was in the mind of the court when it said, in Scrivner v. Woodward, supra, that "promises merely implied by law, and not supported by any express promise or stipulation in the written instrument, do not fall within the provision of section 337, relating to contracts in writing," and that any language to the contrary in Ashley v. Vischer, supra, employed in discussing the second paper there involved, must be disregarded as in conflict with later decisions. We adhere to the declaration that promises "merely implied by law" from a situation evidenced by a writing—i. e., quasi contracts—are not within the statutory provision under discussion. The promise must be one arising directly from the writing itself, and included in its terms. But in determining whether the obligation is "supported by an express promise or stipulation in the written instrument," we must regard, as included in the terms of the writing, all obligations and promises which its words necessarily import. The distinction which we have tried to point out is well stated in Long v. Straus, supra, where the court, upon rehearing, discussed the question exhaustively. The following language from the opinion in that case is in point here:

> "Where there is an express contract there can be no implied one. An express written contract contains the only competent evidence of the agreement of the parties. There is here an express written contract, and therefore there is no implied one. But this written contract is to be given legal effect, and to give it effect the courts must consider it as embodying all the legal obligations implied from its language. These obligations, we repeat, are part of the written contract. The law imported into the contract does not create an independent agreement, but makes the instrument express the full agreement of the parties. * * * All contracts have imported into them legal principles which can no more be varied by parol evidence than the strongest and clearest express stipulations. * * * The authorities all agree that the regular indorsement of a promissory note is as perfect a contract as though the liability which the law implies were written out in full. * * * Into the contract before us the law enters and makes it an agreement to repay the money received on deposit. * * * Our conclusion reaches further than that there is an implied promise to pay the depositor his money, for it goes to the extent of affirming that this promise is created by law as an element of the contract, and as such enters into and forms part of the written agreement. We do not regard the promise as an independent one, existing outside of the written contract, but as a promise forming one of the terms of the contract."

[3] The appellant further contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and the judgment of the court. The defendant in his answer to the second amended complaint admits the original indebtedness, and relies upon two defenses—the plea of payment, and the statute of limitations; and as to the first of these the evidence of the parties is in sharp and substantial conflict, and we shall not, for that reason, disturb the findings of the court.

[4] The appellant finally urges that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff's counsel to cross-examine the defendant at great length and with much iteration upon certain immaterial matters which were very prejudicial to him and to his case; but an inspection of the record discloses that this portion of the defendant's cross-examination relates to the existence or nonexistence of certain facts which the defendant had himself put forward in support of his plea of payment of his loan. We think that the court did not abuse its discretion in extending the scope of this inquiry, and that the mere fact that the defendant was unable to extricate himself therefrom with credit would not of itself warrant a reversal of the case.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RINDGE et al. (L. A. 3752.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1917.)

1. HIGHWAYS 🔑5—PUBLIC ROADS—PUBLIC USE.

A landowner's use of a beach road within the confines of defendant's property for the purpose of reaching his premises does not establish the beach road's character as a public road any more than his use of a private way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 6, 7.]

2. DEDICATION ⟹20(5)—WHAT CONSTITUTES —USER OF HIGHWAY.

Where one owning a strip of land along a beach allowed property owners in the vicinity to use the beach as a road according to a custom of the country, there was no dedication of a highway.

3. HIGHWAYS ⟹17 — ESTABLISHMENT — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to abate an alleged nuisance maintained by defendants upon and across a public highway, evidence held to warrant findings that no such highway had been established.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against May K. Rindge and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, Edward F. Wehrle, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., Hartley Shaw, Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., George E. Cryer, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to abate alleged nuisances maintained by defendants upon and across a public highway in the county of Los Angeles. The nuisances were gates and fences. The purpose of the litigation is to obtain a decree declaring that a public highway exists through the Malibu ranch along the shore of the Pacific Ocean. The Malibu ranch is about 22 miles long and contains about 13,000 acres. Thus it is quite narrow, varying in width from 1½ miles to 2½ miles. Its length is easterly and westerly. Its southern front is bounded and washed by the waters of the Pacific Ocean. The inland boundary line extends along the southerly slope of a rugged, inhospitable mountain chain, cut by deep ravines and canyons. At the foot of these mountains is a stretch of country narrow and comparatively level and known as mesa lands. The "shore of the Pacific" along which it is declared this highway extends is a shore characteristic of many hundreds of miles of California's littoral. Nearest to the ocean is a gradually sloping sandy beach between the lines of high and low tide. At low tide this beach is uncovered and the sand wet and compacted affords a firm passageway for footmen and vehicles. Above this is a stretch of loose shifting sand, washed and blown above the line of ordinary high tide. This sand is dry, and passage over it, though possible, is difficult. The footman sinks to his ankles, the horse to his fetlocks, the vehicle which he is dragging half way or more to the hubs. Beyond this loose sand is a bluff varying in height from 30, 60, to 100 feet. Eroded from this bluff and lying at the foot of it is the talus. This bluff marks the seaward end of the comparatively level mesa lands of which we have spoken. These mesa lands in turn are channeled by ravines or arroyos, in winter carrying the mountain waters down the gulches to the ocean. In summer they are dry. Their banks usually are quite precipitous. The beach, of course, is likewise pierced in places by these short mountain streams, although in summer when these streams are not flowing the ocean frequently restores the sand washed away by the winter torrents. Still further the beach is broken by small promontories and rocky headlands jutting out into the ocean and by rocky outcrops here and there along its line. As is well known to any one at all conversant with the primitive life of California, these beaches afforded the customary routes of travel up and down the coast. They were smooth and level, as compared with the mesa lands, which were cut by numerous gullies, difficult of descent and equally difficult of ascent. Thus travel sought the beach and followed along the line of the hard sand uncovered by the ebbing tide. As a promontory was approached the traveler was compelled to leave the beach, climb to the mesa uplands, cross the promontory, descending to the beach on the further side. Where the winter rains converted the arroyos into torrential streams progress was impossible. When the rising tide covered the hard beach the traveler was compelled to make his laborious way through the soft sands above, or, as was usually the practice, he interrupted his journey and remained where he was until the tide had again ebbed. Little or no construction work was ever done upon these roads, if roads they could be called. The traveler, usually on horseback, when it became necessary to leave the beach, sought the least precipitous place in the bluffs up which he rode or led his horse. Where this was impossible, the earth bank of the bluff was graded down.

Such are the general characteristics of many such ancient shoreways along the Pacific Ocean; such were the general characteristics of this ancient way. In those early days the principal towns or pueblos to the north and west of that of Los Angeles were San Buena Ventura, in Ventura county, and Santa Barbara, in the county bearing the same name. Both of these counties, like the county of Los Angeles, are coast counties. There were several routes of travel between Los Angeles and these northerly pueblos through the mountain passes, in addition to the shore route just described. This shore route, beginning at a settlement on the ocean near the mouth of Santa Monica canyon ran about five miles through another grant, Boca de Santa Monica; then entered upon the Malibu grant, ran along its coast line, and a mile or two beyond it to a gulch known as Yerba Buena or Little Sycamore canyon, when it struck inland up this gulch and over the mountains and so to the towns in Ventura county. Travel over the whole of this route was possible only to the footman or to the horseman. Wheeled vehicles could not be dragged over it, and indeed there were in those early days but few wheeled vehicles, carretas, clumsy carts with solid wooden wheels, drawn by oxen.

The Malibu ranch was a Spanish grant, patent to which was issued to Matthew Keller in August, 1872. It was, as the foregoing description of its character at once makes plain, a stock range for the pasturing of sheep or cattle, and for this purpose it was used. Some of the surrounding lands were also Spanish or Mexican grants, but to the north of the Malibu was an unsurveyed strip of government land. In some of the upper reaches of the streams leading through the Malibu were small tracts of government land fitted for agriculture, and these were taken possession of by settlers. In the streams were trout, in the valleys quail, in the hills deer, and the country was therefore attractive to the fisherman and hunter. All of these people entering the ranch traveled, as it was necessary for them to travel, along the shoreway above described, until, reaching the gulch or canyon which they desired to ascend, they left the beach and struck inland. At the time when Matthew Keller received his patent and for some time thereafter the only persons actually living on the Malibu ranch were Matthew Keller and his family, with his overseer and vaqueros looking after his stock. Their home was in the Malibu canyon, off from the line of the beach road, which they themselves used in reaching their home. The Malibu canyon was about two miles westerly from the easterly boundary of the ranch. Further to the westward and about three miles from the western boundary of the ranch is Lechuza canyon. In this canyon lived the Tapias family in their adobe home. The Tapias were Spanish. They claimed ownership to a part of the Malibu ranch, and were there living under their assertion of right. Neither they nor their visitors were apparently interfered with by Matthew Keller. From Lechuza canyon eastward to Santa Monica it was possible to drag a carreta, and it had been done from time to time by the Tapias. They left the ranch in 1876. Nor did Matthew Keller's successors interfere with the settlers who used the beach road until they came to their selected canyons, either in their use of the beach road or of the primitive private trails or rough roads which they constructed to reach their locations. Very few of them made a pretense of residing on their selected lands. Nor did he interfere with the travel along this beach road which sought to traverse the ranch en route to Ventura county. He did, however, interfere with and restrict the use of the ranch, and, to a certain extent, of the road, to fishermen, hunters, and campers, and this because in many instances they killed his cattle, in others they made their camps near the springs which the cattle frequented for water, and so drove them away, and, finally, they occasioned not infrequent and destructive fires. The entry of the settlers came after Matthew Keller's death in 1881.

We have thus fairly epitomized the conditions existing when in 1875 Matthew Keller filed a petition with the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county offering to dedicate a public highway over his lands. This offer, upon which great reliance is placed by respondents, demands, therefore, somewhat detailed consideration. In November, 1875, a petition was filed by Matthew Keller purporting to come from the owners of the lands along the route of the proposed highway, asking the supervisors "to lay out a public road along the beach fronting on said ranchos, being the only possible way said ranchos can be approached. Said projected road runs for the greater part along the beach of the Pacific Ocean, but at intervals is found impassable by reason of projecting points and rocks that make said highway impassable at high water. The necessity for such a road for the convenience of public travel will be quite obvious to any one authorized to view the same, as well as the nature of the improvements to be made." By way of description the petition set forth that "from the city of Santa Monica the road is a natural road along the beach for a distance of about six miles. The first obstruction to travel commences at the point of an arched rock, within half a mile of the canyon, called Topanga, fronting on the Santa Monica ranch. The other obstructions to the public travel for wagons are found at intervals only between the aforesaid arched rock and the range line between 17 and 18 west township," etc. (this range line runs a little to the west of Malibu canyon where was Mr. Keller's home), a distance of about six miles in length. "This road will connect the city of Santa Monica with an immense body of agricultural and horticultural lands, partly government land, for a distance of twenty miles along the beach, and to fishing grounds of great value to the community. The probable cost is about $300." This proposed road, as shown by its description, was merely the old beach road which we have described. Viewers were appointed and their report followed. It declared that the road from Santa Monica for a portion of the distance westerly was in good condition. It followed the beach. Certain obstructions were then noted, the necessity in one case of grading from the beach to the mesa lands, in another for blasting out obstructing rock in the line of the beach proper. Arriving at the Malibu ranch, the viewers declare that there are two places along the beach between the easterly line of the ranch and Malibu lake (at the mouth of Malibu canyon) that need improvement, "and then the passage along the beach from Santa Monica City will be open to travel for a distance of 25 miles, opening thereby a scope of country fit for settlement to the amount of over 4,000 acres. We estimated the whole cost of improvement at $650 in all so as to make the road passable in all seasons of the year." The report then recommended the adoption of the petition and the immediate improvement of the road as suggested. The field notes accompanying this report showed, as does the report itself, that the doing of no work was contemplated west of Malibu lake. The field notes were carried no further than Malibu lake and concluded, after fixing the easterly line of Malibu ranch, with "and following the beach to the lake in said rancho." The bond accompanying the Keller petition and executed by Keller was conditioned on "the opening of a road from Santa Monica to the rancho Topanga Malibu."

There is one conspicuous infirmity in the Keller petition which impairs its legal effect as an offer of dedication, and that is that his offer contemplates a road from Santa Monica westward to (or through) his ranch. But in fact he did not own the land between the easterly line of his ranch and the town of Santa Monica, and had no authority to offer a right of way as and for a public highway over those lands. Nor yet did the owners of those lands ever join in his petition. But let it be assumed that the offer at least was an expression of willingness and desire upon the part of Matthew Keller to dedicate a public road or highway across his whole ranch; the question remains: What resulted from this? It appears from the report of the viewers that they contemplated only the construction of a way from Santa Monica to Malibu canyon; that this way was to follow the beach, saving in one place where it was necessary to leave it to cross a headland. The projecting rocks in the beach sands were to be blasted out. The talus in some places was to be graded. Something of this work was to be done within the boundaries of the Malibu ranch to the west of Malibu canyon. The major portion of it was to be done to the westward of Malibu ranch. Keller was interested in securing a road on his ranch at least up to Malibu canyon, where the ranch buildings were situated. But nevertheless it is fairly deducible, and the court originally found, that Keller's offer contemplated a beach highway through his ranch, his petition, it will be noted, setting forth the "obstructions to the public travel for wagons," and declared that such obstructions existed only between Santa Monica and Malibu lake. At this time, however, there were no settlers whose rights call for consideration. The entries which they later made upon the public domain did not begin until 1882–1885, after Keller's death. Nor does it appear that the viewers' report was ever adopted, or that there was ever any formal acceptance of the Keller offer, and the situation thus presented is and can only be that which respondent adopts, namely, that the "offer of dedication contained in the Keller petition was of a road already in existence, used and traveled throughout the entire length of the ranch." Under this view respondent contends that the petition should be regarded rather as one for the improvement of an existing road than as an offer to dedicate a new road.

This elimination of the Keller offer from the consideration of the case leaves it for present purposes as though that offer had not been made; that is to say, we are brought back to a contemplation of the question as to whether or not, within the meaning of our law, there was at the time of Keller's offer, or thereafter, a public highway across the Malibu ranch.

Under the findings which the court originally made and the judgment which it first gave, the existence of such a highway was declared and decreed, the court basing its conclusions, in part at least, upon the fact that this route was a recognized mode of access to the settlements in Ventura and the other northern counties. Upon motion for a new trial the court's views suffered a modification in that it granted the motion as to the existence or nonexistence of such a highway from the westerly line of Malibu to Lechuza canyon, where the Tapias formerly resided. It denied the motion as to the remainder of the asserted highway, and from its order this appeal is taken.

Matthew Keller, as has been said, died in 1881. In 1874 Louis Sentous was on the ranch as foreman and overseer. In the following year he leased the ranch, and he and his brother remained as tenants for 17 years. There were no settlers upon the government land to the north and west of the ranch until after Matthew Keller's death. This is conceded. The Tapias had departed, and, aside from the occasional traveler who passed along the beach and through the rough trail over the Ventura mountains, travel on the beach road there was none, saving that which pertained to the operations of the ranch and the activities of hunters and fishermen, who were, of course, either licensees or trespassers, with rare visits from peace officers in pursuit of offenders against the law. Moreover, no change was made in the road. No public improvements of any kind were constructed. Whatever may have been done to facilitate access to the ranch houses in Malibu canyon was done by the owner and his tenants, Louis Sentous, testifying as to road conditions west of Malibu canyon as late as 1879, when he as tenant controlled the ranch, tells that he was assisting in establishing windmills which he had ordered at certain places on the ranch. He says:

> "From Malibu canyon and Ramirez canyon [some six or seven miles westward from Malibu canyon] we traveled on the beach, and at Ramirez canyon the vaqueros assisted with their lariats in pulling the wagon up the bluff. There was a trail on the mesa which we followed wherever we could, but at places it was too steep to follow. A man went ahead on horseback and picked the way for us. This is the first and last trip I ever made with a wagon beyond Malibu canyon. Before that time I had never seen a wagon traveling beyond that canyon, but I have seen them since. During those early years I did not see any travelers on the ranch. We gave strict orders not to allow any one to go through there without permission either from Mr. Keller or ourselves. I know the order was carried out. Those orders were given a few years after I rented the ranch upon receiving information that some cattle had been shot by hunters."

In 1882 Guthrie and Harris, coming over the Ventura mountains, located on government land west of the Malibu. In 1884, three years after Matthew Keller's death, they drove a wagon across this beach road from Santa Monica, and thereafter went back and forth on several and perhaps numerous occasions. While Keller was alive his tenant, Sentous, asked him if he might prevent strangers from going onto the ranch, and was told that he could do so. He asked because he had heard something about a county road, but "Keller told me that nothing had been done in the way of an agreement between himself and the county. I told him I was going to stop people passing through, and he said that I might do so."

Neither during the period of the Sentous tenancy nor thereafter, when the title to the ranch passed by purchase to Mr. Rindge, whose widow is the defendant in this action, was there any interference (saving as hereinafter noted) with the use of the beach road by the settlers upon the government domain and those who had business with them. After 1884 a number of locations were made upon the government lands. It is within the facts to say that the public had absolutely no use for this beach road, since it led to an impasse in the Ventura mountains, saving as that public was represented by these settlers. The conduct of the owners of the Malibu was certainly not unneighborly, since they freely allowed these settlers the use of this beach road, and, more than that, permitted them to construct their roads and trails from the beach road over the lands of the Malibu to their locations on the government land to the north. The first of these settlers beginning at the westerly line end of the ranch were Harris and Guthrie. To make possible a means of communication between their lands to the west of the ranch and the town of Santa Monica, and thus to avoid the necessity of crossing the almost impassable Ventura mountains to the north, they did some work of grading in the arroyos, barrancas, and canyons on the western part of the ranch, and in 1884, for the first time in its history, they drove, as has been said, a two-horse wagon from Santa Monica to their locations. They lived upon their claims until the year 1900, when they sold to Mr. Rindge, the then owner of the Malibu. Thereafter there was no location and no settler on the lands immediately to the west and to the north of the westerly end of the Malibu. In 1886 one Sweeney made his location on government land in the upper reaches of Nicholas canyon, some two or three miles east of the westerly line of the ranch. He sold to Nicholson, and in 1904 Nicholson's holdings passed by purchase to Mr. Ringe. There has since been no occupancy nor need of use for this beach road by any person west of Encinal canyon. Between Encinal canyon and Nicholas canyon lies Lechuza canyon, but, as has already been said, the Tapias, there located, moved away in 1876, and there has been no settlement in Lechuza canyon, either on or off the ranch. In 1886 Marion Decker located upon a claim in Encinal canyon immediately to the north of the line of the ranch. He came to his location over the Ventura mountains. After establishing himself he built his private road down the canyon to the beach road. Decker retains his holdings, and is one of the principal witnesses for the plaintiff in its contention for a public highway. Decker testifies to the purchase by Mr. Rindge, beginning in 1895, of the settlers' claims until by 1901 "there were left only myself and Drake."

[1] Decker's road to the beach road was unquestionably a private way, constructed with the acquiescence of the owners of the Malibu, and his use of the beach road to Santa Monica would no more establish its character as a public road than would the use of his road from his claim to the beach road fix the character of that as a public highway. United States v. Rindge (D. C.) 208 Fed. 611. Las Trancas canyon lies a little over three miles east of Lechuza canyon, at which latter canyon, under the order granting a new trial, the public highway in the present state of the record now ends. Claims were taken up in this canyon by two men, who, in turn, sold to Mr. Rindge. The testimony of Mr. Decker is that there are claims on government land in Escondido canyon, which lies approximately half way between Lechuza canyon and Malibu canyon, owned by Schumacher, Mellus, Gillis, and Diss, and that they have done some work constructing a private road from their claims to the beach road. No one of these presented himself as a witness in the case. It appears, then, that even before the commencement of this action Decker and Drake were the only two persons who had any use for the beach road, and the contention of appellant is that the use which they have made and are making of it is precisely the use which they have made and are making of the private road from their claims to the beach road —a permissive use for a private way under the sanction of the owners of the ranch.

Appellants further rely upon the failure of the county of Los Angeles ever to declare this road a public highway, or ever to exercise any dominion or control over it, or ever to expend any money in its maintenance, care or betterment. It was not declared a public highway by the court of sessions under the statutes of 1850 (Stats. 1849–50, p. 200). It did not become a public highway under the provisions of the act of 1855 (Stats. 1855, p. 192), which declares public highways to be those so designated by the court of sessions or board of supervisors, or which may be hereafter so declared by the board of supervisors. Nor yet did it become a public highway by virtue of the provisions of sections 2618 and 2619 of the Political Code as they read when that Code took effect in January, 1873. Nor, finally, did it become a highway by virtue of the special road laws applicable to the county of Los Angeles, found in the statutes of 1877–78 (Stats. 1877–78, pp. 6 to 17), both of which acts contemplate that the supervisors, before any such road shall be or be decreed to be a public highway, shall "cause said roads to be properly located and declared as public or county roads," and in this connection reference also is made to section 2621 of the Political Code, which declares that "no route of travel used by one or more persons over another's land shall hereafter become a public road or way by use, or until so declared by the board of supervisors, or by dedication by the owner of the land affected."

The testimony of the settlers, whose occupancy of the government lands began about 1884, is to the general effect that they were not disturbed by the owners of the Malibu ranch in their use of the beach road; that in many places it was, of course, no road at all. The settlers themselves, for their own convenience, made improvements in the natural conditions where it was necessary to leave the beach. The mesas were not cultivated, and one could drive over them at pleasure. "In the early years there was nothing but a bridle trail. We drove where we pleased. There was no injury done. We first found a road or way marked by wagon tracks west of Encinal canyon about 1888 or 1889. During the early years we traveled practically all the way from Malibu to Ramirez on the beach. Whatever patches of road there are which are not in hard sand have been built since that time. There were miles of the way along the Malibu ranch where, during the time we lived there, the only convenient way to travel was where the sand was made hard by the water." Such, and much more to like effect, is the concurrent evidence of plaintiff and defendants. It is to be noted that all such parts of the road as ran along the beach between high and low tide—and this was much the greater part of it—was not on the ranch at all. It was on tidelands owned by the state. These natural conditions, with the slight improvement which the settlers made in them for their own convenience, continued until after Mr. Rindge acquired title to the ranch and in 1894 erected gates—one at the easterly entrance to the ranch, the other at Malibu canyon. From the first Mr. Rindge insisted that there was no public way upon the ranch; that the road was only a private road, permission to use which had been accorded to the settlers. He gave to them keys to the locked gates. They, or some of them, insisted that the road was a public highway, and, being advised by their attorneys that the acceptance and use of keys might militate against this position, they caused Mr. Rindge to be cited before the board of supervisors for obstructing a public highway, the citation being that Mr. Rindge show cause "why a certain gate described in said summons should not be removed from an alleged public highway." Mr. Rindge at this time had spent large sums of money in building a road from the eastern boundary of his ranch to Malibu canyon. He made answer that the gate which he was maintaining was on this privately constructed and privately owned road. He conceded the existence of the beach road as a public highway from the eastern boundary of the ranch "to a point on the beach opposite the Malibu lagoon." He declared that none of the neighbors "had ever been hindered or their friends from passing through, and many privileges had been given them." The result of the hearing under this citation was most inconclusive and unsatisfactory. No official action was taken by the supervisors other than an indefinite continuance. It is asserted by plaintiff that this indefinite continuance was the result of a compromise agreement by which, in effect, Mr. Rindge admitted the road through the ranch to be a public highway. On behalf of the defendants it was stoutly insisted that his admission went only to the road from the easterly line to Malibu canyon, and that under this admission he ceased to lock the gate at the entrance to the ranch, but maintained a locked gate at Malibu canyon. He persisted in this for some time, and the settlers, upon the other hand, broke the lock and frequently destroyed the gates. He posted signs and warnings at and near the gates. He published similar warnings in the newspapers. The form of such signs and notice was:

> "No passing through the Malibu ranch is allowed. No camping thereon under penalty of the law. Shooting and hunting forbidden."

Mr. Rindge, and Mrs. Rindge after him, continued these interruptions and protests with pertinacity until finally this action was brought.

[2] It is manifest that, if a public highway exists at all, it exists by prescriptive user, and not by official acceptance of an offer of dedication, nor by any official recognition of the existence of the highway. Indeed, it is quite plain that any county would be extremely slow to take into its charge and burden itself with the care of such a strip of ocean beach, which from the very nature of the country would have slight use and less value. In opening the water front of their ranch to the travel of foot and horsemen the owners were but following the custom of the country. When that travel of necessity sought the mesa uplands, it would have been unneighborly to the last degree to have checked it or turned it back, and the owner's failure to do so no more established an intent to dedicate a public highway than would his reception and entertainment of such a traveler overnight have established his intent that he should take up a permanent residence with him. Dedication under such conditions is not to be lightly inferred. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 642; Cerf v. Pfleging, 94 Cal. 131, 29 Pac. 417; Niles v. City of Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 572, 58 Pac. 190. It is quite understandable that the settlers, upon the one hand, because their passage was not interfered with, may have come to the conclusion that they were traveling as of absolute right over a public way, but their belief is not at all inconsistent with the position and proof of the defendants that throughout the history of this primitive trail it was but a private way, which developed into a more or less efficient road, in the construction of which the public took no part, and the burden of which construction was largely borne by the owners of the ranch, the settlers, for their own manifest advantage, contributing some of their labor.

[3] It follows herefrom that the findings of the court decreeing the existence of a public highway across the Malibu ranch cannot be sustained, and that the order refusing to grant defendants' motion for a new trial must be reversed. In this connection it is to be noted that the Rindges had constructed upon the uplands and away from the tidal beach a new road to Malibu canyon. Apparently it is conceded that the beach road as far as Malibu canyon is or may be regarded as a public highway. But this admission or concession will not justify in and of itself a finding or declaration that the newly constructed private road is a public substitute for the original beach road.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

In re WALDEN'S ESTATE. (L. A. 5105.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 12, 1917.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚿216(2)—CLAIMS—COSTS—"PARTY INTERESTED."

In a succession controversy, an attorney for litigants claiming heirship, who by the final decree were denied participation, was not a "party interested" in the estate, and could not recover against the estate for the costs and attorney's fees in attempting to establish heirship, though their witnesses gave testimony aiding in reaching the decree for distribution in favor of a particular set of claimants, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1720, or any other statute.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceeding in the estate of Matilda Walden, deceased, wherein Elon G. Galusha, for William Latimer and others, filed a claim for costs. From an order disallowing the claim, claimants appeal. Affirmed.

Elon G. Galusha, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Neighbours, Hoag & Burke, C. White Mortimer, Mott & Dillon, Ball & Ball, and Trusten P. Dyer, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Upon the death of Matilda Walden, intestate, a controversy over kinship and heirship to her and the consequent right of succession to her estate arose. There were three sets of claimants, who for convenience may be designated the Monro claimants, the Latimer claimants, and the American claimants. The contest was decided in favor of the Monro claimants to the exclusion of the Latimer and the American claimants. From the decree determining heirship against them, the Latimer claimants appealed and were unsuccessful on their appeal. Estate of Walden, 166 Cal. 446, 137 Pac. 35. The result of necessity was that the decree determining heirship in favor of the Monro claimants became and is final and conclusive. Thereafter and in the matter of the estate of Matilda Walden, Elon G. Galusha filed a petition and claim which he entitled "claim against the costs of administration of the estate of Matilda Walden, deceased." His petition and claim asserted that he is the attorney at law for the Latimers, and presents to the administrator of the estate "his claim against the costs of administration of said estate; and states that the testimony of the witnesses produced by the defendants Latimer have materially contributed to the finding by the court that Martha Monro and her sister's children are entitled to the estate of the decedent." The petition and claim proceeded further to expound that the Latimers expended about $2,000 in securing the attendance of witnesses upon the trial of the contest to determine heirship, and that the testimony of these witnesses was valuable to the Monros' case; still further, that his own services to the Monros' case were worth about $6,000. He then demanded payment to him of this sum.

The court refused to entertain the petition, refused allowance to the claim, and this appeal followed. The bare statement of the facts above given demonstrates the correctness of the court's determination, and before this court the case presents rather one for the imposition of costs for the taking of a frivolous appeal than for the allowance of the costs contended for.

This claim is presented in his own name and on his own behalf by the attorney for litigants claiming heirship, whose heirship by final decree has been conclusively denied. This attorney is not a "party interested" in the estate (Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657, 56 Pac. 633, 886; Estate of Kruger, 143 Cal. 141, 76 Pac. 891), nor are the Latimers, the unsuccessful claimants to heirships, parties interested in the estate (Estate of Blythe, 108 Cal. 125, 41 Pac. 33; Estate of Walden, supra). Upon the merits, the curious contention is advanced that the estate of Matilda Walden, deceased, became liable for these costs and these attorney's fees incurred by the unsuccessful litigants because the evidence which they produced and the services which this attorney rendered aided in defeating the claims of the American pretenders. If this be so, it forms no just basis of any legal claim under section 1720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor under any other provision of the law. And if these Latimers have any equitable standing it cannot in the nature of the case arise from any service which they rendered to the estate of Matilda Walden, deceased, but solely from the services which they may have rendered to the Monro claimants to that estate. If such services were in fact rendered, under convention or agreement of the parties, the claim, whatever may be its validity, is no more than a private demand against the Monro heirs. So plain must this be that it would be a waste of time to continue the discussion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re MARX'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7623.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1917. Rehearing Denied May 7, 1917.)

1. WILLS 🔑179—REVOCATION—EXECUTION OF LATER WILL.

A later will, containing no express revocation of the earlier, but disposing of the entire estate, revokes the earlier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 456, 457.]

2. WILLS 🔑183—REVOCATION—EXECUTION OF LATER WILL—INVALID PROVISIONS.

Where testatrix made two wills, but the later did not revoke the earlier expressly and contained charitable bequests in excess of one-third of the estate, and the excess was sufficient to pay all bequests of the first will not repeated or cut off in the second, both instruments would stand as the will, and the invalid bequests of the second would be applied to the valid gifts of the first, and any balance would go as intestate property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 461.]

3. WILLS 🔑183—REVOCATION—EXECUTION OF LATER WILL.

Invalid dispositions in a subsequent will do not revoke valid dispositions in the earlier will, not expressly revoked, and are ineffective for any purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 461.]

4. WILLS 🔑221—PROBATE—TWO INSTRUMENTS.

Where a later will is probated, and thereafter an earlier will is discovered, but the valid provisions of the two do not conflict, the probate of the later will should not be revoked, since, so far as it is valid, it is conclusive, and the earlier will should be admitted only when invalid provisions of the later would, in the absence of earlier, permit partial intestacy.

Angellotti, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Johanne Augusta Emily Marx, deceased. From an order admitting two instruments to probate as the last will of deceased, Stephanie Henke, a niece, appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and HENSHAW, J., dissenting.

Wm. Loewy and Walter Loewy, both of San Francisco, and Wallace Rutherford, of Napa (Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for appellant. Clarence N. Riggins and U'Ren & Beard, all of Napa (Edmund Nelson, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The record presents an appeal by Stephanie Henke, a niece of the decedent, and her only heir at law, from an order admitting to probate, as constituting together the last will of the decedent, two documents testamentary in character, executed at different dates.

The decedent died on May 14, 1914. One of the documents in question was dated March 8, 1910, the other March 26, 1913. The latter was found immediately after her death, and, on petition of the persons named therein as executors, was duly admitted to probate on June 8, 1914. Several months after their appointment as executors, upon examining the other papers and effects of the decedent, they discovered the document dated March 8, 1910. Being in doubt whether the document of 1910 constituted a part of the will of the decedent, or was revoked by the will already admitted to probate, they filed a petition, upon which the order appealed from was made, alleging the probate of said will of 1913, the subsequent discovery of the will of 1910, together with the other facts made essential by the Code to a petition for the probate of a will, and praying, in the alternative, that the two documents be admitted to probate together as the last will of the decedent; or, that the will of 1910 be admitted as the last will, or that the will of 1913 alone be declared to constitute the will; also that if the court found that the will of 1910 constituted any part of the will of the decedent, it revoke the order previously made admitting the will of 1913 to probate. Upon the hearing of this petition the court made an order declaring that the decedent left the said two wills dated, respectively, March 8, 1910, and March 26, 1913, that they together constituted the last will of the decedent, and admitting the same to probate as such last will. The order also declared that the previous order of June 8, 1914, admitting to probate the document of March 26, 1913, alone, as the last will of the decedent, "be vacated and set aside, and that all proceedings thereunder be vacated and set aside."

The will of 1913 contained no declaration as provided in section 1292 of the Civil Code revoking the will of 1910. The appellant contends that it was wholly inconsistent therewith, and consequently operated as a revocation by implication, under the rule prescribed by section 1296 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

> "A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will; but in other cases the prior will remains effectual so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will."

[1] The authorities support the proposition that a later will containing no express revocation of former wills, but which, in fact, disposes of the entire estate, leaving nothing upon which the former will could operate, is, in effect, a revocation thereof. If the later provisions were carried out it would consume the entire estate, and the prior will could have no effect. On this point Mr. Jarman says that in all cases where a later will is adequate to the disposition of the entire property of the deceased the case "rests on the true construction of the contents of the two instruments, and the complete disposition contained in the second must, unless controlled by the context, wholly revoke the first." 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) *138; other authorities to the same effect are Page on Wills, § 269; 1 Underhill on Wills, § 251; 1 Redf. on Wills, *362, *365.

[2] The respondent in answer to this proposition presents the point that although the dispositions of the will of 1913, if carried out literally, would consume the entire estate, yet that because of the fact that the charitable gifts therein far exceed one-third of the estate, there is a considerable portion thereof which is not lawfully disposed of because of the invalidity of the disposition as to such excess, and, consequently, that the rule that a later will adequate to the complete disposition of the estate revokes a prior will does not apply. The facts support this contention. The gifts to charitable uses in the will of 1913 amount to $113,610. The value of the estate as shown by the appraisement filed was $149,141.68. One-third of the estate would, therefore, be $49,713.89, and this is the full extent of the valid charitable gifts. The gifts not charitable amount to $61,018.40. As the valid gifts of this will, therefore, amount to $110,732.29, the balance of $38,409.29 remains undisposed of by that will. The gifts of the will of 1910 to persons who are not mentioned in the will of 1913 amount to only $25,100. The balance undisposed of by the will of 1913 would therefore satisfy the disposition of the will of 1910, if the respective dispositions of the two wills are not to be cumulated, and the two wills may be probated together, under this theory without any complications arising from the overdisposition of the estate.

[3] The authorities support the proposition that an invalid disposition in a subsequent will does not operate to revoke a disposition in the prior will, and is ineffective for any purpose. In Austin v. Oakes, 117 N. Y. 577, 23 N. E. 193, the testatrix having only a restricted power to appoint by her will the persons to take under her husband's will, executed a will containing a lawful exercise of the power. Afterwards, by a codicil, she attempted to declare a different appointment as to one share by giving it to persons who were not within the class to which, by the terms of the power, she was confined. The court said:

> "A revocation of an earlier disposition of a will by a later one, or by a codicil, * * * is never anything but a rule of necessity, and it operates only so far as is requisite to give the later provision effect. * * * But no revocation could give effect to this codicil."

And, referring to the fact that the later disposition of the codicil was invalid, it further said:

> "No violence is done to her intention if, that failing, the disposition of her will is suffered to stand; for I deem it beyond a reasonable doubt that if she had known what we now know, that an appointment to the daughter's children was not within her authority, she never would have made it, but would have suffered the disposition of her will to remain."

So in Altrock v. Vandenburgh (Sup.) 25 N. Y. Supp. 851, the testator had devised his land to his son for life with remainder to his son's children. The son died, and he then, by a codicil, devised the land to the same children, but in a manner which was void, being in violation of the law of New York against perpetuities. The court held that the codicil did not revoke the former devise of the remainder in fee, saying:

> "It would be strange, indeed, if a wholly inoperative attempted disposition should nevertheless have the effect of destroying a prior valid devise, especially when, as in this case, it is apparent that the testator did not wish to die intestate as to his real estate, and that, if he had known he could not lawfully make the disposition last attempted, he would have been content with the first."

The case is analogous to those where a testator, having made a will and desiring to make a new one, cancels the first will preparatory to making the second and thereafter fails lawfully to execute the same or makes therein an invalid disposition of his property. In such cases it is held that the attempted cancellation of the old will is ineffectual because the full intent is wanting, it being conditional upon the execution of a valid new will. Mr. Underhill, on this subject, says:

> "It will be presumed (and the presumption is sanctioned by reason and good sense) that the testator meant the cancellation to operate as a revocation only in the event of the will which he had intended to make being valid. If, therefore, he is prevented from executing any will, or the one he intends to make, or if he executes a will which turns out to be invalid, the will which has been revoked will revive." 1 Underhill on Wills, § 252.

It will perhaps be more accurate to say that the prior will does not revive, but that the attempted revocation will be deemed ineffectual.

These principles apply to the present case. The prior will can be deemed to have been revoked only by reason of the fact that the subsequent will is wholly inconsistent therewith, and would be a revocation if it were effectual to the disposition of the entire estate. But it appears that a large portion of the dispositions made is invalid, and by reason of that invalidity the entire estate is not disposed of. The will of 1913 is inadequate to the disposition of the estate, and to that extent it is not inconsistent with the prior will. Consequently, it is not wholly inconsistent therewith, and does not completely revoke it. It is not necessary upon this consideration of the case, and hence it would be improper, to determine to what extent the legacies given in the prior will are revoked, or whether they are revoked at all by legacies given to the same legatees in the subsequent will. The court below did not err in admitting the two wills as constituting together the last will of the decedent.

[4] The appellant further contends that the portion of the order purporting to vacate the order of June 8, 1914, admitting the will of 1913 alone to probate, and vacating all proceedings thereunder, is erroneous. This contention, we think, is well taken. After a will has been probated and another paper of an earlier date is found which constitutes a part of the last will of the decedent, together with that already probated, it is not necessary to revoke the former order of probate. A different question would be presented if the earlier will had been the one first discovered and probated. In that case, the later will, if admitted to probate, would partially supersede and revoke the prior will if inconsistent in part only, or wholly revoke it if entirely inconsistent. Within the year from the first probate, the later will could be offered for probate in connection with a petition to revoke the probate of the earlier one, if it was inconsistent therewith, on the ground that the later will substantially affected the validity of the will probated, as provided in subdivision 4 of section 1312, Code of Civil Procedure. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1328, 1329, 1330. After that period perhaps the probate of the earlier will would be conclusive so far as it disposed of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1333; State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 81 Am. Dec. 118. The present petition was filed within the year, and therefore the precise question last mentioned does not arise. Nor is there a question presented affecting the validity of the will of 1913 already probated. That will is the later will. If it lawfully disposed of the entire estate, it would be the only valid will. So far as it does so, it is final and conclusive against any prior will; it cannot be affected thereby. The will of 1910, when probated, takes effect and can take effect only because the will of 1913 is not effective to dispose of the whole estate, and it takes effect only upon property not disposed of by the will of 1913 and as to which that will left the decedent intestate. The will of 1913 must stand unaffected, and must prevail over that of 1910, in any event. It was therefore unnecessary to revoke the probate of the will of 1913 and immediately readmit it to probate. And as rights may have accrued under the proceedings taken in the meantime, it was improper to vacate the previous proceedings. The proper practice was to admit the earlier, but later found, will to probate, as constituting, so far as may be, a part of the decedent's last will. Proceedings already taken would remain effective so far as rights may have vested under them. The facts stated in the petition showed no cause for the revocation of the former probate and did not require or justify the issuance of the citation required by section 1328, Code of Civil Procedure, where a petition to revoke the probate of a will is filed. The part of the order appealed from purporting to revoke the previous probate of the will of 1913, and vacating the proceedings had under the previous order of probate, should not have been inserted therein. This conclusion, however, does not render it necessary to reverse the entire order. All that need be done is to modify it by striking out the objectionable portion. It is therefore ordered by this court that the order appealed from be modified by striking therefrom the following words:

> "That the order made and filed herein on the 8th day of June, 1914, admitting the document dated March 26, 1913, to probate alone as the last will and testament of said deceased and appointing Percy S. King and J. E. Beard (also known as Edgar Beard) as executors thereof, and ordering that letters testamentary be issued to them without bonds be vacated and set aside, and that all proceedings thereunder be vacated and set aside."

And that as so modified the order be affirmed; appellant to recover costs of appeal.

In re STONE'S ESTATE.

GREEN v. STONE.

(L. A. 4955.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 13, 1917.)

1. WILLS 🔑360—WILL CONTEST—ASSERTING NEW GROUND OF RELIEF.
Where the sole question was whether the will was the product of undue influence, the contestant could not on appeal raise the question whether the will was duly and formally executed.
[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 825.]

2. JUDGMENT 🔑282 — ENTRY — REQUISITES —SIGNATURE OF JUDGE.
Where a will was contested on the ground of undue influence, the mere fact that the judgment and order admitting the will to probate was signed by a judge other than the one who presided at the trial was not fatal, since the judge who signed could conceivably have heard proof of execution.
[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 554–556.]

3. WILLS 🔑164(7) — PROBATE — EVIDENCE —ADMISSIBILITY.
In a will contest on the sole ground of undue influence, evidence as to the soundness of mind and sanity of the deceased was properly excluded.
[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 414.]

4. WILLS 🔑324(3)—PROBATE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.
Where on the first appeal the evidence was held insufficient to warrant denying probate, and the contestant on the second trial introduced no further evidence, direction of verdict for the proponent was proper.
[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 769.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Proceeding by Fannie E. Stone for the probate of the will of John Newton Stone, deceased, contested by Leo Stone Green and another. From a judgment on directed verdict for the proponent, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 161 Pac. 258.

Ingall W. Bull, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg and Hartley Shaw, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is the second appeal in the contest of Leo Stone Green over the admission to probate of the will of her deceased father. The decision of this court upon the first appeal will be found reported in 172 Cal. at page 215, 155 Pac. 992. There the verdict of the jury finding that the will was the product of undue influence exercised over the husband by his wife was reversed as unsupported by the evidence. A second trial was had, a jury was impaneled, and after trial the court instructed the jury to return its verdict in favor of the proponent of the will. The jury did so, and from the judgment which followed this appeal has been taken.

[1] The propositions advanced upon appeal will be considered seriatim. The first of these is that the evidence fails to show that the will was ever executed by the deceased in the manner required by law. Sections 1308, 1315, 1318, Code Civ. Proc. The sole question before the court and jury in the trial of the contest was as above indicated, whether or not the will (the due execution of which for the purposes of the contest was thus admitted) was or was not the product of undue influence exerted upon the mind of the testator. The record upon this appeal therefore does not disclose, as it would not be expected to disclose, the proceedings in probate touching the due execution of the will. They may either have preceded or may have followed the determination of the contest. In either case they had no place in this record, and appellant's argument as directed to this point is frivolous. Estate of McCarty, 58 Cal. 335; Estate of Dombrowski, 163 Cal. 290, 125 Pac. 233.

[2] It is said in appellant's brief that the judgment and order admitting the will to probate was signed by a judge other than the judge who presided at the trial of the case. Conceding this bare statement of fact to be true—and the brief contains nothing more than this bare statement of fact—it does not follow that this was error or even irregularity. It is quite conceivable, for example, that after the determination of the contest the purely formal evidence in proof of the due execution of the will was heard by another judge sitting in probate, in which case it would have been strictly regular for that judge to have made the final order admitting the will.

[3] It is said that it was error for the court not to submit to the jury "the question of the soundness of mind and sanity of the deceased." But the contestant at the opening of the trial formally abandoned the ground of contest based upon insanity, and declared that there was only one question at issue—the question of undue influence. Still further it is said that the court erred "in excluding testimony regarding the mental condition of the deceased at the time the will was made." But for the reason just above indicated the ruling was strictly proper.

[4] It is finally said that the court erred in directing a verdict. But, as the contestant is not at the slightest pains to show wherein the evidence differed in any respect more favorable to contestant's view from the evidence which had been admitted on the previous trial, which had been passed upon by this court and which had been held to be insufficient, we are bound to conclude that contestant's failure to point out by reference to the transcript of evidence any specific instance of such difference is a confession that the difference itself does not exist.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

SWEET v. FRESNO HOTEL CO.

BRANDT BROS. v. SAME.

(S. F. 7268.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1917. Rehearing Denied May 17, 1917.)

1. Mechanics' Liens 🔑104 — Building Contracts—Time of Payment.

A building contract, merely providing when 75 per cent. of the contract price is payable, does not conform substantially to Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing in effect that such contracts must, by their terms, declare that at least 25 per cent. of the contract price shall be payable at least 35 days after final completion; and so others than the contractor furnishing labor and material are entitled to lien for the full amount thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 136.]

2. Mechanics' Liens 🔑134 — Form of Claim.

A claim of lien by another than the chief contractor, containing a statement of the particulars required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, with nothing contradictory or destructive thereof, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 208.]

3. Mechanics' Liens 🔑277(6)—Claims—Variance.

There is no variance between claim of lien of subcontractors for value of work and material up to cessation of labor, estimated at contract price, stated also to be the value thereof, and evidence that this was the value of the work and material, plus 20 per cent. for their profits as subcontractors.

4. Mechanics' Liens 🔑141—Claim of Subcontractors—Giving Name of Employer.

Statement in claim of lien by subcontractors, that the contract made by them with F. & Co., the contractor, was made by the latter "on behalf of and for said owner," does not vitiate the claim as not giving the name of the person by whom they were employed; the quoted phrase being manifestly inserted on the theory of the principal contract being void for failure to make 25 per cent. of the contract price payable 35 days after completion, in which case Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, provides that work and material by others than the principal contractor shall be deemed done and furnished at the instance of the owner.

5. Mechanics' Liens 🔑135—Lien Claims.

It is no ground for objection to claim of lien by S., stating that the work done by him was under contract between him and the contractor, that the contract, made a part of the claim of lien, though signed in his name, purported to be a contract of S. & Co., it appearing by the evidence that S. & Co. was merely a name under which S. was doing business, and that no one else was interested therein; it not being necessary that the claim make this explanation, but enough that it asserts the ultimate fact that he made the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 209.]

6. Mechanics' Liens 🔑51—Loans to Contractor.

One merely paying the wages of a building contractor's employés, under agreement to do so and to be repaid the same with a commission, cannot have a lien for their labor; he in effect loaning money to the contractor to enable him to carry on the work, for which there can be no lien.

7. Mechanics' Liens 🔑39 — Contract to Bestow Labor.

Contract of S. with F., building contractor, whereby S. agrees to furnish all common and carpenter labor for completion of building, and to pay all wages that may become due the carpenters and common laborers, and F. agrees for such labor furnished to pay to S. each month, with commission, the amount of wages S. has paid to such laborers during the preceding month, is one to bestow labor on the building, entitling S. to a lien for labor furnished thereunder; and not a contract for loan of money, though it is provided F. shall make out and deliver to S. weekly pay rolls, and that it is understood that all men employed shall be satisfactory to F., and that he shall have the right to discharge any unsatisfactory to him, and to replace them with others selected by him.

8. Mechanics' Liens 🔑39 — Subcontractors—Amount of Lien—Value of Labor.

The value of the labor furnished by a subcontractor under contract to furnish the carpenter and common labor to complete the building, and see that such laborers worked when wanted, and attend to paying their wages, for which the subcontractor is entitled to a lien, is the amount of the reasonable wages paid to the men, with an additional sum for the value of the subcontractor's services, which the contract requires him to perform.

9. Mechanics' Liens 🔑161(4)—Interest.

A contractor cannot increase the burden of the owner by an agreement with the lien claimant, made after the work is done, to pay interest at an increased rate; but in such case, as in any other, there is right to interest at the legal rate, the amount owing, as well as the time of payment, being fixed and certain.
